For these concerts and recitals, while meeting the full requirements of the most musicianly, were also not incomprehensible to those musically more or less illiterate. There was a fine spirit of interest for the neophyte in this culture and it was manifest in all the five events that were offered—Hoffman, Rethberg, Hayes, Elman and the Boston Symphony. All of these artists offered music best appreciated by the most completely initiated ear; but all of them, too, were careful not to forget the new concert-goer, vaguely unsatisfied by conventional offerings, yet not yet ready to enjoy Bach or Beethoven at their most abtruse. Hayes' spirituals, Elman's beautiful Chopin Nocturne and the "Ave Maria" of Schubert which he gave as the final encore of his recital a month ago; and last night, the Symphony's playing of Ravel's "Bolero" and the Jazz Suite of Gruenberg as well as the Schubert "Unfinished"—all of these made new music lovers, won initiates, convinced doubters that here indeed was a complete and almost limitless field of artistic enjoyment which they had not yet cultivated, but would never again ignore. It has been a memorable experience, a course in appreciation, and one which has made future series certain of even greater succes

The Woolsey Hall Series

LOCAL concert-goers may have accorded to an orchestra or ar triumph equally impressive with t Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Wednesday evening, but never a mo sive one. The applause that broke o ed Woolsey Hall like thunder at the primitive and fascinating Ravel was a fitting climax to th Hall series which Mr. Daggett L ranged this season for the Yale Music. The series has been a com to those who fear that artistic in die in a mechanicalized age; an its entirety, it was a notable d of the democracy of this particular art.

For these concerts and recitals, while meeting the full requirements of the most musicianly, were also not incomprehensible to those musically more or less illiterate. There was a fine spirit of interest for the neophyte in this culture and it was manifest in all the five events that were offered—Hoffman, Rethberg, Hayes, Elman and the Boston Symphony. All of these artists offered music best appreciated by the most completely initiated ear; but all of them, too, were careful not to forget the new concert-goer, vaguely unsatisfied by conventional offerings, yet not yet ready to enjoy Bach or Beethoven at their most abtruse. Hayes' spirituals, Elman's beautiful Chopin Nocturne and the "Ave Maria" of Schubert which he gave as the final encore of his recital a month ago; and last night, the Symphony's playing of Ravel's "Bolero" and the Jazz Suite of Gruenberg as well as the Schubert "Unfinished"—all of these made new music lovers, won initiates, convinced doubters that here indeed was a complete and almost limitless field of artistic enjoyment which they had not yet cultivated, but would never again ignore. It has been a memorable experience, a course in appreciation, and one which has made future series certain of even greater succes

New Haven Journal-Courier
March 7 1930.

ORD DAILY COURANT: FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1930.

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

✣ ✣ ✣

The Boston Orchestra in New Haven.

Luck came my way Wednesday evening and I went to New Haven to hear the Boston Symphony at Woolsey Hall—having the pleasure of going with Frank Sedgwick, who is bringing the orchestra here on April 9.

The concert was absolutely sold out, and when we went into the lobby there was a long line of people buying standing room, but there's a little magic about knowing the business manager of the orchestra, and Manager Lee (of Parsons's in Hartford and the Woolsey Hall Concert Series in New Haven), and we had chairs up against the wall at the left of the orchestra where we could see Dr. Koussevitzky and hear the music well.

✣ ✣ ✣

The program was made up of the Schubert Unfinished Symphony, the Ravel Bolero, Gruenberg's Jazz Suite (two movements only, the Boston Waltz tempo and the Fox-trot tempo), Bloch's "Schelomo"—Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra—and the Schoenberg arrangement of the Bach Prelude and Fugue in E minor.

I haven't the remotest idea how many times I have heard the Schubert Symphony, but I am sure of this—that I never heard a reading of its to compare, in sheer loveliness, with that which Dr. Koussevitzky gave on Wednesday evening. Every beauty of every melodic phrase seemed to shine as if it were absolutely new—yet there was the mellow setting of memory for it all, and of memory improved upon, in the glow of the present interpretation.

Never yielding to the temptation to use mere volume of tone that was at his fingers' ends Dr. Koussevitzky somehow seemed to gather all the possible beauties of the score in a twilight atmosphere of sound—and though he was obliged to submit to a considerable interval between the playing of the symphony's two movements, (owing to the late-comers, of course) he kept the idea of continuity most remarkably. And no measure of the reading, no note of the playing, seemingly, could have been improved in effectiveness and beauty.

✣ ✣ ✣

That Ravel Bolero has been talked about a great deal—has been played many times since last November when it was first heard in America. It is not remarkable in composition, its melody is simply repeated over and over again—but it is wildly effective in the way it is played by Dr. Koussevitsky in a pitiless, never-failing crescendo, from the merest whisper of tone up to the full blare of the whole orchestra. And last evening it took the New Haven audience off its feet, apparently, just as it did the Carnegie Hall audience in which I sat last January.

✣ ✣ ✣

Now as to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and jazz. Personally I suppose I'm a blooming old mossback but I hate to have an orchestra of that quality waste its time, as it seems to me, on the jazz-rhythm. For my dimming eyes can't see that there's a future for jazz upless it is in some after-state where it may be used for purposes of punishment. And so I was not especially sorry that the orchestra played only two movements of the four that Composer Gruenberg has used in his Jazz Suite, and neither of those played made any impression on me as music—save that the composition, doubtless, is perfectly good of its kind.

There are a few graceful measures—but very few, to my mind—in the waltz tempo of the Suite; but in the main there is simply the feeling of the disconnected, the sensation of doubt, of lapse, in the whole thing. And certainly there is an absolute lack of tonal beauty.

✣ ✣ ✣

Mr. Bloch—some Hartford music-lovers will remember that he came here once as guest conducter for the Hartford Philharmonic Orchestra and got some very fine playing out of it—is eloquent in his music expressing especially the sorrows and tribulations of his race. In the present Rhapsody he has made the 'cello sing the wailing song of lamentation, hint at the glories of kingly triumph, paint splendors, speak wisdom; he has, seemingly, thought to have his music run the gaunt of all the arts and in the somber gorgeousness of it all he has accomplished fine things. The playing of the orchestra was of magnificent quality and Mr. Bedetti's instrument was brilliant in heights and dark in depths of tone. In the Carnegie Hall rendering of this work last evening the program called for unison playing by four of the 'cellos—and it seems to me that this reading of Mr. Bloch's score should be more effective than that by one instrument only, always granting the perfect unity of tone which I have no doubt four artists of the orchestra may command. For at times the tone of the one instrument Wednesday evening seemed rather inadequate against the weight of the orchestra.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Schoenberg Bach arrangement is full and rich and the playing was of the fine classicism required. There was glorious volume of smooth, splendid tone brought forth without a shade of sensationalism on the one hand or sentimentality on the other. Frankly, if I had had the arranging of the program, I would have put this after the Schubert work and used the Bolero for a finale because somehow I had the feeling that the audience, the other evening, had been a little taken out of the mood of appreciating Bach by the preceding modernism. But whether the audience was quite up to Bach or not there were the usual recalls for the conductor at the close of the concert.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine form Wednesday evening and the orchestra seemed able and willing to give him anything he chose to call for in volume, or grace, or beauty of tone. The string section seems unusually fine this year and all the evening I noticed the smoothness and fineness of the woodwinds and brass. Altogether the New Haven concert was a great treat for me and I'm more than glad I went down.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTONIANS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, presented, as the fourth in a series of five Brooklyn concerts, a diversified program last night at the Academy of Music. The classic and the modern schools were both included on the evening's schedule.

Mr. Koussevitsky opened the program with the Haydn D Major symphony wherein the composer uses four horns in accordance with his plan of titling the work "Mit dem Hornsignal." The "St. Ann" fugue of Bach as orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg followed immediately as though the conductor were giving a lesson in ancient and modern forms of composition, for Schonberg has left little of Bach in the result.

Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra started the second half of the program with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra as soloist. It is peculiarly Hebraic in character and was conceived when the composer was starting his campaign of bringing Hebrew music to the attention of serious composers although Bloch disavowed any intent to localize his efforts.

The Ravel "Bolero" which proved one of the outstanding works of the current season when introduced here by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic last November was the concluding number of the evening. Mr. Koussevitsky built up the monotonous rhythm into a veritable tornado of sound.

H. E. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Boston Symphony

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy Music last evening. The program ayed was not, in every respect, iat which had been advertised in advance of the occasion, but the alteration enhanced rather than decreased the interest which it held for the audience. Following Haydn's hunting Symphony in D major (B. & H. 31), Mr. Koussewitsky presented not the familiar suite from Strawinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," but Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of a Bach organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, which received its first New York performance in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening.

This was a novelty which, in a sense, was not a novelty, the work (in part) of an arch-modernist, yet nothing to offend the conservative tastes of the audience which the Institute of Arts and Sciences provides for Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We prefer Mr. Stokowski's Bach transcriptions to those which Schoenberg has given us, though that of the E-flat Prelude and Fugue is not extravagantly, and often beautifully, scored. The audience received it with favor, but was obviously more impressed by Ravel's Bolero, which was heard for the first time in Brooklyn at this concert.

The Bolero is an experiment in form, structure, instrumentation, an exercise of its composer's skill as a craftsman. And as such it is indubitably effective. But it does not wear well. One perceives the trick and how it is done, and loses interest. Those who heard it last evening for the first time will be less impressed when they hear it again.

Mr. Koussewitsky read with spirit and point Haydn's Symphony "With the Horn Call," dealt honestly with the tempi of the four movements, elastically with their rhythms. But both conductor and orchestra were at their best in the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," a rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, in which the solo part was played by Jean Bedetti. This is a fine score, sumptuously caparisoned in the Oriental manner, Mr. Bloch at his best, and it was admirably played last evening by both soloist and orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

67

Boston Symphony Concert

Louis Gruenberg's 'Jazz Suite' Is Included in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us once more. Its fourth evening concert took place in Carnegie Hall last night. There was music of various times and characters, and the American composer had another opportunity to reveal his suppressed powers.

The second number on the list was Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite." This composition is young, having been ushered into the light of day by the Cincinnati Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner, on March 22, 1929. It is one of several attempts which have been made to demonstrate that jazz, our own most particlar product, can be treated artistically just as folk music has.

But there is something wrong somewhere. Either this is not real jazz or real art; or perhaps jazz and real art cannot be successfully married. Mr. Gruenberg's suite was worth hearing, but when it had been heard one was convinced that he had been made acquainted with an experiment and nothing more. The composer has given us a work in four sections, of which the titles are fox trot tempo, Boston waltz tempo, blues tempo, slow drag, and one-step tempo. All of these titles are strictly respected by the composer and one hears music which surely belongs to the jazz family, even if it has married a foreigner.

There is a rich harvest of dissonances in the work and there are trumpets con sordini to furnish the conventional "breaks." But nothing of the seductive wickedness of jazz was discovered. The finale, a grand smash of tone, evoked applause from an audience which up to that part of the suite had been singularly reticent. The composer accepted his honors decorously and then there was the customary exodus to smoke the thing over. There had been much more approval after the first number which was Haydn's D major symphony, No. 31, in the Breitkopf & Haertel catalogue and generally known as the symphony with the horn call.

This delightful old work, one of Haydn's most ingenuous conceptions, was so well performed that it stirred the hearers to prolonged demonstrations. The members of the orchestra who had played the charming solos and the horn quartet stood up to be applauded. This symphony is probably the first to have four horns in the score, and it might be regarded as astonishing that only two were habitually used, did we not recollect that orchestras were small and their strings easily overbalanced. Mr. Koussevitzky was obviously enamored of the symphony, and it must be added that he also did everything in the power of a conductor for the jazz invention.

The third number was Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," which is well known to local music lovers, and which is perhaps the most profoundly felt of all Mr. Bloch's works. The concert reached its finish with the E-flat organ prelude and fugue of Bach, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg. Great musicians believe it entirely proper to arrange Bach and some of the orchestral transcriptions are splendid in effect. Mr. Schoenberg's arrangement, presented last evening, had not been heard here before. Doubtless it will be played again, since orchestral works with such foundations as those provided by Bach are very scarce in these days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

The Woolsey Hall Series

LOCAL concert-goers may have previously accorded to an orchestra or an artist a triumph equally impressive with that given Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Wednesday evening, but never a more impressive one. The applause that broke over crowded Woolsey Hall like thunder at the end of the primitive and fascinating "Bolero" of Ravel was a fitting climax to the Woolsey Hall series which Mr. Daggett Lee has arranged this season for the Yale School of Music. The series has been a complete answer to those who fear that artistic interests may die in a mechanicalized age; and, taken in its entirety, it was a notable demonstration of the democracy of this particular art.

For these concerts and recitals, while meeting the full requirements of the most musicianly, were also not incomprehensible to those musically more or less illiterate. There was a fine spirit of interest for the neophyte in this culture and it was manifest in all the five events that were offered—Hoffman, Rethberg, Hayes, Elman and the Boston Symphony. All of these artists offered music best appreciated by the most completely initiated ear; but all of them, too, were careful not to forget the new concert-goer, vaguely unsatisfied by conventional offerings, yet not yet ready to enjoy Bach or Beethoven at their most abtruse. Hayes' spirituals, Elman's beautiful Chopin Nocturne and the "Ave Maria" of Schubert which he gave as the final encore of his recital a month ago; and last night, the Symphony's playing of Ravel's "Bolero" and the Jazz Suite of Gruenberg as well as the Schubert "Unfinished"—all of these made new music lovers, won initiates, convinced doubters that here indeed was a complete and almost limitless field of artistic enjoyment which they had not yet cultivated, but would never again ignore. It has been a memorable experience, a course in appreciation, and one which has made future series certain of even greater succes

The Woolsey Hall Series

LOCAL concert-goers may have previously accorded to an orchestra or an artist a triumph equally impressive with that given Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Wednesday evening, but never a more impressive one. The applause that broke over crowded Woolsey Hall like thunder at the end of the primitive and fascinating "Bolero" of Ravel was a fitting climax to the Woolsey Hall series which Mr. Daggett Lee has arranged this season for the Yale School of Music. The series has been a complete answer to those who fear that artistic interests may die in a mechanicalized age; and, taken in its entirety, it was a notable demonstration of the democracy of this particular art.

For these concerts and recitals, while meeting the full requirements of the most musicianly, were also not incomprehensible to those musically more or less illiterate. There was a fine spirit of interest for the neophyte in this culture and it was manifest in all the five events that were offered—Hoffman, Rethberg, Hayes, Elman and the Boston Symphony. All of these artists offered music best appreciated by the most completely initiated ear; but all of them, too, were careful not to forget the new concert-goer, vaguely unsatisfied by conventional offerings, yet not yet ready to enjoy Bach or Beethoven at their most abtruse. Hayes' spirituals, Elman's beautiful Chopin Nocturne and the "Ave Maria" of Schubert which he gave as the final encore of his recital a month ago; and last night, the Symphony's playing of Ravel's "Bolero" and the Jazz Suite of Gruenberg as well as the Schubert "Unfinished"—all of these made new music lovers, won initiates, convinced doubters that here indeed was a complete and almost limitless field of artistic enjoyment which they had not yet cultivated, but would never again ignore. It has been a memorable experience, a course in appreciation, and one which has made future series certain of even greater succes

New Haven Journal-Courier
March 7 1930.

ORD DAILY COURANT: FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1930.

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

✣ ✣ ✣

The Boston Orchestra in New Haven.

Luck came my way Wednesday evening and I went to New Haven to hear the Boston Symphony at Woolsey Hall—having the pleasure of going with Frank Sedgwick, who is bringing the orchestra here on April 9.

The concert was absolutely sold out, and when we went into the lobby there was a long line of people buying standing room, but there's a little magic about knowing the business manager of the orchestra, and Manager Lee (of Parsons's in Hartford and the Woolsey Hall Concert Series in New Haven), and we had chairs up against the wall at the left of the orchestra where we could see Dr. Koussevitzky and hear the music well.

✣ ✣ ✣

The program was made up of the Schubert Unfinished Symphony, the Ravel Bolero, Gruenberg's Jazz Suite (two movements only, the Boston Waltz tempo and the Fox-trot tempo), Bloch's "Schelomo"—Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti, first [illegible] of the orchestra—and the [illegible] arrangement of the Bach [illegible] in E minor.

[illegible] how [illegible] as big a drawing card as [illegible] Jimmy Foxx, Bob Groves, Bing [illegible] and the other stars of the [illegible] possibilities.

[illegible] SHIRES.

[illegible] ship. Having the Athletics already [illegible] or league clubs as drawing cards and [illegible] White Sox with the Great Shires and [illegible] the Great Shires is just about as big [illegible] seen, as Babe Ruth himself. So he [illegible] have been improved in effectiveness and beauty.

✣ ✣ ✣

That Ravel Bolero has been talked about a great deal—has been played many times since last November when it was first heard in America. It is not remarkable in composition, its melody is simply repeated over and over again—but it is wildly effective in the way it is played by Dr. Koussevitsky in a pitiless, never-failing crescendo, from the merest whisper of tone up to the full blare of the whole orchestra. And last evening it took the New Haven audience off its feet, apparently, just as it did the Carnegie Hall audience in which I sat last January.

✣ ✣ ✣

Now as to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and jazz. Personally I suppose I'm a blooming old mossback but I hate to have an orchestra of that quality waste its time, as it seems to me, on the jazz-rhythm. For my dimming eyes can't see that there's a future for jazz upless it is in some after-state where it may be used for purposes of punishment. And so I was not especially sorry that the orchestra played only two movements of the four that Composer Gruenberg has used in his Jazz Suite, and neither of those played made any impression on me as music—save that the composition, doubtless, is perfectly good of its kind.

There are a few graceful measures—but very few, to my mind—in the waltz tempo of the Suite; but in the main there is simply the feeling of the disconnected, the sensation of doubt, of lapse, in the whole thing. And certainly there is an absolute lack of tonal beauty.

✣ ✣ ✣

Mr. Bloch—some Hartford music-lovers will remember that he came here once as guest conducter for the Hartford Philharmonic Orchestra and got some very fine playing out of it—is eloquent in his music expressing especially the sorrows and tribulations of his race. In the present Rhapsody he has made the 'cello sing the wailing song of lamentation, hint at the glories of kingly triumph, paint splendors, speak wisdom; he [illegible] seemingly, thought to have his [illegible] gaunt of all the arts [illegible] er gorgeousness of it [illegible] mplished fine things. [illegible] the orchestra was of [illegible] ality and Mr. Bedetti's [illegible] s brilliant in heights [illegible] depths of tone. In the [illegible] rendering of this work [illegible] the program called for [illegible] by four of the 'cellos—[illegible] to me that this reading [illegible] 's score should be more [illegible] an that by one instru- [illegible] always granting the per- [illegible] of tone which I have no [illegible] artists of the orchestra may command. For at times the tone of the one instrument Wednesday evening seemed rather inadequate against the weight of the orchestra.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Schoenberg Bach arrangement is full and rich and the playing was of the fine classicism required. There was glorious volume of smooth, splendid tone brought forth without a shade of sensationalism on the one hand or sentimentality on the other. Frankly, if I had had the arranging of the program, I would have put this after the Schubert work and used the Bolero for a finale because somehow I had the feeling that the audience, the other evening, had been a little taken out of the mood of appreciating Bach by the preceding modernism. But whether the audience was quite up to Bach or not there were the usual recalls for the conductor at the close of the concert.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine form Wednesday evening and the orchestra seemed able and willing to give him anything he chose to call for in volume, or grace, or beauty of tone. The string section seems unusually fine this year and all the evening I noticed the smoothness and fineness of the woodwinds and brass. Altogether the New Haven concert was a great treat for me and I'm more than glad I went down.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTONIANS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, presented, as the fourth in a series of five Brooklyn concerts, a diversified program last night at the Academy of Music. The classic and the modern schools were both included on the evening's schedule.

Mr. Koussevitsky opened the program with the Haydn D Major symphony wherein the composer uses four horns in accordance with his plan of titling the work "Mit dem Hornsignal." The "St. Ann" fugue of Bach as orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg followed immediately as though the conductor were giving a lesson in ancient and modern forms of compositfon, for Schonberg has left little of Bach in the result.

Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra started the second half of the program with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra as soloist. It is peculiarly Hebraic in character and was conceived when the composer was starting his campaign of bringing Hebrew music to the attention of serious composers although Bloch disavowed any intent to localize his efforts.

The Ravel "Bolero" which proved one of the outstanding works of the current season when introduced here by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic last November was the concluding number of the evening. Mr. Koussevitsky built up the monotonous rhythm into a veritable tornado of sound.

H. E. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE

Boston Symphony

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy Music last evening. The program ayed was not, in every respect, iat which had been advertised in advance of the occasion, but the alteration enhanced rather than dereased the interest which it held or the audience. Following Haydn's hunting Symphony in D major (B. & H. 31), Mr. Koussewitsky presented not the familiar suite from Strawinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," but Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of a Bach organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, which received its first New York performance in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening.

This was a novelty which, in a sense, was not a novelty, the work (in part) of an arch-modernist, yet othing to offend the conservative astes of the audience which the Institute of Arts and Sciences provides for Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We prefer Mr. Stokowski's Bach transcriptions to those which Schoenberg has given us, though that of the E-flat Prelude and Fugue is not extravagantly, and often beautifully, scored. The audience received it with favor, but was obviously more impressed by Ravel's Bolero, which was heard for the first time in Brooklyn at this concert.

The Bolero is an experiment in form, structure, instrumentation, an exercise of its composer's skill as a craftsman. And as such it is indubitably effective. But it does not wear well. One perceives the trick and how it is done, and loses interest. Those who heard it last evening for the first time will be less impressed when they hear it again.

Mr. Koussewitsky read with spirit and point Haydn's Symphony "With the Horn Call," dealt honestly with the tempi of the four movements, elastically with their rhythms. But both conductor and orchestra were at their best in the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," a rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, in which the solo part was played by Jean Bedetti. This is a fine score, sumptuously caparisoned in the Oriental manner, Mr. Bloch at his best, and it was admirably played last evening by both soloist and orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

68

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Music

By FELIX DEYO

BLOCH'S "SCHELOMO" HEARD FIRST TIME IN BROOKLYN AT KOUSSEVITZKY CONCERT

COMPOSED in 1916 and subsequently played by the foremost orchestras of the countries, Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for Violoncello and Orchestra, last night reached its first Brooklyn hearing, the principal number of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony program at the Academy of Music. Its Manhattan performances have been several. It is a singularly interesting opus. Guido M. Gatti, an outstanding music essayist, has written intimately of this score, and with an acute penetration characteristic of much Italian criticism. So striking his study, which is of date nine years ago ("The Musical Quarterly"), it would seem worth while to repeat a small but vivid part thereof. Writes Signor Gatti (the translation by Dr. Theodore Baker):

"Bloch has reached the perfection of his music with the Hebrew rhapsody for solo and violoncello with orchestra, bearing the name of the great King Schelomo. In this, without taking thought for development and formal consistency, without the fetters of a text requiring interpretation, he has given free course to his fancy; the multiplex figure of the founder of the Great Temple lent itself, after setting it upon a lofty throne and chiseling its lineaments, to the creation of a phantasmagorical entourage of persons and scenes in rapid and kaleidoscopic succession. The violoncello, whose sonorous voice is heard predominant amid a breathless and fateful obscurity throbbing with persistent rhythms, lends itself to a reincarnation of Solomon in all his glory, surrounded by his thousand wives and concubines, with his multitude of slaves and warriors behind him * * * its voice blending in paroxysm of polychromatic tones shot through with silvery clangors and frenzies of exultation," etc., etc.

* * *

THE solo 'cello broods in the mood of disillusion, its commentations emphasizing the famous sentiment of the ancient Preacher—"Vanity, vanity, all is vanity." Perhaps Ernest Bloch felt that these 'cello musings and soliloquizations were such as the great King Solomon might have uttered had he been able to express his thoughts in musical accents of the Twentieth Century. The work is in fantasie vein, though by no means disjointed in form. Its themes, motives and melodies are nebulous, but they are held closely in the pattern of the whole. Not always too conspicuous, their very presence is always felt. Nor is there, as in some of Bloch, an excessive use of dissonance.

The solo part was played last night by Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's first 'cellist. Be it more than understood that the task was great. No timid player dare enter here. The mechanical demands range the full gamut of craftmanship, but are always, when technically encompassed, independent of virtuosic display. The burden of the song is well sustained throughout, phrases piled upon phrases, passages upon passages, in pyramids of song, at times deferring in silence to the large voice of the orchestra. Full-throated indeed, and warm-blooded the tone of Mr. Bedetti, and rich his interpretative comprehension of the music's inner import.

So, too, in poetic concept, was the approach of Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians to this piece—perhaps a masterpiece of Bloch.

* * *

The concert opened with Haydn's salubrious "Horn Call" Symphony and closed with Ravel's tantalizingly provocative "Bolero," introduced to New York earlier in the season by Mr. Toscanini with the Philharmonic. Following the Haydn was Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral version of Bach's E flat prelude and fugue for organ, a veritable tonal temple of magnificent polyphony.

The Boston comes once more this season, on April 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MUSIC

by Charles D. Isaacson

THE passionate Hebraic eloquence of "Schelemo" of Ernest Bloch was given free utterance, in sobbing and almost synagogue-manner by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening. The rich, melancholic grandeur of the story, the magnificence of the music, the fiery, juicy quality of the performance, combined to make of this a milestone in the season's concerts.

Further, the Boston Symphony presented a "Jazz Suite" of Louis Gruenberg, which was neither fish, flesh nor fowl, although it was exceeding dull. Mr. Gruenberg neither knows his jazz nor his concert-type; hence he gives only a musician's impression of tin-pan alley, without a musician's power of higher expression. The Haydn Symphony, with the first use of a horn in the solemn orchestral ranks, was played well, with a few technical encores, and the Schoenberg arrangement of a Bach Prelude and Organ Fugue completed the program.

▼

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Boston Orchestra Offers Sibelius Work Here for First Time

Koussevitzky Leads Sixth Symphony by Finnish Composer in Carnegie Hill

The program of yesterday's fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, offered as its chief feature the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Though this work of the Finnish composer was published seven years ago, and was introduced to Philadelphia in 1926 by Mr. Stokowski, New York had not heard it before yetserday.

In each of Sibelius's last three symphonies there are reminders of Beethoven. The Fifth recalls him by a certain kinship of idea; the Seventh by its use of scales and fragments of scales as thematic material; and in the intervening work, the Sixth, which we heard yesterday, there is again a marked fondness for scales of various character (including the whole-tone scale) as the stuff of thematic structure. One might trace a further relationship with Sibelius's great symphonic predecessor, in the case of this Sixth Symphony, by pointing out that its two middle movements are, as in the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, an Allegretto and a Scherzo.

The first movement begins Allegro moderato, in duple time. There is no key signature. The effect of the opening and closing measures of this movement, in fact, suggests one of the liturgical modes, the Dorian.

The second movement publishes a mood of gentle and melancholy resignation, and again we hear the ubiquitous scales. The Scherzo makes ingenious play with rhythmical devices, and the work ends with an austerely dramatic Finale, in the coda of which the composer presents an imposing restatement of the root idea of the symphony—an exaltation of the diatonic scale and the interval of the third; although the texture of the middle portion of the movement is, by contrast, chromatic.

This symphony exhibits the strong individuality of style and invention which sets the works of Sibelius apart—the highly personal treatment of harmony, melodic structure and instrumental coloring which is typical of his later symphonies in particular. The score has beauty, strength and fascination, and it should be heard again.

The remainder of yesterday's programe comprised the familiar violin concerto of Sibelius, played by Mr. Richard Burgin, a well written and unpretentious "Concerto Grosso in the Old Style" by the Rumanian composer, Filip Lazar, and a repetition of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," introduced at the orchestra's Thursday evening concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 2.30. Soloist, Richard Burgin, violinist.
Concerto Grosso No. 1.....Lazar
Symphony No. 6.....Sibelius
Concerto for Violin, D minor, Op. 47.Sibelius
Mr. Burgin.
Jazz Suite, Op. 28.....Gruenberg

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra devoted half of their matinee yesterday to Sibelius. The Finnish composer "arrived" long ago with musicians, but he is still in need of propaganda as far as the public is concerned. The popularity of "Finlandia," and the "Valse Triste" hardly scratches the surface of his output, although the tone poem and the valse are true inspirations. Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the Sixth Symphony and the practically unknown violin concerto.

Very few good things in music are consistently neglected by instrumentalists, but this violin concerto is an exception. In the old days when difficult and unostentatious compositions for the fiddle were brushed away with the word "ungrateful" it used to be said that the violin concerto of Brahms was written not for but against the instrument—the neglect of the Sibelius would have been excused on the score of its being unviolinistic.

Nowadays nothing is unviolinistic that is good, and the Sibelius concerto is very good. Its themes are distinguished, beautiful and very characteristic of their creator. The composition as a whole has that feeling of autumnal twilight, with flashes of savage energy, which is held to be Sibelius's musical personality, and, strange to say, rightly held.

Richard Burgin, the Boston's concert master, was the soloist in the concerto. Mr. Burgin played well technically, but the music is larger than he made it. Due perhaps to nervousness the violinist's interpretation seemed self-conscious and finicky. Yet it was a capable and often meritorious performance.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon with a first performance of a "Concerto Grosso" by Filip Lazar, a Roumanian composer now residing in Paris. The concerto, in the old style, proved to be in form a clever approximation of an antique manner with a touch of modernity. The largo might have been written by Vivaldi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

NOVELTIES GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays Lazar's "Concerto Grosso" and Sibelius's Sixth Symphony.

NEW MUSIC IS IMPRESSIVE

Composers Presented With Clarity and Eloquence—Brilliant Performance of "Jazz Suite."

By OLIN DOWNES.

Whatever the merits of the respective compositions, two of them played for the first time in this city, the composers represented on the program of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall had their stars to thank that Serge Koussevitsky and his men were the interpreters! Some of the new music impressed well at a first hearing; some did not; but all the composers were presented with a clarity and eloquence worthy of the finest masterpieces.

The new works, for New York, were Filip Lazar's "Concerto Grosso" for orchestra, in the old style and Sibelius's Sixth Symphony. Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" heard here for the first time last Thursday night, was repeated, and given even more brilliant a performance than the first to which we listened. And Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the orchestra, gave a superb performance of the Sibelius concerto which ranks high among the masterpieces of violin literature, although this has yet to be recognized by the great public. For Sibelius, writing concerto or symphony, does not cater to the multitude or to contemporaneous fashion, but speaks from his solitude and his conscience, of things that are deep within.

The violin concerto is at the best an ungrateful work for the soloist performing for the public accustomed to dexterous feats of virtuosity, on the one hand, or the clear and noble classicism of a Bach or Beethoven or Brahms on the other. And the composer has placed a special obstacle before the soloist in the richness, the heaviness and sometimes the poor balances of the dark and sombre orchestration. Nothing in this work makes an immediate appeal, unless it is the broad and melodic slow movement. The rest of the composition is wholly original and without a parallel in the literature of the violin.

There is the orchesta, sullen, brooding, ominous, tragic, with prophecy of war. There is the individual and highly difficult writing for the solo instrument, pitted against the orchestra, which has been likened with such good reason to nature's instrumentation of a tempest. The first movement is as an improvisation, in which, with formal or pompous preluding, the performer begins his haunting song. The cadenzas are not display passages, but continuation of the music of thought. Now there is northern lyricism, a little remindful, in this early work of Sibelius's, of Grieg; now the grim and tragic accents which appertain to Sibelius alone.

The slow movement has the simplicity, the deep sincerity, the broad melodic arch of the composer's early style. The last movement is one wild fantasy, while, over muttering drums and persistent, monotonous rhythmical figures of the strings, the violin becomes a banshee scream in the night wind; and at the last there is a sudden shout of the orchestra, against the skirling chromatic wails of the solo instruments, as though laughter was heard from Walhalla.

It would be hard to give too much praise to Mr. Burgin's reading of this work, and to the masterly feat of Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment, which corrected the composer's heaviness and bad balance of instrumentation, although this necessarily cost the score, in certain places, a little of its salience. This was the finest, the most sympathetic and imaginative performance of the Sibelius violin concerto that the writer has heard.

The first performance of the Sixth Symphony disclosed a remarkable score which, at a first hearing, has some characteristics which are found in many of the late scores of Sibelius, and verge on mannerisms; and other pages, especially those of the last two movements, which again reveal a solitary master, the last of the heroes in music, speaking from his land and his past, with no thought of who may agree or who may hear. In this work, again, Sibelius's singular and individual harmonic scheme is fully revealed, and it is unique for its clarity and its lack of parallel in other music. All of his late works tend to this growing simplicity and concentration, and a scheme of development which he owes to no one but himself. Only the first movement seemed a little weak and redundant. For the rest, it is a symphony to hear often before more detailed comment is hazarded; its greatness is obvious.

The repetition of Mr. Gruenberg's Jazz Suite changed an impression of its first performance, when the first movement seemed most significant. Yesterday the finale appeared stronger. But it is not easy to rank this music with other and better works by the same composer. It appears to us self-consciousness, mannered, spun out of unimportant fragments. The performance was of superlative brilliancy.

The suite of Lazar is admirably made, after old-fashioned formula, with a modern tinge to the harmony. It is entertaining. Whether more than that, an initial hearing hardly determines. It is so well done that it is suspiciously like period furniture put together in a modern factory. But it is good to hear these and other works by contemporaneous composers which Mr. Koussevitsky brings to light. We have to look to him for a real perspective of the field of modern composition.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

68

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Music

By FELIX DEYO

BLOCH'S "SCHELOMO" HEARD FIRST TIME IN BROOKLYN AT KOUSSEVITZKY CONCERT

COMPOSED in 1916 and subsequently played by the foremost orchestras of the countries, Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for Violoncello and Orchestra, last night reached its first Brooklyn hearing, the principal number of Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony program at the Academy of Music. Its Manhattan performances have been several. It is a singularly interesting opus. Guido M. Gatti, an outstanding music essayist, has written intimately of this score, and with an acute penetration characteristic of much Italian criticism. So striking his study, which is of date nine years ago ("The Musical Quarterly"), it would seem worth while to repeat a small but vivid part thereof. Writes Signor Gatti (the translation by Dr. Theodore Baker):

"Bloch has reached the perfection of his music with the Hebrew rhapsody for solo and violoncello with orchestra, bearing the name of the great King Schelomo. In this, without taking thought for development and formal consistency, without the fetters of a text requiring interpretation, he has given free course to his fancy; the multiplex figure of the founder of the Great Temple lent itself, after setting it upon a lofty throne and chiseling its lineaments, to the creation of a phantasmagorical entourage of persons and scenes in rapid and kaleidoscopic succession. The violoncello, whose sonorous voice is heard predominant amid a breathless and fateful obscurity throbbing with persistent rhythms, lends itself to a reincarnation of Solomon in all his glory, surrounded by his thousand wives and concubines, with his multitude of slaves and warriors behind him * * * its voice blending in paroxysm of polychromatic tones shot through with silvery clangors and frenzies of exultation," etc., etc.

* * *

THE solo 'cello broods in the mood of disillusion, its commentations emphasizing the famous sentiment of the ancient Preacher—"Vanity, vanity, all is vanity." Perhaps Ernest Bloch felt that these 'cello musings and soliloquizations were such as the great King Solomon might have uttered had he been able to express his thoughts in musical accents of the Twentieth Century. The work is in fantasie vein, though by no means disjointed in form. Its themes, motives and melodies are nebulous, but they are held closely in the pattern of the whole. Not always too conspicuous, their very presence is always felt. Nor is there, as in some of Bloch, an excessive use of dissonance.

The solo part was played last night by Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's first 'cellist. Be it more than understood that the task was great. No timid player dare enter here. The mechanical demands range the full gamut of craftmanship, but are always, when technically encompassed, independent of virtuosic display. The burden of the song is well sustained throughout, phrases piled upon phrases, passages upon passages, in pyramids of song, at times deferring in silence to the large voice of the orchestra. Full-throated indeed, and warm-blooded the tone of Mr. Bedetti, and rich his interpretative comprehension of the music's inner import.

So, too, in poetic concept, was the approach of Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians to this piece—perhaps masterpiece of Bloch.

* * *

The concert opened with Haydn's salubrious "Horn Call" Symphony and closed with Ravel's tantalizingly provocative "Bolero," introduced to New York earlier in the season by Mr. Toscanini with the Philharmonic. Following the Haydn was Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral version of Bach's E flat prelude and fugue for organ, a veritable tonal temple of magnificent polyphony.

The Boston comes once more this season, on April 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MUSIC

by Charles D. Isaacson

THE passionate Hebraic eloquence of "Schelemo" of Ernest Bloch was given free utterance, in sobbing and almost synagogue-manner by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening. The rich, melancholic grandeur of the story, the magnificence of the music, the fiery, juicy quality of the performance, combined to make of this a milestone in the season's concerts.

Further, the Boston Symphony presented a "Jazz Suite" of Louis Gruenberg, which was neither fish, flesh nor fowl, although it was exceeding dull. Mr. Gruenberg neither knows his jazz nor his concert-type; hence he gives only a musician's impression of tin-pan alley, without a musician's power of higher expression. The Haydn Symphony, with the first use of a horn in the solemn orchestral ranks, was played well, with a few technical encores, and the Schoenberg arrangement of a Bach Prelude and Organ Fugue completed the program.

▼

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Boston Orchestra Offers Sibelius Work Here for First Time

Koussevitzky Leads Sixth Symphony by Finnish Composer in Carnegie Hill

The program of yesterday's fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, offered as its chief feature the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Though this work of the Finnish composer was published seven years ago, and was introduced to Philadelphia in 1926 by Mr. Stokowski, New York had not heard it before yetserday.

In each of Sibelius's last three symphonies there are reminders of Beethoven. The Fifth recalls him by a certain kinship of idea; the Seventh by its use of scales and fragments of scales as thematic material; and in the intervening work, the Sixth, which we heard yesterday, there is again a marked fondness for scales of various character (including the whole-tone scale) as the stuff of thematic structure. One might trace a further relationship with Sibelius's great symphonic predecessor, in the case of this Sixth Symphony, by pointing out that its two middle movements are, as in the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, an Allegretto and a Scherzo.

The first movement begins Allegro moderato, in duple time. There is no key signature. The effect of the opening and closing measures of this movement, in fact, suggests one of the liturgical modes, the Dorian.

The second movement publishes a mood of gentle and melancholy resignation, and again we hear the ubiquitous scales. The Scherzo makes ingenious play with rhythmical devices, and the work ends with an austerely dramatic Finale, in the coda of which the composer presents an imposing restatement of the root idea of the symphony—an exaltation of the diatonic scale and the interval of the third; although the texture of the middle portion of the movement is, by contrast, chromatic.

This symphony exhibits the strong individuality of style and invention which sets the works of Sibelius apart—the highly personal treatment of harmony, melodic structure and instrumental coloring which is typical of his later symphonies in particular. The score has beauty, strength and fascination, and it should be heard again.

The remainder of yesterday's programe comprised the familiar violin concerto of Sibelius, played by Mr. Richard Burgin, a well written and unpretentious "Concerto Grosso in the Old Style" by the Rumanian composer, Filip Lazar, and a repetition of Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite," introduced at the orchestra's Thursday evening concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 2.30. Soloist, Richard Burgin, violinist.
Concerto Grosso No. 1.....Lazar
Symphony No. 6.....Sibelius
Concerto for Violin, D minor, Op. 47.Sibelius
Mr. Burgin.
Jazz Suite, Op. 28.....Gruenberg

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra devoted half of their matinee yesterday to Sibelius. The Finnish composer "arrived" long ago with musicians, but he is still in need of propaganda as far as the public is concerned. The popularity of "Finlandia," and the "Valse Triste" hardly scratches the surface of his output, although the tone poem and the valse are true inspirations. Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the Sixth Symphony and the practically unknown violin concerto.

Very few good things in music are consistently neglected by instrumentalists, but this violin concerto is an exception. In the old days when difficult and unostentatious compositions for the fiddle were brushed away with the word "ungrateful" it used to be said that the violin concerto of Brahms was written not for but against the instrument—the neglect of the Sibelius would have been excused on the score of its being unviolinistic.

Nowadays nothing is unviolinistic that is good, and the Sibelius concerto is very good. Its themes are distinguished, beautiful and very characteristic of their creator. The composition as a whole has that feeling of autumnal twilight, with flashes of savage energy, which is held to be Sibelius's musical personality, and, strange to say, rightly held.

Richard Burgin, the Boston's concert master, was the soloist in the concerto. Mr. Burgin played well technically, but the music is larger than he made it. Due perhaps to nervousness the violinist's interpretation seemed self-conscious and finicky. Yet it was a capable and often meritorious performance.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon with a first performance of a "Concerto Grosso" by Filip Lazar, a Roumanian composer now residing in Paris. The concerto, in the old style, proved to be in form a clever approximation of an antique manner with a touch of modernity. The largo might have been written by Vivaldi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

NOVELTIES GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays Lazar's "Concerto Grosso" and Sibelius's Sixth Symphony.

NEW MUSIC IS IMPRESSIVE

Composers Presented With Clarity and Eloquence—Brilliant Performance of "Jazz Suite."

By OLIN DOWNES.

Whatever the merits of the respective compositions, two of them played for the first time in this city, the composers represented on the program of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall had their stars to thank that Serge Koussevitsky and his men were the interpreters! Some of the new music impressed well at a first hearing; some did not, but all the composers were presented with a clarity and eloquence worthy of the finest masterpieces.

The new works, for New York, were Filip Lazar's "Concerto Grosso" for orchestra, in the old style and Sibelius's Sixth Symphony. Louis Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" heard here for the first time last Thursday night, was repeated, and given even more brilliant a performance than the first to which we listened. And Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the orchestra, gave a superb performance of the Sibelius concerto which ranks high among the masterpieces of violin literature, although this has yet to be recognized by the great public. For Sibelius, writing concerto or symphony, does not cater to the multitude or to contemporaneous fashion, but speaks from his solitude and his conscience, of things that are deep within.

The violin concerto is at the best an ungrateful work for the soloist performing for the public accustomed to dexterous feats of virtuosity, on the one hand, or the clear and noble classicism of a Bach or Beethoven or Brahms on the other. And the composer has placed a special obstacle before the soloist in the richness, the heaviness and sometimes the poor balances of the dark and sombre orchestration. Nothing in this work makes an immediate appeal, unless it is the broad and melodic slow movement. The rest of the composition is wholly original and without a parallel in the literature of the violin.

There is the orchesta, sullen, brooding, ominous, tragic, with prophecy of war. There is the individual and highly difficult writing for the solo instrument, pitted against the orchestra, which has been likened with such good reason to nature's instrumentation of a tempest. The first movement is as an improvisation, in which, with formal or pompous preluding, the performer begins his haunting song. The cadenzas are not display passages, but continuation of the music of thought. Now there is northern lyricism, a little remindful, in this early work of Sibelius's, of Grieg; now the grim and tragic accents which appertain to Sibelius alone.

The slow movement has the simplicity, the deep sincerity, the broad melodic arch of the composer's early style. The last movement is one wild fantasy, while, over muttering drums and persistent, monotonous rhythmical figures of the strings, the violin becomes a banshee scream in the night wind; and at the last there is a sudden shout of the orchestra, against the skirling chromatic wails of the solo instruments, as though laughter was heard from Walhalla.

It would be hard to give too much praise to Mr. Burgin's reading of this work, and to the masterly feat of Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment, which corrected the composer's heaviness and bad balance of instrumentation, although this necessarily cost the score, in certain places, a little of its salience. This was the finest, the most sympathetic and imaginative performance of the Sibelius violin concerto that the writer has heard.

The first performance of the Sixth Symphony disclosed a remarkable score which, at a first hearing, has some characteristics which are found in many of the late scores of Sibelius, and verge on mannerisms; and other pages, especially those of the last two movements, which again reveal a solitary master, the last of the heroes in music, speaking from his land and his past, with no thought of who may agree or who may hear. In this work, again, Sibelius's singular and individual harmonic scheme is fully revealed, and it is unique for its clarity and its lack of parallel in other music. All of his late works tend to this growing simplicity and concentration, and a scheme of development which he owes to no one but himself. Only the first movement seemed a little weak and redundant. For the rest, it is a symphony to hear often before more detailed comment is hazarded; its greatness is obvious.

The repetition of Mr. Gruenberg's Jazz Suite changed an impression of its first performance, when the first movement seemed most significant. Yesterday the finale appeared stronger. But it is not easy to rank this music with other and better works by the same composer. It appears to us self-consciousness, mannered, spun out of unimportant fragments. The performance was of superlative brilliancy.

The suite of Lazar is admirably made, after old-fashioned formula, with a modern tinge to the harmony. It is entertaining. Whether more than that, an initial hearing hardly determines. It is so well done that it is suspiciously like period furniture put together in a modern factory. But it is good to hear these and other works by contemporaneous composers which Mr. Koussevitsky brings to light. We have to look to him for a real perspective of the field of modern composition.

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

TELEPHONE { 4839 / HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO,

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

MAR 1 1930

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

American Jazz Work Acclaimed

At the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 21-22 a signal honor was paid to Louis Gruenberg by Serge Koussevitzky, who played for the second time this season a composition by the American composer. Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Jazz Suite on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in the New York concerts. In the Boston Evening Transcript of Feb. 24, H. T. Parker said: "Mr. Gruenberg's 'Jazz Suite' evaded no listener, 'Fox-trot tempo; Boston Waltz tempo; Blues tempo; One Step tempo'—which is to say 'symphonic jazz' moreover, brought into orchestral being with uncanny skill and abounding resource. At the given moment, in his two pieces heard at Symphony Hall this season, Mr. Gruenberg may have less or more to say, but the pith and point of the saying is above question. Not only does he know his orchestra; collectively and severally he feels it. He lays to it not only a practiced and considering, but an instinctive divining, hand. If there must be some repository for jazz as symphonic speech, then is his 'Jazz Suite' the container.

"The purists—not of symphonic music but of jazz—will make reservations. Mr. Gruenberg (they will say) misses the helter-skelter of its native exuberance; dodges the treacly tunes that often feed it; maybe finds them symphonically unpresentable; tends to refine upon the jazz of even the Whitemanic heydey. None the less, he catches the frenzied note; whips up reiteration until it ceases to be monotony; cloaks harmonic deshabille; softens but little the acrid sensuality; blushes at neither break nor blare. It may be that jazz has known its best days in the concert-hall; that already it is a diminishing influence upon symphonic music. Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Copland may have recovered from its spell; in other directions Mr. Gershwin may be turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself dates his first movement 1925. The more reason that jazz of the concert-hall, as in recent years we have known it, should somewhere be left incarnate. It cries off Mr. Gruenberg's pages accents, timbres, sound, fury, rhythm inexorable. If and when the Boston Orchestra goes on European tour, this 'Jazz Suite' should be indispensable. No other symphony orchestra plays jazz with half its gusto. For his part Dr. Koussevitzky still believes and practices."

Dr. Koussevitzky And "Bolero" Again

YESTERDAY afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth of its concerts in the Tuesday afternoon series. The concert was prefaced by the playing of the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony—of course in memory of William Howard Taft. For the program itself, it included Debussy's orchestral sketches, "The Sea"; Ravel's dance, "Bolero"; Franck's Symphony in D minor.

These Tuesday listeners are, if one mistakes not, the last group of all those who sit before Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to hear the "Bolero." Yesterday again it made its certain and sure effect. The aggravating quiet and monotony of those first repetitions, adding volume too slowly for the average ear, thus creating desire for release long before that release could come; then the piling up of sonority upon sonority, both satisfying and at the same time creating new suspense; the repeated increases, with each of which one felt, "beyond this they cannot possibly go"; finally the dazzling modulation and after it the hard, crashing chords in conclusion; and thereafter the burst of applause, as inevitable as if it were part of the show itself. All took place exactly as it had for all other audiences, exactly as if predestined. One still marvels at the ingenuity of the composer in thus bringing such a stunt to pass. One marvels equally at the unflinching steadiness with which Dr. Koussevitzky keeps that inexorable rhythm, the equal steadiness with which he plans and executes the various stages of the long ascent; and while one is at the marvelling business, one may also, with no less justice, marvel at the steadiness of the snare drummer, maintaining with uncanny evenness that one single rhythm through all those many, many measures. Doubters might well try sometime to tap out, without variation and with perfect evenness, a single figure almost four hundred times. When they have finished they will feel that they have well earned a rest.

Debussy's sketches of the sea seemed to one hearer more delightful than ever. One may well doubt whether the sensitive Debussy ever surpassed this music of the growth of a day on the ocean, of the playfulness of waves large and small, of gusty wind and troubled waters. A Ravel may do a stunt in the development of a series of climaxes, but Debussy also has his series of climaxes in depicting the ever unfolding brightness of the new day in the first sketch, "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean"—and Debussy's climaxes are the purest of pure musical poetry. Again, if ever there was music of pure play, music of pure imagination, music untrammelled and unhedged by convention or formula or preconception, it is the music of the "Frolic of the Waves." Somewhat more realistic Debussy grows with the "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." But never a whit less poetic. For sheer beauty this sea music stands unrivaled. Surely one need say no more in detail of yesterday's version than that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it ideal performance.

Came lastly the symphony of Franck. A labor of love it was with the composer, for he had worked many years on it. It is full of typically "Franckian" aspiration, it contains opportunities for brilliancies less akin to the inner soul of the good old Parisian master. It has been played in or about Boston many times in the last few years. Once again one followed the suavities which may or may not be "spiritual." Once again one ascended heights with Father Franck and Doctor Koussevitzky. Once again one felt the matchless perfections of that matchless middle movement, the increasing brilliance of the finale. And once again one noted how the audience responds to it all. Not Ravel himself, the very Ravel of the "Bolero," drew greater applause than did the unworldly Franck with this symphony with which he had taken so much pains. Not stunts alone have their public.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 12 1930

SEES BUNK IN 'GENIUS'

Igor Stravinsky's View About Orchestra Conductors.

Special Cable Dispatch to THE SUN.
Copyright, 1930, by the New York Sun
Foreign Service.

PRAGUE, March 12.—"There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant-major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual, and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's work."

Thus, said Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out today to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

"This new work," he said, "will be precise, short, concentrated. One doesn't write long and exhaustive orchestral works today. One writes curtly and pointedly, as one speaks. One must live according to one's times. Modern music is very interesting, and one may not agreeably speak ill of one's contemporaries. Therefore, no names. There is still much of romanticism in what is called modern music, however. Everything is not 'of today.' Some who consider themselves originals show how strong a personality Mahler had."

Music in Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth of the Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program comprised Debussy's "Sea Sketches," Ravel's now ubiquitous "Bolero" and Franck's D minor Symphony. Preceding this announced program, the orchestra played part of the slow movement from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in memory of William Howard Taft.

The young people who come in large numbers to the Tuesday concerts must have found much that was enlivening and inspiring. To hear the exquisite finish, the almost-perfection of Debussy's glimmering pieces, descriptive of the sea, is to acquire an immediate admiration for and an understanding of this elusive composer, not easily gained with any other single work of his. And how Dr. Koussevitzky and his men polished and enhanced these orchestral sketches!

Assuredly it is proper that Dr. Koussevitzky should offer to each of his audiences the orchestral novelty of the season, Ravel's "Bolero." The applause at the close of the "Bolero" was prolonged and enthusiastic.

Franck's Symphony is the product of his ripened maturity and wisdom. The material is potent, lending itself well to an intricate and engrossing working out, and the treatment accorded it brings this magnificent symphony into the front ranks of modern compositions. Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky infused it with a warmth and a vibrancy which resulted in a forceful and a brilliant performance.

C. S. B.

"Clo-Clo, ..."

His Highness, the Pri...
Returns from Max...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 12 ...

MUSIC

by Charles D. Isaacson

THE rise of Rav... York performance of a tremendously interesting composition was one of the distinguishing marks of the last Boston Symphony Concert.

The composer, Filip Lazar, a Roumanian, now living in Paris, may count Serge Koussevitzky as his patron saint, for this "Concerto Grosso in the Olden Style," is the third of his works to be given first performances at the hand of Boston's conductor.

It is a work which is as sharp as highly spiced food; the lines of its development are jagged and angular, with the topographic feel of a rocky and forbidding coastal structure. Withal, the thematic material handled in the harmonic architecture of the past, has a character quite its own, and succeeded in playing itself into an utterly individualistic niche of the new music library. There is sure realization that the composer understands his business; he knows how to say something, and then how to develop that material into substantial and well-knit orchestral parlance. The harmonies are transparent though by no means simple.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 10 1930

69

Boston Symphony Gives Novelty

Concerto Grosso in Old Style for Orchestra, by Filip Lazar, Played at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

...rge Koussevitzky made the afternoon concert of the Bos... Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday a pretty ...us session for a matinee audience. There were two com... ...ions of Jan Sibelius, who has not yet become celebrated ...haking light laughter in music. There was also a new ... a concerto grosso in the old style for orchestra by Filip Lazar, a Rumanian, born in 1894, and now living in Paris. This began the concert and Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, heard on Thursday evening ended it. Lazar's concerto grosso was composed last year and came to us early in its travels. It proved to be worth producing and evidently interested its hearers.

Music students know that the concerto grosso, a favorite form of Bach and Handel, project a small group of solo instruments, called the concertino, against the whole orchestral body, named the tutti. Mr. Lazar was not at all set in his method, but employed more than one small group. By this plan he achieved a pleasing variety and gave his wind instruments some important duties. His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked sometimes on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of the fathers.

His melodic subjects were sharp... outlined and had dignified characte... In its complete development the com... position showed high organizatio... The melodic ideas were clearly r... lated and the progress of the mus... cian's thought toward the goal of h... finale was well marked. The co... certo grosso form has found fav... with several composers of our tim... and with good reason. It gives th... composer much freedom and permi... of many and varied instrumental e... fects without demanding a huge o... chestra. Mr. Lazar's composition ... very pleasing work and its aim ... quite high enough for the possibil... ties of the form.

The solo performer in the Sibeliu... violin concerto was Richard Burgi... the concert master of the orchestr... Maud Powell introduced the work a... a Philharmonic concert in 1906. Thi... chronicler has heard it several time... since that, but has not radicall... changed his views about it. First o... all it is abominably difficult. Se... ond, it is deeply introspective excep... in the last movement, which has ... splendid vivacity and unquestionabl... force. Third, it is full of the sombe... feeling which is found in so much o... the music of Sibelius. The worl... must appeal more directly to violin... ists and musicians in general than t... audiences. The hearers of Saturda... gave Mr. Burgin much applause ... which he earned. He played wel... and with a beautiful devotion to th... music.

...ibelius composition wa...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
MAR 2 ...

Stravinsky Likes Band Conductors

Prague — (CPA) — "There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's works."

Thus Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out yesterday to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boston symphony orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST
MAR 10 1930

Music

Friends of Music Sing "St. John ...—Koussevitzky Gi...

REPEATING only the Jazz Suite of Louis Gruenberg from the Thursday night concert, the Boston Symphony introduced a freshly spun Concerto Grosso by Filip Lazar, Rumanian by birth and Parisian by adoption, together with a Symphony by Sibelius (the Sixth) which in some manner had escaped previous performance in New York, and called back to currency the Violin Concerto by that celebrated son of Finland, in his Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday.

Mr. Lazar's music was an able imitation of far sturdier models, written, as he had designated, "in the old style." It had the dignity of its form, its material was agreeable and its construction skilled. But it was dwarfed by the Sibelius works, neither of which was content with these qualities, much less that of imitation.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the Concerto with a grasp of its content that went beyond sound technical achievement of its manifest difficulties. This was not sensuous or skyrocketing music, and it demanded of its executant neither emotional abandon nor virtuosic glitter. It required musicianship of a higher order, the while it made no compromises with fingers or bow. The soloist met its needs with a completeness that made an open book of a work whose beauties were not of the more obvious order.

The Symphony had an invigorating directness, and certainly was not to be turned from as of that dour visage so often imputed to Sibelius and his music. Its bold employment of thirds and of scale passages might have seemed even a little naive in a lesser man. But the composer's harmonic individuality, the strength and solidity of his structure, the clarity of his voices, his freedom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which the several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were never more evident than in this work.

Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well. Sibelius in the past has suffered from too infrequent performance in New York; audiences have had too little opportunity to distinguish between his works, and even among those who have most admired them it is not surprising to find some confusion as which is which among the symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky could do a service by repeating this work in New York next season. All this music, including Mr. Gruenberg's innocuously deft jazz, was superbly played.

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { HARRISON 4839 / 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

American Jazz Work Acc[illegible]

At the Boston concerts of the Orchestra, Feb. 21-22 a signe[illegible] Gruenberg by Serge K[illegible] second time this composer on T[illegible]

Radio Singer to Make Stage Debut

Genia Zielinska, prima donna of the National Broadcasting Grand Opera Co., makes her stage debut in New York in a Polish Grand Opera by Stanislaw Moniuszko. "Halka," the opera in which Miss Zielinska will be starred is the best known of Polish operas. It depicts [illegible] Polish dances [illegible]; Boston Waltz [illegible] tempo'—which is to [illegible] skill and abounding resource. At [illegible]ment, in his two pieces heard at Symphony [illegible]s season, Mr. Gruenberg may have less or more to say, but the pith and point of the saying is above question. Not only does he know his orchestra; collectively and severally he feels it. He lays to it not only a practiced and considering, but an instinctive divining, hand. If there must be some repository for jazz as symphonic speech, then is his 'Jazz Suite' the container.

"The purists—not of symphonic music but of jazz—will make reservations. Mr. Gruenberg (they will say) misses the helter-skelter of its native exuberance; dodges the treacly tunes that often feed it; maybe finds them symphonically unpresentable; tends to refine upon the jazz of even the Whitemanic heydey. None the less, he catches the frenzied note; whips up reiteration until it ceases to be monotony; cloaks harmonic deshabille; softens but little the acrid sensuality; blushes at neither break nor blare. It may be that jazz has known its best days in the concert-hall; that already it is a diminishing influence upon symphonic music. Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Copland may have recovered from its spell; in other directions Mr. Gershwin may be turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself dates his first movement 1925. The more reason that jazz of the concert-hall, as in recent years

Music in Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth of the Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program comprised Debussy's "Sea Sketches," Ravel's now ubiquitous "Bolero" and Franck's D minor Symphony. Preceding this announced program, the orchestra played part of the slow movement from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in memory of William Howard Taft.

The young people who come in large numbers to the Tuesday concerts must have found much that was enlivening and inspiring. To hear the exquisite finish, the almost-perfection of Debussy's glimmering pieces, descriptive of the sea, is to acquire an immediate admiration for and an understanding of this elusive composer, not easily gained with any other single work of his. And how Dr. Koussevitzky and his men polished and enhanced these orchestral sketches!

Assuredly it is proper that Dr. Koussevitzky should offer to each of his audiences the orchestral novelty of the season, Ravel's "Bolero." The applause at the close of the "Bolero" was prolonged and enthusiastic.

Franck's Symphony is the product of his ripened maturity and wisdom. The material is potent, lending itself well to an intricate and engrossing working out, and the treatment accorded it brings this magnificent symphony into the front ranks of modern compositions. Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky infused it with a warmth and a vibrancy which resulted in a forceful and a brilliant performance.

C. S. B.

Dr. Koussevitzky And "Bolero" Again

YESTERDAY afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth of its concerts in the Tuesday afternoon series. The concert was prefaced by the playing of the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony—of course in memory of William Howard Taft. For the program itself, it included Debussy's orchestral sketches, "The Sea"; Ravel's dance, "Bolero"; Franck's Symphony in D minor.

These Tuesday listeners are, if one mistakes not, the last group of all those who sit before Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to hear the "Bolero." Yesterday again it made its certain and sure effect. The aggravating quiet and monotony of those first repetitions, adding volume too slowly for the average ear, thus creating desire for release long before that release could come; then the piling up of sonority upon sonority, both satisfying and at the same time creating new suspense; the repeated increases, with each of which one felt, "beyond this they cannot possibly go"; finally the dazzling modulation and after it the hard, crashing chords in conclusion; and thereafter the burst of applause, as inevitable as if it were part of the show itself. All took place exactly as it had for all other audiences, exactly as if predestined. One still marvels at the ingenuity of the composer in thus bringing such a stunt to pass. One marvels equally at the unflinching steadiness with which Dr. Koussevitzky keeps that inexorable rhythm, the equal steadiness with which he plans and executes the various stages of the long ascent; and while one is at the marvelling business, one may also, with no less justice, marvel at the steadiness of the snare drummer, maintaining with uncanny evenness that one single rhythm through all those many, many measures. Doubters might well try sometime to tap out, without variation and with perfect evenness, a single figure almost four hundred times. When they have finished they will feel that they have well earned a rest.

Debussy's sketches of the sea seemed to one hearer more delightful than ever. One may well doubt whether the sensitive Debussy ever surpassed this music of the growth of a day on the ocean, of the playfulness of waves large and small, of gusty wind and troubled waters. A Ravel may do a stunt in the development of a series of climaxes, but Debussy also has his series of climaxes in depicting the ever unfolding brightness of the new day in the first sketch, "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean"—and Debussy's climaxes are the purest of pure musical poetry. Again, if ever there was music of pure play, music of pure imagination, music untrammelled and unhedged by convention or formula or preconception, it is the music of the "Frolic of the Waves." Somewhat more realistic Debussy grows with the "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." But never a whit less poetic. For sheer beauty this sea music stands unrivaled. Surely one need say no more in detail of yesterday's version than that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it ideal performance.

Came lastly the symphony of Franck. A labor of love it was with the composer, for he had worked many years on it. It is full of typically "Franckian" aspiration, it contains opportunities for brilliancies less akin to the inner soul of the good old Parisian master. It has been played in or about Boston many times in the last few years. Once again one followed the suavities which may or may not be "spiritual." Once again one ascended heights with Father Franck and Doctor Koussevitzky. Once again one felt the matchless perfections of that matchless middle movement, the increasing brilliance of the finale. And once again one noted how the audience responds to it all. Not Ravel himself, the very Ravel of the "Bolero," drew greater applause than did the unworldly Franck with this symphony with which he had taken so much pains. Not stunts alone have their public.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

SEES BUNK IN 'GENIUS'

Igor Stravinsky's View About Orchestra Conductors.

Special Cable Dispatch to THE SUN.
Copyright, 1930, by the New York Sun
Foreign Service.

PRAGUE, March 12.—"There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant-major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual, and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's work."

Thus, said Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out today to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

"This new work," he said, "will be precise, short, concentrated. One doesn't write long and exhaustive orchestral works today. One writes curtly and pointedly, as one speaks. One must live according to one's times. Modern music is very interesting, and one may not agreeably speak ill of one's contemporaries. Therefore, no names. There is still much of romanticism in what is called modern music, however. Everything is not 'of today.' Some who consider themselves originals show how strong a personality Mahler had."

"Clo-Clo, [illegible]

His Highness, the Pri[illegible] Returns from Max[illegible]

[illegible] actor, a heavy n[illegible] be restored, ha[illegible]n, an[illegible] Jannings eve[illegible]ample [illegible] mobile minus h[illegible]ally s[illegible] buttons. His [illegible]hat, c[illegible] foo[illegible] injured.

He was sched[illegible]d to [illegible] York pe[illegible]w[illegible] ance of a tremendously interesting composition was one of the distinguishing marks of the last Boston Symphony Concert.

The composer, Filip Lazar, a Roumanian, now living in Paris, may count Serge Koussevitzky as his patron saint, for this "Concerto Grosso in the Olden Style," is the third of his works to be given first performances at the hand of Boston's conductor.

It is a work which is as sharply as highly spiced food; the lines of its development are jagged and angular, with the topographic feel of a rocky and forbidding coastal structure. Withal, the thematic material handled in the harmonic architecture of the past, has a character quite its own, and succeeded in playing itself into an utterly individualistic niche of the new music library. There is sure realization that the composer understands his business; he knows how to say something, and then how to develop that material into substantial and well-knit orchestral parlance. The harmonies are transparent though by no means simple.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

69

Boston Symphony Gives Novelty

Concerto Grosso in Old Style for Orchestra, by Filip Lazar, Played at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky made the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday a pretty serious session for a matinee audience. There were two compositions of Jan Sibelius, who has not yet become celebrated for making light laughter in music. There was also a new work, a concerto grosso in the old style for orchestra by Filip Lazar, a Rumanian, born in 1894, and now living in Paris. This began the concert and Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, heard on Thursday evening ended it. Lazar's concerto grosso was composed last year and came to us early in its travels. It proved to be worth producing and evidently interested its hearers.

Music students know that the concerto grosso, a favorite form of Bach and Handel, project a small group of solo instruments, called the concertino, against the whole orchestral body, named the tutti. Mr. Lazar was not at all set in his method, but employed more than one small group. By this plan he achieved a pleasing variety and gave his wind instruments some important duties. His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked sometimes on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of the fathers.

His melodic subjects were sharply outlined and had dignified characte[illegible] In its complete development the com[illegible] position showed high organizatio[illegible] The melodic ideas were clearly r[illegible] lated and the progress of the mus[illegible] cian's thought toward the goal of h[illegible] finale was well marked. The co[illegible] certo grosso form has found fav[illegible] with several composers of our tim[illegible] and with good reason. It gives th[illegible] composer much freedom and permit[illegible] of many and varied instrumental e[illegible] fects without demanding a huge o[illegible] chestra. Mr. Lazar's composition [illegible] a very pleasing work and its aim [illegible] quite high enough for the possibil[illegible] ties of the form.

The solo performer in the Sibeliu[illegible] violin concerto was Richard Burgin [illegible] the concert master of the orchestra [illegible] Maud Powell introduced the work a[illegible] a Philharmonic concert in 1906. Thi[illegible] chronicler has heard it several time[illegible] since that, but has not radicall[illegible] changed his views about it. First o[illegible] all it is abominably difficult. Sec[illegible] ond, it is deeply introspective excep[illegible] in the last movement, which has [illegible] splendid vivacity and unquestionabl[illegible] force. Third, it is full of the sombe[illegible] feeling which is found in so much o[illegible] the music of Sibelius. The work must appeal more directly to violinists and musicians in general than t[illegible] audiences. The hearers of Saturday gave Mr. Burgin much applause which he earned. He played wel[illegible] and with a beautiful devotion to th[illegible] music.

The other Sibelius composition wa[illegible] his sixth symphony, which followe[illegible] the intermission. Mr. Gruenberg' jazz was offered as a dessert afte[illegible] the feast. The symphony, which wa[illegible] new to this city, made itself known as a work calling for serious consideration. It is not a composition t[illegible] be dismissed after a single hearin[illegible] and comment on it must be deferred

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music :

Friends of Music Sing "St. John [illegible] —Koussevitzky Giv[illegible]

REPEATING only the Jazz Suite of Louis Gruenberg from the Thursday night concert, the Boston Symphony introduced a freshly spun Concerto Grosso by Filip Lazar, Rumanian by birth and Parisian by adoption, together with a Symphony by Sibelius (the Sixth) which in some manner had escaped previous performance in New York, and called back to currency the Violin Concerto by that celebrated son of Finland, in its Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday.

Mr. Lazar's music was an able imitation of far sturdier models, written, as he had designated, "in the old style." It had the dignity of its form, its material was agreeable and its construction skilled. But it was dwarfed by the Sibelius works, neither of which was content with these qualities, much less that of imitation.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the Concerto with a grasp of its content that went beyond sound technical achievement of its manifest difficulties. This was not sensuous or skyrocketing music, and it demanded of its executant neither emotional abandon nor virtuosic glitter. It required musicianship of a higher order, the while it made no compromises with fingers or bow. The soloist met its needs with a completeness that made an open book of a work whose beauties were not of the more obvious order.

The Symphony had an invigorating directness, and certainly was not to be turned from as of that dour visage so often imputed to Sibelius and his music. Its bold employment of thirds and of scale passages might have seemed even a little naive in a lesser man. But the composer's harmonic individuality, the strength and solidity of his structure, the clarity of his voices, his freedom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which the several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were never more evident than in this work.

Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well. Sibelius in the past has suffered from too infrequent performance in New York; audiences have had too little opportunity to distinguish between his works; and even among those who have most admired them it is not surprising to find some confusion as which is which among the symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky could do a service by repeating this work in New York next season. All this music, including Mr. Gruenberg's innocuously deft jazz, was superbly played.

Stravinsky Likes Band Conductors

Prague—(CPA)—"There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's works."

Thus Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out yesterday to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boston symphony orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

American Jazz Work Acc[illegible]

At the Boston concerts of the Orchestra, Feb. 21-22 a signa[illegible] Gruenberg by Serge K[illegible] second time this composer on T[illegible]

Radio Singer to Make Stage Debut

Genia Zielinska, prima donna of the National Broadcasting Grand Opera Co., makes her stage debut in New York in a Polish Grand Opera by Stanislaw Moniuszko. "Halka," the opera in which Miss Zielinska will be starred is the best known of Polish operas. It depicts [illegible]'s 'Jazz [illegible]ment, in his two pieces heard at Symphony H[illegible] season, Mr. Gruenberg may have less or more to say, but the pith and point of the saying is above question. Not only does he know his orchestra: collectively and severally he feels it. He lays to it not only a practiced and considering, but an instinctive divining, hand. If there must be some repository for jazz as symphonic speech, then is his 'Jazz Suite' the container.

"The purists—not of symphonic music but of jazz—will make reservations. Mr. Gruenberg (they will say) misses the helter-skelter of its native exuberance; dodges the treacly tunes that often feed it; maybe finds them symphonically unpresentable; tends to refine upon the jazz of even the Whitemanic heydey. None the less, he catches the frenzied note; whips up reiteration until it ceases to be monotony; cloaks harmonic deshabille; softens but little the acrid sensuality; blushes at neither break nor blare. It may be that jazz has known its best days in the concert-hall; that already it is a diminishing influence upon symphonic music. Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Copland may have recovered from its spell; in other directions Mr. Gershwin may be turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself dates his first movement 1925. The more reason that jazz of the concert-hall, as in recent years

Music in Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth of the Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program comprised Debussy's "Sea Sketches," Ravel's now ubiquitous "Bolero" and Franck's D minor Symphony. Preceding this announced program, the orchestra played part of the slow movement from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in memory of William Howard Taft.

The young people who come in large numbers to the Tuesday concerts must have found much that was enlivening and inspiring. To hear the exquisite finish, the almost-perfection of Debussy's glimmering pieces, descriptive of the sea, is to acquire an immediate admiration for and an understanding of this elusive composer, not easily gained with any other single work of his. And how Dr. Koussevitzky and his men polished and enhanced these orchestral sketches!

Assuredly it is proper that Dr. Koussevitzky should offer to each of his audiences the orchestral novelty of the season, Ravel's "Bolero." The applause at the close of the "Bolero" was prolonged and enthusiastic.

Franck's Symphony is the product of his ripened maturity and wisdom. The material is potent, lending itself well to an intricate and engrossing working out, and the treatment accorded it brings this magnificent symphony into the front ranks of modern compositions. Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky infused it with a warmth and a vibrancy which resulted in a forceful and a brilliant performance.

C. S. B.

Dr. Koussevitzky And "Bolero" Again

YESTERDAY afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth of its concerts in the Tuesday afternoon series. The concert was prefaced by the playing of the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony—of course in memory of William Howard Taft. For the program itself, it included Debussy's orchestral sketches, "The Sea"; Ravel's dance, "Bolero"; Franck's Symphony in D minor.

These Tuesday listeners are, if one mistakes not, the last group of all those who sit before Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to hear the "Bolero." Yesterday again it made its certain and sure effect. The aggravating quiet and monotony of those first repetitions, adding volume too slowly for the average ear, thus creating desire for release long before that release could come; then the piling up of sonority upon sonority, both satisfying and at the same time creating new suspense; the repeated increases, with each of which one felt, "beyond this they cannot possibly go"; finally the dazzling modulation and after it the hard, crashing chords in conclusion; and thereafter the burst of applause, as inevitable as if it were part of the show itself. All took place exactly as it had for all other audiences, exactly as if predestined. One still marvels at the ingenuity of the composer in thus bringing such a stunt to pass. One marvels equally at the unflinching steadiness with which Dr. Koussevitzky keeps that inexorable rhythm, the equal steadiness with which he plans and executes the various stages of the long ascent; and while one is at the marvelling business, one may also, with no less justice, marvel at the steadiness of the snare drummer, maintaining with uncanny evenness that one single rhythm through all those many, many measures. Doubters might well try sometime to tap out, without variation and with perfect evenness, a single figure almost four hundred times. When they have finished they will feel that they have well earned a rest.

Debussy's sketches of the sea seemed to one hearer more delightful than ever. One may well doubt whether the sensitive Debussy ever surpassed this music of the growth of a day on the ocean, of the playfulness of waves large and small, of gusty wind and troubled waters. A Ravel may do a stunt in the development of a series of climaxes, but Debussy also has his series of climaxes in depicting the ever unfolding brightness of the new day in the first sketch, "From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean"—and Debussy's climaxes are the purest of pure musical poetry. Again, if ever there was music of pure play, music of pure imagination, music untrammelled and unhedged by convention or formula or preconception, it is the music of the "Frolic of the Waves." Somewhat more realistic Debussy grows with the "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." But never a whit less poetic. For sheer beauty this sea music stands unrivaled. Surely one need say no more in detail of yesterday's version than that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it ideal performance.

"Clo-Clo, [illegible]

His Highness, the Pri[illegible]
Returns from Max[illegible]

Came lastly the symphony of Franck A labor of love it was with the composer, for he had worked many years o[illegible] it. It is full of typically "Franckian" aspiration, it contains opportunities fo[illegible] brilliancies less akin to the inner soul o[illegible] the good old Parisian master. It has been played in or about Boston many times in the last few years. Once again one followed the suavities which may o[illegible] may not be "spiritual." Once again one ascended heights with Father Franck and Doctor Koussevitzky. Once again one felt the matchless perfections of that matchless middle movement, the increasing brilliance of the finale. And once again one noted how the audience responds to it all. Not Ravel himself, the very Ravel of the "Bolero," drew greater applause than did the unworldly Franck with this symphony with which he had taken so much pains. Not stunts alone have their public.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

SEES BUNK IN 'GENIUS'

Igor Stravinsky's View About Orchestra Conductors.

Special Cable Dispatch to THE SUN.
Copyright, 1930, by the New York Sun
Foreign Service.

PRAGUE, March 12.—"There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant-major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual, and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's work."

Thus, said Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out today to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

"This new work," he said, "will be precise, short, concentrated. One doesn't write long and exhaustive orchestral works today. One writes curtly and pointedly, as one speaks. One must live according to one's times. Modern music is very interesting, and one may not agreeably speak ill of one's contemporaries. Therefore, no names. There is still much of romanticism in what is called modern music, however. Everything is not 'of today.' Some who consider themselves originals show how strong a personality Mahler had."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

M[illegible]

[illegible]his face with him. [illegible]se he was [illegible]old Rosen-

[illegible]ng a gory [illegible] and to make [illegible] tremendously interesting composition was one of the distinguishing marks of the last Boston Symphony Concert.

[illegible]actor, a heavy [illegible], and be restored, had ample [illegible] Jannings eve[illegible]ally s[illegible] mobile minus h[illegible]at, [illegible] buttons. His [illegible] foot injured.

He was sched[illegible] to [illegible] Volks Theater per[illegible]

The composer, Filip Lazar, a Roumanian, now living in Paris, may count Serge Koussevitzky as his patron saint, for this "Concerto Grosso in the Olden Style," is the third of his works to be given first performances at the hand of Boston's conductor.

It is a work which is as sharply as highly spiced food; the lines of its development are jagged and angular, with the topographic feel of a rocky and forbidding coastal structure. Withal, the thematic material handled in the harmonic [illegible] architecture of the past, has a character quite its own, and succeeded in playing itself into an utterly individualistic niche of the new music library. There is sure realization that the composer understands his business; he knows how to say something, and then how to develop that material into substantial and well-knit orchestral parlance. The harmonies are transparent though by no means simple.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

69

Boston Symphony Gives Novelty

Concerto Grosso in Old Style for Orchestra, by Filip Lazar, Played at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky made the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday a pretty serious session for a matinee audience. There were two compositions of Jan Sibelius, who has not yet become celebrated for making light laughter in music. There was also a new work, a concerto grosso in the old style for orchestra by Filip Lazar, a Rumanian, born in 1894, and now living in Paris. This began the concert and Gruenberg's Jazz Suite, heard on Thursday evening ended it. Lazar's concerto grosso was composed last year and came to us early in its travels. It proved to be worth producing and evidently interested its hearers.

Music students know that the concerto grosso, a favorite form of Bach and Handel, project a small group of solo instruments, called the concertino, against the whole orchestral body, named the tutti. Mr. Lazar was not at all set in his method, but employed more than one small group. By this plan he achieved a pleasing variety and gave his wind instruments some important duties. His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked sometimes on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of the fathers.

His melodic subjects were sharply outlined and had dignified character. In its complete development the composition showed high organization. The melodic ideas were clearly related and the progress of the musician's thought toward the goal of his finale was well marked. The concerto grosso form has found favor with several composers of our time and with good reason. It gives the composer much freedom and permits of many and varied instrumental effects without demanding a huge orchestra. Mr. Lazar's composition is a very pleasing work and its aim is quite high enough for the possibilities of the form.

The solo performer in the Sibelius violin concerto was Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra. Maud Powell introduced the work at a Philharmonic concert in 1906. This chronicler has heard it several times since that, but has not radically changed his views about it. First of all it is abominably difficult. Second, it is deeply introspective, except in the last movement, which has a splendid vivacity and unquestionable force. Third, it is full of the somber feeling which is found in so much of the music of Sibelius. The work must appeal more directly to violinists and musicians in general than to audiences. The hearers of Saturday gave Mr. Burgin much applause which he earned. He played well and with a beautiful devotion to the music.

The other Sibelius composition was his sixth symphony, which followed the intermission. Mr. Gruenberg's jazz was offered as a dessert after the feast. The symphony, which was new to this city, made itself known as a work calling for serious consideration. It is not a composition to be dismissed after a single hearing and comment on it must be deferred

Stravinsky Likes Band Conductors

Prague — (CPA) — "There is a good deal of nonsense about the 'genius' of orchestra conductors throughout the world today. For me the best conductor is the sergeant major of a military band. He sticks close to orders, is always punctual and is not temperamental in his interpretation of a composer's works."

Thus Igor Stravinsky, the Russian composer, who between concert appearances and his own composition work, took time out yesterday to give an interview on what he thinks of modern music and orchestra conductors.

Stravinsky is at the moment rather deep in a new work, which will be a symphony scheduled to be played for the first time in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boston symphony orchestra. It is a symphony ordered for the jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music :

Friends of Music Sing "St. John [illegible] —Koussevitzky Giv[illegible]

THA[illegible] looking time ankees. s[illegible]es are was p[illegible]uppert escape[illegible]all of of an [illegible] that into th[illegible] the lea[illegible] Big years, [illegible]bles" so dep[illegible] enny assem[illegible] third score. [illegible]ues- eral [illegible]hing. stance[illegible]hers these [illegible]anks ending will were, tell Mari[illegible]ew- Eisle[illegible] menti[illegible]er- [illegible]ack [illegible]bly worth[illegible] are sound[illegible] or encol[illegible]ri- smow[illegible] their[illegible]r- ineffe[illegible]t- and[illegible]a to un[illegible] ance[illegible]

In the [illegible] mel[illegible] "Mo[illegible] Sch[illegible] bea[illegible] tim[illegible] is [illegible] mo[illegible] ful[illegible] nin[illegible] ba[illegible] fo[illegible] de[illegible]

the Jazz Suite of [illegible]erg from the Thurs- [illegible] the Boston Sym- [illegible] freshly spun Con- [illegible]lip Lazar, Rumanian [illegible]ian by adoption, to- [illegible]mphony by Sibelius in some manner had performance in New back to currency the [illegible]oy that celebrated son [illegible]s Carnegie Hall con-

[illegible]usic was an able imita- [illegible]dier models, written, as [illegible]ted, "in the old style." [illegible]ity of its form, its ma- [illegible]eable and its construc- [illegible]ut it was dwarfed by the [illegible]s, neither of which was these qualities, much less [illegible]ion.

[illegible]rgin, concertmaster of the [illegible]ayed the Concerto with a content that went beyond [illegible]nical achievement of its [illegible]fficulties. This was not skyrocketing music, and it [illegible]f its executant neither emo- [illegible]don nor virtuosic glitter. It [illegible]usicianship of a higher order, it made no compromises with bow. The soloist met its [illegible]h a completeness that made book of a work whose beauties of the more obvious order.

[illegible]ymphony had an invigorating [illegible]ss, and certainly was not to be from as of that dour visage so [illegible]mputed to Sibelius and his mu- [illegible]s bold employment of thirds and [illegible]le passages might have seemed a little naive in a lesser man. But composer's harmonic individuality, strength and solidity of his struc- , the clarity of his voices, his free- dom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which the several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were never more evident than in this work.

Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well. Sibelius in the past has suffered from too infrequent performance in New York; audiences have had too little opportunity to distinguish between his works, and even among those who have most admired them it is not surprising to find some confusion as which is which among the symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky could do a service by repeating this work in New York next season. All this music, including Mr. Gruenberg's innocuously deft jazz, was superbly played.

70

Assyrian Reliefs, Parisian's Music

Trans. March 13

TO the Symphony Concerts of this week Dr. Koussevitzky introduces another new work, and with it a young composer as yet unheard in these parts. The composer is Henri Martelli and his piece is entitled "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," Mr. Martelli was born in 1895 at Bastia, a seaport town on the north-eastern coast of the island of Corsica. He went to Paris to the Conservatory in 1912. His teachers in harmony, counterpoint, fugue and composition were Jules Moquet and Charles-Marie Widor. His own introduction of himself stretches no further.

All manner of subjects have attracted composers as sources of suggestion for their music: poetry, of course; pictures occasionally, as for example Boecklin's "Isle of the Dead." Some of the modernists, as Stravinsky or Prokofiev, have also gone back to primtive days in the existence of mankind for material for musical treatment. One does not recall another case, however, in which a composer bases his music on primtive art. Mr. Martelli, in his "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," has in mind three definite fragments of ancient Assyrian sculpture in the Louvre.

I. "Génie ailé a têt d'aigle devant la plante sacrée," (Modéré). King Ashurnasir-pal, who reigned over Assyria from 884-860 B. C., built many palaces notably the palace of Nimrod at ancient Kalakh. Here was discovered, among others, a bas-relief representing a "genius" with the two wings and the head of an eagle. The relief relates also to the cult of the sacred tree. A picture of the fragment discloses a creature with legs, trunk and arms human. The head and wings are those of a large bird with a huge beak. This 'genius" is standing upright; its left hand holds an object which may possibly be a pail. Before it one sees an arrangement of standards and groupings of leaves which might conceivably represent a highly conventionalized tree, but which, more likely, pictures a vine supported by a pillar. The right arm of the hybrid being is extended as if in the act of plucking the single bunch of grapes (?) which the vine or branch supports.

Assyric Relief

II. Dause. (Modérémentanimé). The composer furnishes neither programmatic

SYMPHONY IN ONLY THREE NUMBERS

Amer. Trans. March 13

By MOSES SMITH

THE program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is overweighted at the bottom. Although the list includes only three pieces, and takes a bare hour and a half for performance, almost an hour of this time is consumed by the last number, Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, which Boston first heard a little more than four years ago.

The novelty—and what is a Boston Symphony program without a novelty?—is a piece called "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" by one Henri Martelli, contemporary Parisian composer. He is inspired by four bas-reliefs, which have come down to modern times and which are said to have adorned Assyrian royal halls. They give the titles, and presumably furnish mood and program, for the four parts of this composition: "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle Before the Sacred Tree," "Dance," "Lion and Lioness in their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

Perhaps with photographs of these reliefs furnished them, the listeners might have ben able to make something out of Martelli's music. As it was they were mystified—and so, let us hasten to add, were we. Our objection is not to the noisiness of the score, for modern ears have become long-suffering. But this noise is not music. It is an ineffectual substitute for the one thing that vitalizes music—original, forceful ideas. Not all the orchestral skill, rhythmic devices, or various tricks of the trade can compensate for this lack.

Strauss' lengthy tonal discourse on a mountain-climb is amazingly uneven music. Some of it is the great Strauss inheritor of the robe of the great line of German composers. Much of it is the turgid bombast of an absurdly inflated orchestra, or inconsequential padding. Yet it is good to hear for what it contains of the great Strauss, who is often a quiet Strauss. When he puffs loudest, as in the storm, he succeeds merely in being boresome.

The opening number is Maximilian Steinberg's free version of a sonata in G major by Galliard. The performances of the various pieces by Mr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra are less effective than usually.

suggestion nor reference to any particular bas-relief.

III. "Lion et lionne dans leur repaire." (Lent). This bas-relief, which dates from the time of Ashur-bani-pal (King of Assyria 668-626 B. C.), was part of the scultural decoration of the palace of Kouyoundjick of ancient Niniveh. It represents a lioness stretched out full length at the foot of a tree. A lion with a very long mane stands erect before her. The fragment is broken in such a way that the head of the lion cannot be seen.

IV. "L'armée d'Assourbanipal et ses Musiciens." (Animé). This bas-relief is part of the decoration of the same palace at Nineveh. There are four rows of characters above each other. At bottom, a single warrior on horseback, possibly the great king himself? In the row above, four figures with various implements of war, one on horseback. In the third row are two horses and the groom (?) at the right, four musicians with cymbals and harps at the left. The upper row shows a procession of nine musicians, probably pictured in the act of singing.

Mr. Martelli's orchestra is the large modern orchestra and the idiom a modern chromatic idiom. The first "relief" is rather fully orchestrated and curiously wrought. The second is lighter, with graceful solo-passages in wind instruments and strings, mainly indicating rhythmic figures. The third, of the two lions, is full of growlings and rumblings and snarlings in low voiced instruments. There is even a solo for tuba. Mr. Martelli has apparently chosen to treat his subject realistically. The last "relief", by far the longest of the four, is cast into three divisions, the third a repetition of the first, and both brilliantly scored and aggressively rhythmed. A middle section, by way of contrast, abounds in subtle and graceful effects. The dance-spirit prevails.

A. H. M.

Beethoven f...

, MARCH 15, 1930

Mon. Trans.

concert its first performance in the United States. It is a symphonic suite in four parts, each inspired, the composer said in a program note, by a bas-relief with a particular subject. The pictures here musically translated represent "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle before the Sacred Tree," "A Dance before a Personage Seated," "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

Henri Martelli was born in Corsica 35 years ago and lives in Paris, where he received his musical education and where he has had other works produced. If the present suite could have been heard 20 years ago it might have made a greater impression, but in that time Stravinsky and Prokofieff have made it difficult to appreciate other composers' efforts to depict prehistoric or early historical periods. Nor does the translation of pictures into tone justify itself in this instance. It is well known that one of the characteristics of the music of the East is monotony. This quality the composer has succeeded in preserving. The third movement gives opportunity for a solo number with the bass tuba in the role of the lion. This is by no means a fearsome beast, but rather an amiable, Shavian creature. Both the army and the musicians of the Great King were equally tame. Possibly the composer intended to be ironical about these ancient times.

Nor was there much to move us to gratitude in the opening item, which had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky four years before. This is pleasant, harmless music, which would be even more agreeable if it were a little livelier.

The "Alpine" Symphony necessarily profited by contrast with what had preceded it. Strauss at all events knows how to say what he has to say. What a pity that he has not more to communicate. There are passages of extraordinary and characteristic beauty in these pages. But the pages are too many. There is too much repetition of banal material. The introduction of the cow-bells and the wind-machine is peculiarly offensive because so especially needless in the case of a surpassingly brilliant orchestrator. Yet it is surprisingly easy to listen for 50 minutes to Strauss's orchestra: and in this score there is plenty of opportunity to renew acquaintance with old and well loved friends, notably "Till" and "Rosenkavalier."

On March 21, the orchestra begins its six-day festival of the music of Johannes Brahms.

L. A. S.

...y Orchestra, Serge ...onductor.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth program of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of March 14, follows:

Galliard, Sonata in G major (Freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).
Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs.
Strauss, An Alpine Symphony, op. 64.

Martelli's music received at this

BRITAIN AND CHILE TO HAVE EMBASSIES

By Radio from Monitor Bureau

LONDON — The Government, in recognition of the growing importance of Anglo-South American trade, has announced that the British representative in Chile will in the future be an Ambassador instead of a Minister as hitherto, and that an Ambassador from Chile will similarly be received at His Majesty's Court in London.

This announcement places Chile on the same diplomatic footing here as Argentina and Brazil.

Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky, Strauss and Alpine Ascent

With the "Bas Reliefs" of Martelli for Novelty On the Way

Trans. March 15

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY is nothing if not loyal to the children of his brain. Few of the new works which he introduces do not come in for repetition at some time or other; all but the most insignificant are kept in the permanent repertory of the orchestra. Thus yesterday the program was made up entirely of works which had their first hearing under the present conductor. Chief of them was that product of Richard Strauss's old age, the "Alpine Symphony." With it came Steinberg's arrangement of Galliard's Sonata in G major. Both were introduced to the symphony concerts originally in December, 1925. To them for novelty of the week was added Henri Martelli's suite, "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs." When Strauss wrote his Alpine Symphony in 1915 it was the first time he attempted orchestral music since the "Domestica" of 1904, the first time he attempted orchestral nature music since the early "From Italy" of 1886. Many there were who had assumed that after the writing of the operatic works intervening in the years after "Domestica," Strauss would not again turn to purely symphonic music.

In the Alpine Symphony he is as detailedly programmatic as never before. Where previously in most of his symphonic works Strauss has been content to throw out hints as to the program, in this work he outlines in detail the course which he expects the listener to follow with him. It is to be less a description of the mountains than an ascent to a high peak unnamed. His symphony might well be called "The Day of a Mountain Climber." Early this party arises. It is yet night. We are in the brooding atmosphere just before dawn. A glorious sunrise bursts upon us. The ascent begins. At the beginning one thinks or sees little of mountains. One enters a forest not so different from any other forest, a forest which one might enter down on the plain.

As in any forest one wanders beside a brook; a waterfall is conveniently handy to enliven things; one sees—and hears—"scenery" of which details remain unspecified (was there ever a traveller able to describe or even name all the "scenery" he saw on a given trip?); this scenery gives way to more usual flowering paths; and the flowering paths lead into a mountain pasture, presumably on a plateau somewhere on the side of the mountain. But pastoral and pastural scenes need not detain one forever. At the heights gained there is no longer a definite path to lead the wanderer farther. He must continue through thicket and underbrush. He is rewarded; he emerges on a glacier. A great view spreads out before him once he is beyond the line of vegetation. But it is short-lived. A fog rises and obscures the vision. Our climber gives way to elegiac feelings. An ominous stillness surrounds him. He becomes suspicious of these mountains. Yes, it is true, he is caught in a mountain storm. Thunderings and reverberations, wind and rain he must somehow endure. He descends again. In the valley he finds peace. No storms here. He is permitted to view a sunset. He sinks into the sounds of night.—One thing Strauss does not tell us, perhaps with wise discretion: how high up the mountain is his glacier from which his traveller sees a vision, beyond which the storm prevents him from climbing? There is no hint that it is a mountain-top. Perhaps then it is unfair for critics to fail to find mountain-tops in the music! The miserable rain prevents the climber—and the composer—from reaching those much desired peaks.

Strauss paints from a huge orchestral pallette. To the large orchestra in common use he must add a heckelphone, four tenor tubas, wind machine, thunder machine, and cowbells. And not content with all this, he recommends that machines be used for sustaining the tones of some of the wind instruments beyond the length of breath of the players. Nor does Strauss assemble all these forces without cause. No one is better able than he to paint huge panoramic canvasses. His powers with his orchestra have by no means diminished in this score. The thunderstorm is a masterpiece of realism. As such it may hold its own with many another scene in Straussan works—the bleating of sheep in "Don Quixote" and the battle music in "Heldenleben," to cite only two. And the musical value is approximately the same in all these cases. Further, there are moments of true grandeur when the vision bursts upon the traveller on the side of his Alp. Much of the music of the forest and the country side is poetic and very finely wrought. Many of the themes which seem insignificant on paper or in the study, fit admirably into the scheme of things when heard in their proper place in the orchestra.

All this to the credit side of the ledger. To look upon this page need not be to ignore also the existence of a debit page. For with all its good points the Alpine Symphony may not quite hold its own with the finest of the earlier tone poems—"Till Eulenspiegel," to give only a single example. For one thing, Strauss falls into that chief sign of approaching age, he becomes reminiscent in the Alpine Symphony. One seems to hear references to certain of the composer's own earlier works here and there. Memories of Wagner are not entirely absent. Other composers are in evidence. The references are slight. In the Strauss in the days of his undimmed maturity one never encountered them. As a second entry on this debit page one must write the fact that there are long stretches in which very little seems to be happening. The significant portions of the work are by them needlessly interrupted. Performance yesterday afternoon left nothing to be desired. In the nobler portions of the work it was eloquent. In the weaker portions it favored the ageing Strauss.

Beginning the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played the delightful sonata of Galliard. Through a Lento, an Allegro non troppo, an Andante teneramente, an Allegro spiritoso it runs. Much sustained beauty lies in the melodies of the slow movements. And one admired the spirit and the verve of the fast movements, particularly the last. Once again came the reflection that a forgotten past must hold much music, awaiting a re-awakening, which would give pleasure to a receptive present. Once again one feels grateful to the conductor for his share in uncovering so much worth-while music of this past.

For new piece Dr. Koussevitzky played from manuscript the suite of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" of Henri Martelli. They represent a "genius" with the body of a man and head of an eagle; a dance before a personage of some importance; a lion and his mate; the army and musicians of King Ashur-bani-pal. The first is little more than prelude to the rest. The incongruity of the respective parts of the body of the monster represented M. Martelli seems to conjure up by successions of chords equally incongruous. The dance repeats a well rhythmed accompaniment figure, over which winds play pale and tenuous melodies. The snarlings of the wild beasts Dr. Koussevitzky wisely softened and "idealized." This third movement yielded also a solo for bass tuba of no little interest and effectiveness. The fourth is the only movement of "long breath." Stirringly move the warriors through the musical picture. Subtly the musicians play their tunes. Climactic ending could hardly have been better planned.

Modern harmonic resource is capable of accomplishing almost anything if only it is in clever enough hands. The task which M. Martelli had set himself, over and above the obvious realistic effects already mentioned, was to furnish a background which should be in music an equivalent of the feeling one gets from looking upon the peculiar sculptural form known as the bas-relief. Probably the effect which remains in the mind of those who look upon this type of art is the effect which remains most in the mind of those who look upon this type of art is the roundly. Add to this the fact that the Assyrians had not progressed far in the science of drawing, knew little or nothing of perspective, made arbitrary disposition of feet and hands. All this a composer on such a subject would put into his music. The marvel of it is that he succeeded. The very drabness of the music of which many complained, and perhaps justly—was true and faithful rendering of the subject in hand, was the chief success of the music. One cannot possibly quarrel with the composer's handling of his subject. Of the choice of that subject—but that is another matter.

A. H. M.

Lease Floor in New Skyscraper

The law firm of Sherburne, Powers & Needham has leased the nineteenth floor of the 75 Federal Street Building, now being erected. For six years the firm has been at 19 Congress street. Cross & Brown Co. is agent for the building. Charles E. Cushing represented the tenant as broker.

Robbers Kill Town Marshal

Dyersville, Ia., March 15 (A.P.)—Henry Hanfield, Dyersville marshal, was shot to death today by two robbers who held up a filling station at Luxemburg near here, and escaped in an automobile.

70

Assyrian Reliefs, Parisian's Music

Trans. March 13

To the Symphony Concerts of this week Dr. Koussevitzky introduces another new work, and with it a young composer as yet unheard in these parts. The composer is Henri Martelli and his piece is entitled "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," Mr. Martelli was born in 1895 at Bastia, a seaport town on the north-eastern coast of the island of Corsica. He went to Paris to the Conservatory in 1912. His teachers in harmony, counterpoint, fugue and composition were Jules Moquet and Charles-Marie Widor. His own introduction of himself stretches no further.

All manner of subjects have attracted composers as sources of suggestion for their music: poetry, of course; pictures occasionally, as for example Boecklin's "Isle of the Dead." Some of the modernists, as Stravinsky or Prokofiev, have also gone back to primtive days in the existence of mankind for material for musical treatment. One does not recall another case, however, in which a composer bases his music on primtive art. Mr. Martelli, in his "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," has in mind three definite fragments of ancient Assyrian sculpture in the Louvre.

I. "Génie ailé a têt d'aigle devant la plante sacrée," (Modéré). King Ashurnasir-pal, who reigned over Assyria from 884-860 B. C., built many palaces notably the palace of Nimrod at ancient Kalakh. Here was discovered, among others, a bas-relief representing a "genius" with the two wings and the head of an eagle. The relief relates also to the cult of the sacred tree. A picture of the fragment discloses a creature with legs, trunk and arms human. The head and wings are those of a large bird with a huge beak. This 'genius" is standing upright; its left hand holds an object which may possibly be a pail. Before it one sees an arrangement of standards and groupings of leaves which might conceivably represent a highly conventionalized tree, but which, more likely, pictures a vine supported by a pillar. The right arm of the hybrid being is extended as if in the act of plucking the single bunch of grapes (?) which the vine or branch supports.

Assyric Relief

II. Dause. (Modérémentanimé). The composer furnishes neither [illegible]

III. "Lion et lionne dans leur repaire." (Lent). This bas-relief, which dates from the time of Ashur-bani-pal (King of Assyria 668-626 B. C.), was part of the scultural decoration of the palace of Kouyoundjick of ancient Niniveh. It represents a lioness stretched out full length at the foot of a tree. A lion with a very long mane stands erect before her. The fragment is broken in such a way that the head of the lion cannot be seen.

IV. "L'armée d'Assourbanipal et ses Musiciens." (Animé). This bas-relief is part of the decoration of the same palace at Nineveh. There are four rows of characters above each other. At bottom, a single warrior on horseback, possibly the great king himself? In the row above, four figures with various implements of war, one on horseback. In the third row are two horses and the groom (?) at the right, four musicians with cymbals and harps at the left. The upper row shows a procession of nine musicians, probably pictured in the act of singing.

Mr. Martelli's orchestra is the large modern orchestra and the idiom a modern chromatic idiom. The first "relief" is rather fully orchestrated and curiously wrought. The second is lighter, with graceful solo-passages in wind instruments and strings, mainly indicating rhythmic figures. The third, of the two lions, is full of growlings and rumblings and snarlings in low voiced instruments. There is even a solo for tuba. Mr. Martelli has apparently chosen to treat his subject realistically The last "relief", by far the longest of the four, is cast into three divisions, the third a repetition of the first, and both brilliantly scored and aggressively rhythmed. A middle section, by way of contrast, abounds in subtle and graceful effects. The dance-spirit prevails.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY IN ONLY THREE NUMBERS

Amer. March 13

By MOSES SMITH

THE program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is overweighted at the bottom. Although the list includes only three pieces, and takes a bare hour and a half for performance, almost an hour of this time is consumed by the last number, Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, which Boston first heard a little more than four years ago.

The novelty—and what is a Boston Symphony program without a novelty?—is a piece called "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" by one Henri Martelli, contemporary Parisian composer. He is inspired by four bas-reliefs, which have come down to modern times and which are said to have adorned Assyrian royal halls. They give the titles, and presumably furnish mood and program, for the four parts of this composition: "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle Before the Sacred Tree," "Dance," "Lion and Lioness in their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

Perhaps with photographs of these reliefs furnished them, the listeners might have ben able to make something out of Martelli's music. As it was they were mystified—and so, let us hasten to add, were we. Our objection is not to the noisiness of the score, for modern ears have become long-suffering. But this noise is not music. It is an ineffectual substitute for the one thing that vitalizes music—original, forceful ideas. Not all the orchestral skill, rhythmic devices, or various tricks of the trade can compensate for this lack.

Strauss' lengthy tonal discourse on a mountain-climb is amazingly uneven music. Some of it is the great Strauss inheritor of the robe of the great line of German composers. Much of it is the turgid bombast of an absurdly inflated orchestra, or inconsequential padding. Yet it is good to hear for what it contains of the great Strauss, who is often a quiet Strauss. When he puffs loudest, as in the storm, he succeeds merely in being boresome.

The opening number is Maximilian Steinberg's free version of a sonata in G major by Galliard. The performances of the various pieces by Mr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra are less effective than usually.

[illegible] Orchestra, Serge [illegible] conductor.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth program of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of March 14, follows:

Galliard, Sonata in G major (Freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).
Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs.
Strauss, An Alpine Symphony, op. 64.

Martelli's music received at this concert its first performance in the United States. It is a symphonic suite in four parts, each inspired, the composer said in a program note, by a bas-relief with a particular subject. The pictures here musically translated represent "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle before the Sacred Tree," "A Dance before a Personage Seated," "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

Henri Martelli was born in Corsica 35 years ago and lives in Paris, where he received his musical education and where he has had other works produced. If the present suite could have been heard 20 years ago it might have made a greater impression, but in that time Stravinsky and Prokofieff have made it difficult to appreciate other composers' efforts to depict prehistoric or early historical periods. Nor does the translation of pictures into tone justify itself in this instance. It is well known that one of the characteristics of the music of the East is monotony. This quality the composer has succeeded in preserving. The third movement gives opportunity for a solo number with the bass tuba in the role of the lion. This is by no means a fearsome beast, but rather an amiable, Shavian creature. Both the army and the musicians of the Great King were equally tame. Possibly the composer intended to be ironical about these ancient times.

Nor was there much to move us to gratitude in the opening item, which had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky four years before. This is pleasant, harmless music, which would be even more agreeable if it were a little livelier.

The "Alpine" Symphony necessarily profited by contrast with what had preceded it. Strauss at all events knows how to say what he has to say. What a pity that he has not more to communicate. There are passages of extraordinary and characteristic beauty in these pages. But the pages are too many. There is too much repetition of banal material. The introduction of the cow-bells and the wind-machine is peculiarly offensive because so especially needless in the case of a surpassingly brilliant orchestrator. Yet it is surprisingly easy to listen for 50 minutes to Strauss's orchestra: and in this score there is plenty of opportunity to renew acquaintance with old and well loved friends, notably "Till" and "Rosenkavalier."

On March 21, the orchestra begins its six-day festival of the music of Johannes Brahms.

L. A. S.

BRITAIN AND CHILE TO HAVE EMBASSIES

By Radio from Monitor Bureau

LONDON — The Government, in recognition of the growing importance of Anglo-South American trade, has announced that the British representative in Chile will in the future be an Ambassador instead of a Minister as hitherto, and that an Ambassador from Chile will similarly be received at His Majesty's Court in London.

This announcement places Chile on the same diplomatic footing here as Argentina and Brazil.

Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky, Strauss and Alpine Ascent

With the "Bas Reliefs" of Martelli for Novelty On the Way

Trans. March 15

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY is nothing if not loyal to the children of his brain. Few of the new works which he introduces do not come in for repetition at some time or other; all but the most insignificant are kept in the permanent repertory of the orchestra. Thus yesterday the program was made up entirely of works which had their first hearing under the present conductor. Chief of them was that product of Richard Strauss's old age, the "Alpine Symphony." With it came Steinberg's arrangement of Galliard's Sonata in G major. Both were introduced to the symphony concerts originally in December, 1925. To them for novelty of the week was added Henri Martelli's suite, "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs." When Strauss wrote his Alpine Symphony in 1915 it was the first time he attempted orchestral music since the "Domestica" of 1904, the first time he attempted orchestral nature music since the early "From Italy" of 1886. Many there were who had assumed that after the writing of the operatic works intervening in the years after "Domestica," Strauss would not again turn to purely symphonic music.

In the Alpine Symphony he is as detailedly programmatic as never before. Where previously in most of his symphonic works Strauss has been content to throw out hints as to the program, in this work he outlines in detail the course which he expects the listener to follow with him. It is to be less a description of the mountains than an ascent to a high peak unnamed. His symphony might well be called "The Day of a Mountain Climber." Early this party arises. It is yet night. We are in the brooding atmosphere just before dawn. A glorious sunrise bursts upon us. The ascent begins. At the beginning one thinks or sees little of mountains. One enters a forest not so different from any other forest, a forest which one might enter down on the plain.

As in any forest one wanders beside a brook; a waterfall is conveniently handy to enliven things; one sees—and hears—"scenery" of which details remain unspecified (was there ever a traveller able to describe or even name all the "scenery" he saw on a given trip?); this scenery gives way to more usual flowering paths; and the flowering paths lead into a mountain pasture, presumably on a plateau somewhere on the side of the mountain. But pastoral and pastural scenes need not detain one forever. At the heights gained there is no longer a definite path to lead the wanderer farther. He must continue through thicket and underbrush. He is rewarded; he emerges on a glacier. A great view spreads out before him once he is beyond the line of vegetation. But it is short-lived. A fog rises and obscures the vision. Our climber gives way to elegiac feelings. An ominous stillness surrounds him. He becomes suspicious of these mountains. Yes, it is true, he is caught in a mountain storm. Thunderings and reverberations, wind and rain he must somehow endure. He descends again. In the valley he finds peace. No storms here. He is permitted to view a sunset. He sinks into the sounds of night.—One thing Strauss does not tell us, perhaps with wise discretion: how high up the mountain is his glacier from which his traveller sees a vision, beyond which the storm prevents him from climbing? There is no hint that it is a mountain-top. Perhaps then it is unfair for critics to fail to find mountain-tops in the music! The miserable rain prevents the climber—and the composer—from reaching those much desired peaks.

Strauss paints from a huge orchestral pallette. To the large orchestra in common use he must add a heckelphone, four tenor tubas, wind machine, thunder machine, and cowbells. And not content with all this, he recommends that machines be used for sustaining the tones of some of the wind instruments beyond the length of breath of the players. Nor does Strauss assemble all these forces without cause. No one is better able than he to paint huge panoramic canvasses. His powers with his orchestra have by no means diminished in this score. The thunderstorm is a masterpiece of realism. As such it may hold its own with many another scene in Straussan works—the bleating of sheep in "Don Quixote" and the battle music in "Heldenleben," to cite only two. And the musical value is approximately the same in all these cases. Further, there are moments of true grandeur when the vision bursts upon the traveller on the side of his Alp. Much of the music of the forest and the country side is poetic and very finely wrought. Many of the themes which seem insignificant on paper or in the study, fit admirably into the scheme of things when heard in their proper place in the orchestra.

All this to the credit side of the ledger. To look upon this page need not be to ignore also the existence of a debit page. For with all its good points the Alpine Symphony may not quite hold its own with the finest of the earlier tone poems—"Till Eulenspiegel," to give only a single example. For one thing, Straus falls into that chief sign of approaching age, he becomes reminiscent in the Alpine Symphony. One seems to hear references to certain of the composer's own earlier works here and there. Memories of Wagner are not entirely absent. Other composers are in evidence. The references are slight. In the Strauss in the days of his undimmed maturity one never encountered them. As a second entry on this debit page one must write the fact that there are long stretches in which very little seems to be happening. The significant portions of the work are by them needlessly interrupted. Performance yesterday afternoon left nothing to be desired. In the nobler portions of the work it was eloquent. In the weaker portions it favored the ageing Strauss.

Beginning the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played the delightful sonata of Galliard. Through a Lento, an Allegro non troppo, an Andante teneramente, an Allegro spiritoso it runs. Much sustained beauty lies in the melodies of the slow movements. And one admired the spirit and the verve of the fast movements, particularly the last. Once again came the reflection that a forgotten past must hold much music, awaiting a re-awakening, which would give pleasure to a receptive present. Once again one feels grateful to the conductor for his share in uncovering so much worth-while music of this past.

For new piece Dr. Koussevitzky played from manuscript the suite of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" of Henri Martelli. They represent a "genius" with the body of a man and head of an eagle; a dance before a personage of some importance; a lion and his mate; the army and musicians of King Ashur-bani-pal. The first is little more than prelude to the rest. The incongruity of the respective parts of the body of the monster represented M. Martelli seems to conjure up by successions of chords equally incongruous. The dance repeats a well rnythmed accompaniment figure, over which winds play pale and tenuous melodies. The snarlings of the wild beasts Dr. Koussevitzky wisely softened and "idealized." This third movement yielded also a solo for bass tuba of no little interest and effectiveness. The fourth is the only movement of "long breath." Stirringly move the warriors through the musical picture. Subtly the musicians play their tunes. Climactic ending could hardly have been better planned.

Modern harmonic resource is capable of accomplishing almost anything if only it is in clever enough hands. The task which M. Martelli had set himself, over and above the obvious realistic effects already mentioned, was to furnish a background which should be in music an equivalent of the feeling one gets from looking upon the peculiar sculptural form known as the bas-relief. Probably the effect which remains in the mind of those wo look upon this type of art is the effect which remains most in the mind of those who look upon this type of art is the roundly. Add to this the fact that the Assyrians had not progressed far in the science of drawing, knew little or nothing of perspective, made arbitrary disposition of feet and hands. All this a composer on such a subject would put into his music. The marvel of it is that he succeeded. The very drabness of the music of which many complained, and perhaps justly—was true and faithful rendering of the subject in hand, was the chief success of the music. One cannot possibly quarrel with the composer's handling of his subject. Of the choice of that subject—but that is another matter,

A. H. M.

Lease Floor in New Skyscraper

The law firm of Sherburne, Powers & Needham has leased the nineteenth floor of the 75 Federal Street Building, now being erected. For six years the firm has been at 19 Congress street. Cross & Brown Co. is agent for the building. Charles E. Cushing represented the tenant as broker.

Robbers Kill Town Marshal

Dyersville, Ia., March 15 (A.P.)—Henry Hanfield, Dyersville marshal, was shot to death today by two robbers who held up a filling station at Luxemburg near here, and escaped in an automobile.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G Major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs; Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

Martelli's Suite was performed for the first time in this country. It was said that the performance yesterday was the first anywhere but in the note furnished by the composer, this Suite is included in the list of compositions that have been performed "many times in Paris and in the French provinces." Now the Suite was composed in 1928; it has certainly not been performed as yet by any one of the leading orchestras of Paris.

Martelli, a Corsican by birth, studied at the Paris Conservatory and now lives in Paris. He is 35 years old; he must have passed the yeasty period as a composer. Although educated musically in Paris, he apparently has not been influenced by the French school that insists on clarity even in impressionistic works and on a certain finesse in harmonic schemes and in orchestration. Perhaps these desirable characteristics are revealed in his other compositions; no doubt he thought that an Assyrian subject demanded a more or less barbaric treatment; but the Assyrians though they delighted in noisy music were far from being barbarians; on the contrary their culture was noteworthy. There may be a Corsican school of music unknown to us, which influenced Martelli in his youth. It would have been an impossible task for him to reproduce veritable musical effects as the Assyrians produced them and enjoyed them. He simply endeavored to translate into tones four bas-reliefs that had impressed him as Liszt and others attempted to do the same with pictures.

The four movements of his Suite, all of them short, were suggested by a winged Jinnee, or spirit good or evil, eagle-headed before the Sacred Tree; a Dance before a personage seated, crowned by a tiara and robed in an embroidered tunic; a Lion and a Lioness in their Lair; and for a finale, the Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal, a mighty man in his day and generation.

It is a pity that before each movement a photograph of the suggesting bas relief could not have been thrown upon a screen. Then some in the audience after each orchestral transcription could have said "Marvellous! Marvellous"; others exclaiming "Not a bit like it." It would be easy to say that Martelli had set himself an impossible task; it is only just to reply that the music showed imagination, which, after all, is indispensable to a composition purposing to be pictorial; if the different movements were to some musically crude from a technical standpoint, or, while showing a certain skill, only affectedly eccentric, should they be hastily dismissed as vain and impotent? The question is not whether this music is truly Assyrian—for who knows the precise nature of the music, except that the tonal scheme was founded on mathematical relations of planets as formulated by astrologers and astronomers? The question is this; putting aside any thought of race or nation, did the music by itself, without any association, impress the senses or the mind?

Personally we answer "yes," but no two hearers are affected in exactly the same manner except by an exciting rhythm. The tavern music that made one man merry, another mad, aroused in Sir Thomas Browne a deep spirit of devotion. Martelli's Dance, with its hypnotic rhythmic monotony, its wild snatches of melody haunts the memory. As for the lion, one might say as Demetrius at the play of "Pyramus and Thisby," performed by the hardhanded man of Athens, "Well roar'd, lion." And there were passages in the Finale—but not in the conventional March section—that were much more than ingenious.

The music by Galliard—tinkered adriotly and enlarged in its proportions by Steinberg—is delightful in its gaiety, also in the suavity of the third movement. The lively pace taken by Dr. Kousevitzky in the first Allegro, although the indication reads Allegro non troppo, displayed the remarkable technical proficiency of the orchestra. Although Galliard was of French parentage and educated musically by Italians living in Germany before he made London his home, how English this music is in the jollity of the fast movements. Simple, direct as this Sonata is, is it not more truly music than the bombastic Symphony by Strauss, superbly performed as this Alpine adventure was? An Alpine symphony. It and its composer remind one of Reuben Pettingill of Waterbury, Me., as described by Artemus Ward:

"He was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife.

"With that simple weapon he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. He carved excellent soldiers also.

"I remember his masterpiece.

"It was 'Napoleon Crossing the Alps.'

"Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps."

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The Brahms Festival will begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 22. Academic Festival Overture. Symphony No. 3, F major. Symphony No. 2, D major.

LAURA HUXTABLE PORTER

In Full Symphonic Measure, Unstinted

Trans.—Mar 14

TWO symphonies, a concerto, and an orchestralized Prelude and Fugue of Bach all on one program! A recasting of the listener's impressions at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, last evening, offers so many angles of approach and recalls so many occasions for enthusiasm that it is difficult to find a proper beginning. The delicate playing of Miss Lucille Monaghan in the solo part for Mozart's Concerto in C major for Pianoforte and Orchestra (K. 467) comes first to mind because the audience received it with such delight and because personalities always figure prominently in any public occasion. Then follows the engrossing individuality of the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Then the brightness of Haydn's Symphony "with the horn call." Finally, the magnificent coloring of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat as transcribed for orchestra by Arnold Schönberg. The order is easily altered with Sibelius first and Schönberg second, depending upon the fancy of the moment.

No doubt the first portion of the program, which was devoted to Haydn and Mozart, held so much pleasure for many because it opposed itself to the present tendency of hardness in all things. In the very antiquity of this music resided the fountain of its freshness. And had Mozart himself been present he would have rejoiced in Miss Monaghan's playing of the solo part in his concerto. It was playing of uncommon lightness and grace. Miss Monaghan cares little for styles and tendencies, ancient or modern; cultivates neither the Lisztian vigors of the romantic age nor the austerities of modern fashion. Her performance receives judgment for its inherent merit alone. Her rhythm is crisp, sensitive, unerring; her touch of exceptional delicacy and refinement—a touch of such outstanding perfection as to command for her a distinctive place among the young pianists of the day. One would be inclined to say that tones so finely cut would fail to penetrate the enshrouding orchestra. On the contrary, they came through with unmistakable clarity and sweetness and without seeming effort. Dr. Koussevitzky's painstaking solicitude in refining instrumental lines was of course of great assistance here. Conductor, orchestra and audience hung on the unfolding of the Mozartean design as they might attend the gradual disclosure of a vista of natural beauty or a new artistic delight. The Concerto is notably one of the loveliest among Mozart's extended works and the performance throughout was marked for the qualities of sympathy and discernment. For all concerned the audience sustained its applause and thrice recalled Miss Monaghan.

What can be more Mozartean than Mozart? Haydn. The solution to the enigma is disclosed in the Symphony "with the horn call." The audience of last evening enjoyed this new-old piece as keenly as the audience at Symphony Hall. The fresh melodies and the amiable mood produced their unfailing spell. The solo parts were naturally among the interesting features of the work and the skillful instrumentalists of the orchestra received their due recognition.

Sibelius still needs many converts. While an ardent minority in the audience eagerly attended each new tonal disclosure, marvelled at the strangeness of effect achieved by such economic means, delighted in the impression of "a third dimension in sound" similar to the plasticity of a sculptor's modeling clay, the music appeared in an idiom too unfamiliar to be enjoyed by the preponderant majority, who favor old sounds because they are old. The strange and the unfamiliar often occasion wonder but not always admiration. In "Schönberg's ingenuous scoring of Bach's Prelude and Fugue, the idiom is still the same and the effect is therefore received with favor.

N. M. J.

Amusements

SATURDAY MORNING

SYMPHONY CONCERT A DELIGHT

Three Contrasting Pieces Make Up the List

Post Mar 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although Dr. Koussevitzky labors over his programmes, often subjecting them to a double or triple revision, the result not infrequently suggests expediency rather than design. But the list that he prepared for the Symphony Concerts of this week, though it seemed on paper a haphazard grouping of incongruous elements, proved in performance to have been shrewdly contrived.

BUT THREE NUMBERS

There was first the delightful violoncello Sonata of Galliard, as arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1925. To it succeeded a set of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," by the Corsican-born Henri Martelli, otherwise unknown to the United States; and Strauss' huge "Alpine Symphony" made the rest, and also the bulk, of the concert.

Galliard's Sonata was beautifully played yesterday, and once more caused the listener to reflect upon the high level to which the art of musical composition attained in the 18th century, when even one of the lesser of the lesser lights could write music such as this: so freshly and charmingly invented, so perfect in form.

An Engrossing Novelty

Not too convincing, on the whole, have been Dr. Koussevitzky's novel pieces, whether native or foreign, in the season now entering upon its fourth quarter; but these "Bas-Reliefs" of Martelli, proved a pleasing exception to this rule. Here is a composer possessed of ideas and imagination and of the requisite technical skill, who can establish a mood with his opening measures and maintain it to the end. There is Oriental color in these tone pictures, but the note is not forced. It is more by purely musical than by obviously descriptive means that Martelli conjures up his vision of a vanished civilization.

The performance evidenced the care that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon any music that he undertakes to conduct; and the suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Sidow, who had so successfully handled the important part for tuba in the third movement, "Lion and Lioness In Their Lair," was obliged to take a "soloist's bow."

Strauss' "Alpine"

Three times now has Dr. Koussevitzky played "An Alpine Symphony" at a pair of subscription concerts, and with each repetition there has been a gain in the unity of impression made by a long and complex work and in the eloquence with which each episode has been set forth. Of the piece itself there is little now to say, though since Dr. Koussevitzky was the one who made it known to Boston, it is far less familiar to us than any of the Straussian tone-poems, save only the youthful "Macbeth," unheard here for many years.

The most objective and pictorial, the most continuously descriptive of them all. "An Alpine Symphony" stands, perhaps, on a lower plane than the rest. And yet, who but Strauss could have filled so large a canvas with such a grasp of the fundamental principles of musical architecture or with such a flow and fund of invention—granting that the themes have not quite the saliency of those in the earlier tone-poems? And if there are episodes, like those of the hunting-horns and the cowbells, that savor of a realism overnaive and ingenuous, there are pages in this colossal work of a genuine nobility and exaltation. There are the measures that celebrate the completion of the ascent; there is the poetic peroration.

Nor should the scoring, that includes every dynamic degree from the faintest whisper to an earth-shaking fortissimo, go without its usual need of praise. In "An Alpine Symphony" Strauss is seen at the height of his extraordinary powers as an orchestrator.

CH 15, 1930 Gl Globe

NEW 'BAS RELIEFS' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Martelli's Work Heard First Time in America

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," Galliard's Sonata Complete Program

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was "Assyrian Bas Reliefs," a suite by Henri Martelli, a native of Corsica now living in Paris. Steinberg's free transcription for orchestra of a sonata by John Ernest Galliard, and Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," completed a miscellaneous program which took some 20 minutes less than the usual time to perform. The addition of a familiar and popular classic overture would no doubt have pleased the many listeners to whom the only good music is familiar music.

Martelli, now in his 30s, is French by citizenship and by training, despite his Italian name. He found inspiration for his "Bas Reliefs" in four fragments of Assyrian sculpture, depicting (1) "A winged Jinnee with the head of an eagle before the sacred tree"; (2) "A dance before a seated personage"; (3) "Lion and Lioness in their lair," and (4) "The army and musicians of Ashurbanipal." The work was written in 1928, and played yesterday for the first time in America.

Martelli's music has an unforced originality of style, and considerable imaginative power. The scoring for orchestra is unusual, with ingenious percussion effects, and no attempt to deafen the audience with perpetual sonorities. The lion, represented by a solo tuba, roars at moments with a hint of the naive naturalism of Haydn's "Creation." The dissonances, unrelieved by consonant harmonies, have the monotony and something of the crudity one associates with primitive and barbaric art. Martelli is obviously a composer of greater significance than most of the new names which so frequently figure on Dr Koussevitzsky's programs. More of his music should be heard here.

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" has commonly been regarded, even in Germany, as a relative failure, likely to be forgotten in a few years, though "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will insure the composer lasting fame. Yesterday's performance, on which Dr Koussevitzky lavished his most painstaking eloquence, did not reverse the unfavorable opinion one formed of this grandiose and chaotic work when it was first heard here in 1925.

It goes without saying that Strauss is a master of every device a composer can employ to manufacture something the unwary listener may take for a great work. The themes, insignificant in themselves, are worked out with amazing skill. The scoring for a huge orchestra, which includes every conceivable instrument from organ to cowbells, is superb. But only in certain passages that echo the earlier and greater Strauss is this symphony emotionally impressive. At the rest the listener's intellect may marvel, but his heart remains untouched.

Yesterday's concert made one more certain than ever that "progress music," music that attempts to tell a story or paint a picture or evoke a definite mood in the listener, is based on a misconception of the true limits of the art. Music, like mathematics, does not and cannot copy or represent the world in which we live, and in which the painters, the sculptors and the poets find their materials. It is a world in itself, a new universe to which men turn for a consolation and a hope too often denied them elsewhere.

The power of such pieces of "program music" as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan," or, to speak of lesser things, of Martelli's "Bas Reliefs," lies in the music, not in the artificial and labored attempts to direct the current of the listener's imagination toward particular objects. To admit these truth about music is not to deny, but rather to enhance its emotional and imaginative appeal. Is there any poem or any painting which could be used to add to the effect of the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony? The meaning of such music as that cannot be put into words or onto painted canvas.

Even such an inferior piece of music as yesterday's pretty but inconsequential sonata by Galliard, exhumed at Dr Koussevitsky's request by Steinberg, and freely arranged for orchestra, gains rather than loses by the absence of a "program" telling one what to see and what to feel while listening. This sonata, played with a somber intensity, a broadening and swelling of its phrases not in keeping with the 18th century, was appealing and effective.

Next week's program, all from Brahms, belongs to the Brahms Festival. It includes his second and third symphonies, and the "Academic Festival" overture. This time the Friday and Saturday subscribers will hear the same program, something not hitherto Dr Koussevitsky's practice at festivals.

P. R.

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

New Piquancy Given to Galliard's G Major Sonata

Traveler Mar 15

For the opening number at yesterday afternoon's symphony concert at Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitsky chose the transcription of Galliard's G major sonaa, ranscribed by Maximilian Steinberg for a small orchestra. The sonaa had is firs performance here several seasons ago, and this arrangement was made expressly for Dr. Koussevitsky.

For the delightful simplicity of early 18th century melodies, Mr. Steinberg has used an interesting development, and their charm and delicacy were still further enhanced as the orchestra played them yesterday. Particularly in the last movement, with its decidedly and inexplainably Celtic strain, were the strains of this old air given a new piquancy.

Thence the orchestra proceeded to another of the season's musical novelties. With the provocative title, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs, Henri Martelli has provided a group of four tone pictures. The gist of his material may be deduced from the title of the first of the group, "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle Before the Sacred Tree." With his usual skill a interpreting the newest ideas of our newest composers, Dr. Koussevitsky did his best to lend a meaning to this strange discordant group. The "Dance," following the first theme had, to be sure, a strongly marked rhythm, depending largely for its effect on the percussion instruments, whose players were asked to rise at the conclusion of the number.

Although the program carefully annotates the pictorial idea back of Mr. Martelli's work, and although the realistic roars of the lion and lioness in their lair are indubitably present, there were those in the audience who found themselves entirely out of sympathy with the weird harmonies and complex instrumentalization. They present interesting musical matter, perhaps, but for those who would hear more sustained tone, their brevity proved welcome. Yesterday's audience received them apathetically.

There was a good deal more enthusiasm for the Strauss Alpine Symphony which took up the latter half of the program. Again in one movement, with the program set forth by the composer himself, this favored work of one of the most eminent of living composers, depicts a pastoral scene in all its beauty. For his inspiration Strauss went back to nature, even to including the tinkling bells of the mountain flocks in the "Mountain Pasture" theme. With muted strings, a fanfare of muted trumpets and flowing melody, the symphony takes the listener from "Night" to "Night" again. An appreciative audience, in a more receptive mood, perhaps, because of the preceding novelty, listened attentively and applauded warmly.

the peasants enter collective associations only when they demand it.

JEWISH VETERANS

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G Major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs; Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

Martelli's Suite was performed for the first time in this country. It was said that the performance yesterday was the first anywhere but in the note furnished by the composer, this Suite is included in the list of compositions that have been performed "many times in Paris and in the French provinces." Now the Suite was composed in 1928; it has certainly not been performed as yet by any one of the leading orchestras of Paris.

Martelli, a Corsican by birth, studied at the Paris Conservatory and now lives in Paris. He is 35 years old; he must have passed the yeasty period as a composer. Although educated musically in Paris, he apparently has not been influenced by the French school that insists on clarity even in impressionistic works and on a certain finesse in harmonic schemes and in orchestration. Perhaps these desirable characteristics are revealed in his other compositions; no doubt he thought that an Assyrian subject demanded a more or less barbaric treatment; but the Assyrians though they delighted in noisy music were far from being barbarians; on the contrary their culture was noteworthy. There may be a Corsican school of music unknown to us, which influenced Martelli in his youth. It would have been an impossible task for him to reproduce veritable musical effects as the Assyrians produced them and enjoyed them. He simply endeavored to translate into tones four bas-reliefs that had impressed him as Liszt and others attempted to do the same with pictures.

The four movements of his Suite, all of them short, were suggested by a winged Jinnee, or spirit good or evil, eagle-headed before the Sacred Tree; a Dance before a personage seated, crowned by a tiara and robed in an embroidered tunic; a Lion and a Lioness in their Lair; and for a finale, the Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal, a mighty man in his day and generation.

It is a pity that before each movement a photograph of the suggesting bas relief could not have been thrown upon a screen. Then some in the audience after each orchestral transcription could have said "Marvellous! Marvellous"; others exclaiming "Not a bit like it." It would be easy to say that Martelli had set himself an impossible task; it is only just to reply that the music showed imagination, which, after all, is indispensable to a composition purposing to be pictorial; if the different movements were to some musically crude from a technical standpoint, or, while showing a certain skill, only affectedly eccentric, should they be hastily dismissed as vain and impotent? The question is not whether this music is truly Assyrian—for who knows the precise nature of the music, except that the tonal scheme was founded on mathematical relations of planets as formulated by astrologers and astronomers? The question is this; putting aside any thought of race or nation, did the music by itself, without any association, impress the senses or the mind?

Personally we answer "yes," but no two hearers are affected in exactly the same manner except by an exciting rhythm. The tavern music that made one man merry, another mad, aroused in Sir Thomas Browne a deep spirit of devotion. Martelli's Dance, with its hypnotic rhythmic monotony, its wild snatches of melody haunts the memory. As for the lion, one might say as Demetrius at the play of "Pyramus and Thisby," performed by the hardhanded man of Athens, "Well roar'd, lion." And there were passages in the Finale —but not in the conventional March section—that were much more than ingenious.

The music by Galliard—tinkered adriotly and enlarged in its proportions by Steinberg—is delightful in its gaiety, also in the suavity of the third movement. The lively pace taken by Dr. Kousevitzky in the first Allegro, although the indication reads Allegro non troppo, displayed the remarkable technical proficiency of the orchestra. Although Galliard was of French parentage and educated musically by Italians living in Germany before he made London his home, how English this music is in the jollity of the fast movements. Simple, direct as this Sonata is; is it not more truly music than the bombastic Symphony by Strauss, superbly performed as this Alpine adventure was? An Alpine symphony. It and its composer remind one of Reuben Pettingill of Waterbury, Me., as described by Artemus Ward:

"He was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife.

"With that simple weapon he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. He carved excellent soldiers also.

"I remember his masterpiece.

"It was 'Napoleon Crossing the Alps.'

"Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps."

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The Brahms Festival will begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 22. Academic Festival Overture. Symphony No. 3, F major. Symphony No. 2, D major.

LAURA HUXTABLE PORTER

In Full Symphonic Measure, Unstinted

TWO symphonies, a concerto, and an orchestralized Prelude and Fugue of Bach all on one program! A recasting of the listener's impressions at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, last evening, offers so many angles of approach and recalls so many occasions for enthusiasm that it is difficult to find a proper beginning. The delicate playing of Miss Lucille Monaghan in the solo part for Mozart's Concerto in C major for Pianoforte and Orchestra (K. 467) comes first to mind because the audience received it with such delight and because personalities always figure prominently in any public occasion. Then follows the engrossing individuality of the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Then the brightness of Haydn's Symphony "with the horn call." Finally, the magnificent coloring of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat as transcribed for orchestra by Arnold Schönberg. The order is easily altered, with Sibelius first and Schönberg second, depending upon the fancy of the moment.

No doubt the first portion of the program, which was devoted to Haydn and Mozart, held so much pleasure for many because it opposed itself to the present tendency of hardness in all things. In the very antiquity of this music resided the fountain of its freshness. And had Mozart himself been present he would have rejoiced in Miss Monaghan's playing of the solo part in his concerto. It was playing of uncommon lightness and grace. Miss Monaghan cares little for styles and tendencies, ancient or modern; cultivates neither the Lisztian vigors of the romantic age nor the austerities of modern fashion. Her performance receives judgment for its inherent merit alone. Her rhythm is crisp, sensitive, unerring; her touch of exceptional delicacy and refinement—a touch of such outstanding perfection as to command for her a distinctive place among the young pianists of the day. One would be inclined to say that tones so finely cut would fail to penetrate the enshrouding orchestra. On the contrary, they came through with unmistakable clarity and sweetness and without seeming effort. Dr. Koussevitzky's painstaking solicitude in refining instrumental lines was of course of great assistance here. Conductor, orchestra and audience hung on the unfolding of the Mozartean design as they might attend the gradual disclosure of a vista of natural beauty or a new artistic delight. The Concerto is notably one of the loveliest among Mozart's extended works and the performance throughout was marked for the qualities of sympathy and discernment. For all concerned the audience sustained its applause and thrice recalled Miss Monaghan.

What can be more Mozartean than Mozart? Haydn. The solution to the enigma is disclosed in the Symphony "with the horn call." The audience of last evening enjoyed this new-old piece as keenly as the audience at Symphony Hall. The fresh melodies and the amiable mood produced their unfailing spell. The solo parts were naturally among the interesting features of the work and the skillful instrumentalists of the orchestra received their due recognition.

Sibelius still needs many converts. While an ardent minority in the audience eagerly attended each new tonal disclosure, marvelled at the strangeness of effect achieved by such economic means, delighted in the impression of "a third dimension in sound" similar to the plasticity of a sculptor's modeling clay, the music appeared in an idiom too unfamiliar to be enjoyed by the preponderant majority, who favor old sounds because they are old. The strange and the unfamiliar often occasion wonder but not always admiration. In "Schönberg's ingenuous scoring of Bach's Prelude and Fugue, the idiom is still the same and the effect is therefore received with favor.

N. M. J.

Amusements

SATURDAY MORNING

SYMPHONY CONCERT A DELIGHT

Three Contrasting Pieces Make Up the List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although Dr. Koussevitzky labors over his programmes, often subjecting them to a double or triple revision, the result not infrequently suggests expediency rather than design. But the list that he prepared for the Symphony Concerts of this week, though it seemed on paper a haphazard grouping of incongruous elements, proved in performance to have been shrewdly contrived.

BUT THREE NUMBERS

There was first the delightful violoncello Sonata of Galliard, as arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1925. To it succeeded a set of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," by the Corsican-born Henri Martelli, otherwise unknown to the United States; and Strauss' huge "Alpine Symphony" made the rest, and also the bulk, of the concert.

Galliard's Sonata was beautifully played yesterday, and once more caused the listener to reflect upon the high level to which the art of musical composition attained in the 18th century, when even one of the lesser of the lesser lights could write music such as this: so freshly and charmingly invented, so perfect in form.

An Engrossing Novelty

Not too convincing, on the whole, have been Dr. Koussevitzky's novel pieces, whether native or foreign, in the season now entering upon its fourth quarter; but these "Bas-Reliefs" of Martelli, proved a pleasing exception to this rule. Here is a composer possessed of ideas and imagination and of the requisite technical skill, who can establish a mood with his opening measures and maintain it to the end. There is Oriental color in these tone pictures, but the note is not forced. It is more by purely musical than by obviously descriptive means that Martelli conjures up his vision of a vanished civilization.

The performance evidenced the care that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon any music that he undertakes to conduct; and the suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Sidow, who had so successfully handled the important part for tuba in the third movement, "Lion and Lioness In Their Lair," was obliged to take a "soloist's bow."

Strauss' "Alpine"

Three times now has Dr. Koussevitzky played "An Alpine Symphony" at a pair of subscription concerts, and with each repetition there has been a gain in the unity of impression made by a long and complex work and in the eloquence with which each episode has been set forth. Of the piece itself there is little now to say, though since Dr. Koussevitzky was the one who made it known to Boston, it is far less familiar to us than any of the Straussian tone-poems, save only the youthful "Macbeth," unheard here for many years.

The most objective and pictorial, the most continuously descriptive of them all, "An Alpine Symphony" stands, perhaps, on a lower plane than the rest. And yet, who but Strauss could have filled so large a canvas with such a grasp of the fundamental principles of musical architecture or with such a flow and fund of invention—granting that the themes have not quite the saliency of those in the earlier tone-poems? And if there are episodes, like those of the hunting-horns and the cowbells, that savor of a realism overnaive and ingenuous, there are pages in this colossal work of a genuine nobility and exaltation. There are the measures that celebrate the completion of the ascent; there is the poetic peroration.

Nor should the scoring, that includes every dynamic degree from the faintest whisper to an earth-shaking fortissimo, go without its usual need of praise. In "An Alpine Symphony" Strauss is seen at the height of his extraordinary powers as an orchestrator.

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

New Piquancy Given to Galliard's G Major Sonata

For the opening number at yesterday afternoon's symphony concert at Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitsky chose the transcription of Galliard's G major sonaa, ranscribed by Maximilian Steinberg for a small orchestra. The sonaa had is firs performance here several seasons ago, and this arrangement was made expressly for Dr. Koussevitsky.

For the delightful simplicity of early 18th century melodies, Mr. Steinberg has used an interesting development, and their charm and delicacy were still further enhanced as the orchestra played them yesterday. Particularly in the last movement, with its decidedly and inexplainably Celtic strain, were the strains of this old air given a new piquancy.

Thence the orchestra proceeded to another of the season's musical novelties. With the provocative title, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs, Henri Martelli has provided a group of four tone pictures. The gist of his material may be deduced from the title of the first of the group, "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle Before the Sacred Tree." With his usual skill a interpreting the newest ideas of our newest composers, Dr. Koussevitsky did his best to lend a meaning to this strange discordant group. The "Dance," following the first theme had, to be sure, a strongly marked rhythm, depending largely for its effect on the percussion instruments, whose players were asked to rise at the conclusion of the number.

Although the program carefully annotates the pictorial idea back of Mr. Martelli's work, and although the realistic roars of the lion and lioness in their lair are indubitably present, there were those in the audience who found themselves entirely out of sympathy with the weird harmonies and complex instrumentalization. They present interesting musical matter, perhaps, but for those who would hear more sustained tone, their brevity proved welcome. Yesterday's audience received them apathetically.

There was a good deal more enthusiasm for the Strauss Alpine Symphony which took up the latter half of the program. Again in one movement, with the program set forth by the composer himself, this favored work of one of the most eminent of living composers, depicts a pastoral scene in all its beauty. For his inspiration Strauss went back to nature, even to including the tinkling bells of the mountain flocks in the "Mountain Pasture" theme. With muted strings, a fanfare of muted trumpets and flowing melody, the symphony takes the listener from "Night" to "Night" again. An appreciative audience, in a more receptive mood, perhaps, because of the preceding novelty, listened attentively and applauded warmly.

JEWISH VETERANS

the peasants enter collective associations only when they demand it.

CH 15, 1930

NEW 'BAS RELIEFS' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Martelli's Work Heard First Time in America

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," Galliard's Sonata Complete Program

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was "Assyrian Bas Reliefs," a suite by Henri Martelli, a native of Corsica now living in Paris. Steinberg's free transcription for orchestra of a sonata by John Ernest Galliard, and Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," completed a miscellaneous program which took some 20 minutes less than the usual time to perform. The addition of a familiar and popular classic overture would no doubt have pleased the many listeners to whom the only good music is familiar music.

Martelli, now in his 30s, is French by citizenship and by training, despite his Italian name. He found inspiration for his "Bas Reliefs" in four fragments of Assyrian sculpture, depicting (1) "A winged Jinnee with the head of an eagle before the sacred tree"; (2) "A dance before a seated personage"; (3) "Lion and Lioness in their lair," and (4) "The army and musicians of Ashurbanipal." The work was written in 1928, and played yesterday for the first time in America.

Martelli's music has an unforced originality of style, and considerable imaginative power. The scoring for orchestra is unusual, with ingenious percussion effects, and no attempt to deafen the audience with perpetual sonorities. The lion, represented by a solo tuba, roars at moments with a hint of the naive naturalism of Haydn's "Creation." The dissonances, unrelieved by consonant harmonies, have the monotony and something of the crudity one associates with primitive and barbaric art. Martelli is obviously a composer of greater significance than most of the new names which so frequently figure on Dr Koussevitzsky's programs. More of his music should be heard here.

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" has commonly been regarded, even in Germany, as a relative failure, likely to be forgotten in a few years, though "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will insure the composer lasting fame. Yesterday's performance, on which Dr Koussevitzky lavished his most painstaking eloquence, did not reverse the unfavorable opinion one formed of this grandiose and chaotic work when it was first heard here in 1925.

It goes without saying that Strauss is a master of every device a composer can employ to manufacture something the unwary listener may take for a great work. The themes, insignificant in themselves, are worked out with amazing skill. The scoring for a huge orchestra, which includes every conceivable instrument from organ to cowbells, is superb. But only in certain passages that echo the earlier and greater Strauss is this symphony emotionally impressive. At the rest the listener's intellect may marvel, but his heart remains untouched.

Yesterday's concert made one more certain than ever that "progress music," music that attempts to tell a story or paint a picture or evoke a definite mood in the listener, is based on a misconception of the true limits of the art. Music, like mathematics, does not and cannot copy or represent the world in which we live, and in which the painters, the sculptors and the poets find their materials. It is a world in itself, a new universe to which men turn for a consolation and a hope too often denied them elsewhere.

The power of such pieces of "program music" as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan," or, to speak of lesser things, of Martelli's "Bas Reliefs," lies in the music, not in the artificial and labored attempts to direct the current of the listener's imagination toward particular objects. To admit these truth about music is not to deny, but rather to enhance its emotional and imaginative appeal. Is there any poem or any painting which could be used to add to the effect of the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony? The meaning of such music as that cannot be put into words or onto painted canvas.

Even such an inferior piece of music as yesterday's pretty but inconsequential sonata by Galliard, exhumed at Dr Koussevitsky's request by Steinberg, and freely arranged for orchestra, gains rather than loses by the absence of a "program" telling one what to see and what to feel while listening. This sonata, played with a somber intensity, a broadening and swelling of its phrases not in keeping with the 18th century, was appealing and effective.

Next week's program, all from Brahms, belongs to the Brahms Festival. It includes his second and third symphonies, and the "Academic Festival" overture. This time the Friday and Saturday subscribers will hear the same program, something not hitherto Dr Koussevitsky's practice at festivals.

P. R.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

72

6, 1930

C AND MUSIC

Boston March

Brahms Festival

A Novelty

Inspired, no doubt, by the great popular and artistic success of the Beethoven festival given to mark the centenary of the composer's death in 1927, Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra begin this Friday and Saturday a series of festival performances of the music of Brahms, in which a number of that master's chief works will be heard.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra in choral numbers, as they did at the Beethoven festival. The celebrated pianist Schnabel, especially noted for his playing of Brahms, will come from Berlin to take part in the festival. Margaret Matzenauer and other singers will assist. The seat sale has been very large.

The program for the pair of subscription concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series of this week begins the Brahms festival. This concert is not, unfortunately, to be heard by the general public. Every seat for both Friday and Saturday, except the few hundred "rush" seats in the second balcony on Friday, has been sold for the season. Only the few in the hands of ticket agents, or turned in at Symphony Hall to be sold for the endowment fund of the orchestra by subscribers unable to use them, are to be had.

The four extra concerts beginning next Sunday will really constitute the festival.

Festival Programs

Sunday afternoon, March 23 (a pension fund concert), the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the Second Pianoforte Concerto and the Fourth Symphony in E minor will be given, with Artur Schnabel as soloist.

Monday evening, March 24, the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will combine with the orchestra in the Song of Destiny and the German Requiem; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange.

Tuesday evening, March 25, a reduced chorus will present the Liebeslieder Waltzes. Artur Schnabel will give a group of pianoforte pieces, opus 119. Margaret Matzenauer will sing songs, and the Burgin String Quartet, with Artur Schnabel, will present the piano quintet.

Wednesday evening, March 26, the Rhapsody, with male chorus and Mme Matzenauer, will be given. The First Pianoforte Concerto, with Artur Schnabel as soloist, and the First Symphony in C minor will also be presented.

Although Artur Schnabel has made but a few appearances in this country, the German pianist has for many years been esteemed in Europe as one of the finest masters of his art—holding a special reputation as an interpreter of Brahms. Schnabel's only former appearance in Boston was when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Bruno Walter as guest conductor, in 1923.

Brahms Now Popular

There is still dispute over the merits of the music of Brahms. To many he is one of the very greatest of composers, to be named with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner. To others he is a much overrated musician, whose work is often dull and labored. In France, Brahms, like Tchaikovsky, has never won widespread popularity or high repute. His position there is akin to that of Mahler and Bruckner in the United States. In Germany, and wherever German musical influence has dominated, Brahms is now recognized as a supreme genius.

In Boston the popularity of his music has been of slow but sure growth. Even as late as 1900 waggish detractors of Brahms could say with some show of truth that the exits of Symphony Hall should be labeled "This way out in case of Brahms." It is a sober fact that audiences used to walk out almost en masse when one of his symphonies was to be played. So they did for the Franck symphony.

Many musicians were of course anti-Brahms because they were so strongly pro-Wagner. The two composers and their followers had professed to despise each other's music. One could not love both Wagner and Brahms until long after both composers were safely dead. Nowadays most people have forgotten the great gulf that once yawned between Wagnerites and Brahmsians. Wagner's music is much of it very popular with concert audiences. So is a good deal of Brahms.

This festival will afford an almost unprecedented opportunity to judge the whole work of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Mar. 17

From Boston to New York

IT WAS Dr. Koussevitzky who suggested to Monsieur Ravel that he should score for orchestra Musorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Ravel outdid himself in the transcription and through some years in Boston and in New York, as well as in Paris, the conductor reserved the manuscript for his own use. Last summer he authorized publication, and last autumn Mr. Stokowski was quick to add Ravel's version to the repertory of the Philadelphia Orchestra. No doubt there was much to praise in the performance, but no one, so far as report went, had hysterics in public.

That engaging pastime was reserved for New York last Thursday and Friday, when Mr. Toscanini played Ravel's arrangement at a Philharmonic Concert. At the end, shouts rose from the auditorium even as after the performance of "Bolero." One reviewer, next morning, was not content until he had used the adverb, "forever," which in view of the ordinary shortness of human memories, seems a large order. It is a pleasure also to read that "a very competent orchestra," meaning thereby Dr. Koussevitzky's, had also played Ravel's version in New York. Yes: it does the best it can, even if it must condescend to the considerable number of amusing provincials that help to people Manhattan. By the accounts of the reasonable, Mr. Toscanini did give an uncommonly eloquent performance, dramatizing and magnifying the ten pieces. And he, as everyone is aware, is no inciter of the hysterics that gurgle comically around him.

Brahms Festival

Artur Schnabel, the eminent pianist, to be the chief "assisting artist" at the Symphony Orchestra's Brahms Festival, is expected in New York tomorrow; in Boston on Wednesday. He will be heard first at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon in the Concerto in B-flat (No 2); again, on the following Tuesday evening, in the Quintet in F minor for Piano and Strings (the Burgin Quartet), the Intermezzi and Rhapsody for piano alone of Opus 119; on Wednesday evening, March 26, in the Concerto in D minor, No. 1. Mr. Schnabel will also play with the orchestra when it revisits New York in April. By exception he will use the Bechstein piano, to which he is accustomed in Europe.

An interesting and informing handbook of the festival written and compiled by John N. Burk of the staff at Symphony Hall, may be had for the asking and will be used as program-book outside the regular pair of Symphony Concerts. It surveys "Fifty Years of Brahms in Boston"; defines the position of Brahms in 1930; traverses, without too much analytical detail, the music to be played. . . . The demand for seats is clear evidence of an interested public."

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Twelve

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Schonberg's Bach, And Koussevitzky

Trans. Mar 18

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth of the season's Monday evening concerts. The program began with Schönberg's new arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat major commonly known as Saint Ann's; introduced Madame Renéé Longy Miquelle as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in D minor for Pianoforte (K. 466); repeated Strauss's Alpine Symphony from the concerts of last week-end.

The transcription, played at the beginning of the concert, received brilliant and illuminating performance. The writer is not among those who believe Bach so sacred that transcribing or arranging hand should never be laid upon him; nor that transcription or arrangement of his organ works will necessarily result in something less satisfactory than those organ works. The fact that such arrangements in the majority of cases have been less than completely satisfactory need not militate against the several outstandingly successful transscriptions from Bach. Let each case stand on its own merits. Accordingly, one observer found only enjoyment and satisfaction in the fugue of last evening. The several subjects were stated clearly and distinctly, the counterpoint flowed along freely and without clogged or obscured effect, climaxes built themselves grandly, the long descents into pianos and pianissimos, the ascents from them, could not possibly have been surpassed by any organ or organist. Organists who are accustomed to play the opening measures in the manner majestic (and that includes practically all of them) will of course be surprised at the soft beginning of the fugue with no more orchestra than a quartet of clarinets. With the prelude one begins to have one's doubts. True, the essential Bachian nobility and grandeur have not been affected. But the prelude seems on the whole overladen with orchestral effect. The sustained serenity of many portions of this work one can hardly find in the continual shifting from orchestral choir to orchestral choir, from sonority to sonority.

For Mozart's concerto Dr. Koussevitzky arranged his orchestra as few conductors ever have before him. He reduced it to the size of his usual Mozart orchestra, which is of course nothing new. But for that orchestra he chose players from the last desks of the respective orchestral divisions rather than from the first, which is the more usual custom. Thus, for the moment Mr. Sauvlet was concert master and Mr. Amerena flutist. And the orchestra was still the excellent Boston Symphony Orchestra. Madame Miquelle played in true Mozartian spirit. There was grace and charm in her playing and much refinement. As neatly, Dr. Koussevitzky and the little orchestra partnered her.

Came again the Alpine Symphony with its gorgeous orchestral coloring, its skillful, sonorous counterpoint, its panoramic outlook, its storm, its pastoral music, and its many reminiscent themes and motifs. All of this has been reviewed in detail in these columns as recently as last Saturday. There is much to admire in this symphony. There are many portions of great beauty; the orchestration is magnificent. But one can hardly deny that it falls short somewhat of the best of Strauss's work of maturity. There are procedures which one can best account for as old-age reactions. And yet Strauss was only fifty-one when he wrote this work. Franck and Verdi (to mention only two) did their very best work at a much more advanced age. Truly this symphony, so near-great, but with such obvious defects, offers the student more than one dilemma.—Needless to say it was most superbly played.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

MAR 16 1930

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony did some beautiful things in its two concerts and introduced at least one novelty. At the first concert, one of Haydn's Symphonies, that with the horn call, was exquisitely given. If Mr. Koussevitzky follows Mr. Toscanini's lead in playing Haydn, we may soon be as familiar with his symphonic works as we are with those of Beethoven

As a novelty, Louis Gruenberg's Jazz Suite was given at both concerts. As one critic remarked, this is not a jazz suite but sweet jazz. It is well, too well, orchestrated, with cleverness and obviously good schooling. But intrinsically it is not of great interest. It gives the same reaction that a well-written short story of slim content produces. Bloch's "Schelomo" was finely given, with the solo part well played by Jean Bedetti. An arrangement by Schoenberg, of all people, of a Bach Prelude and Fugue in E Flat was interesting. Much has been said and written of the wisdom of doing Bach works over for orchestra, and it is a far cry from Verklaerte Nacht to Bach, but when all's said and done, the result was neither unmusical nor uninteresting.

At the matinee concert the Gruenberg number was repeated. With this were heard the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius, the same composer's Violin Concerto in D Minor, played by Richard Burgin, and a Concerto Grosso by Lazar. The symphony is one of great interest. It has esoteric qualities which make criticism difficult after one hearing. It bears the stamp of its composer very strongly in the sombre beauty and individual turn of melody and the general harmonic structure. The violin work was in the repertoire of the late and lamented Maud Powell. It has a solo part of heroic difficulty and in invention and development less striking than the orchestral background against which it is set. The Lazar Concerto Grosso "in antique style" is, as one would suppose, a hark back to Handel. It is an agreeable, well-made work but not one to cause musicians to forsake its prototype.

THE VALUE OF PRACTISE.

As convincing an illustration of what practise will do is being shown by Serge Koussevitzky. When he came to this country, a few years ago, to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra he had not a great deal to offer. He hasn't anything exceptional yet, and may not have. But he has demonstrated how one can develop, if he tries continuously to do so.

Koussevitzky is aristocratic in bearing and suave. He radiates poise and personality, which help in an auditorium where a symphonic program is being performed. The last two concerts here of the Boston Symphony were filled with interest, and the men played with beauty of tone and a precision that made one doff the hat to their skill.

I doubt, however, that among wise persons—who know their orchestral muttons—Koussevitzky ever will be ranked very high. He is forceful and fortunate, but beyond that not, to my way of thinking, among the distinguished wielders of the baton.

(All Rights Reserved)

BOSTON SYMPHONY

"Bolero," Sensation of Season, to Be Played April 9.

"Bolero," the latest score of Maurice Ravel, which has had nation-wide attention this season, will be introduced to Hartford by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when the Boston Symphony orchestra makes it annual visit to give a concert in Bushnell Memorial hall on Wednesday evening, April 9, at 8:15. The first performance was given by Toscanini in New York last November. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston on December 6, with such pronounced success that it was repeated in January. He has also played it in other cities which the orchestra has visited.

"Bolero," written by Ida Rubinstein, who danced to the music in Paris last summer, consists simply of a constant, almost literal reptition of a theme in this characteristic Spanish rhythm. The piece begins pianissimo and increases gradually in tonal force until the long crescendo leads to a stupifying climax. To attain endless variety in color where there is not variety in notation and rhythm, this most skillful of French orchestrators uses almost every instrument in the orchestra in turn to state the theme as a solo. A drum gives the dance rhythm which is maintained throughout. A flute announces the theme, which is subsequently repeated by the clarinet, oboe d'amore, bassoon, saxophone and high saxophone. The solo trumpet and the trombone each state the theme with their characteristic color. Meanwhile the strings are introduced with combinations of wind instruments in gradually built-up dynamics, while the constant beat of the drum likewise gradually grows stronger. The piece ends in what has been described as a tornado of sound, with a surprising modulation at the very last.

This Bolero, dedicated to Ida Rubinstein, was brought out by her and danced by her in Paris in November, 1928. Alexandre Benoist designed the settings and the costume to represent a scene that Goya might have painted: a Spanish inn, with the dancer on a trestle table, men surrounding it. At first calm, the actors on the Parisian stage were little by little excited to frenzy as the dancer became more and more animated. Knives were drawn—the woman was tossed from arms to arms, until her partner intervened; they danced until quiet was restored. So was the scene described by French and English reporters. Seats for this concert are now available at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick will be filled.

Monday Symphony Concert 15

The fifth of the Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place at Symphony Hall last night. The program included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat (for organ), arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg. Mozart's Concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, Renée Longy-Miquelle, soloist, and Strauss's lengthy "Alpine" Symphony.

Surely Strauss has shown some discrimination in using his wind machine in this symphony, for even those instruments quite alien to it in structure seem occasionally long winded in kinship. Decidedly, this "Alpine" Symphony is not one of Strauss's major works.

Mme. Miquelle's reading of the Mozart Concerto was straightforward, brisk and even in mood. She found the gayety and the liveliness, if not the exquisite neatness and precision, for the melodious phrases. The warmths of the Romanza and the expressiveness she wreathed through its measures made it the most attractively interpreted section of the work.

Bach's music moved along at the apt pace which Mr. Koussevitzky chose for it. From his men he drew the familiar deep resonances, smooth, shining tones, and well chiseled phrases which he almost invariably brings to Bach's works. C. S. B.

Bklano p 101

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
MAR 19 1936

The Brahms Festival

With the regular programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will begin the Brahams festival which Dr. Koussevitzky has had in preparation for some time past. Set for this pair of concerts are the Second and Third Symphonies and the Academic Festival Overture.

The festival continues Sunday afternoon with the Haydn Variations; Piano Concerto No. 2, with Artur Schnabel as the soloist and the Fourth Symphony.

For Monday evening the program will feature the song of Destiny and the German Requiem, in which the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and soloists will assist.

Tuesday evening Libeslieder will be sung by the chorus; piano pieces will be played by Artur Schnabel; songs by Mme Matzenauer, and the Piano Quintet.

Wednesday evening's program includes the Rhapsody, with Mme. Matzenauer and the male chorus; the Piano Concerto No. 1 played by Mr. Schnabel and the First Symphony.

Appreciation of Brahms

A pamphlet describing the music to be performed at the Brahms festival mentioned above, notes also the general increase in the popularity of this composer's work in the last ten years. While the importance of Wagner, Mendelssohn or Tschaikowsky has varied with musical fashions, the contention is made that the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years.

Not so long ago a prediction that the symphonies of Brahms would ever be classed as general favorites would have been regarded as extravagant. As late as 1916 Markham Lee, in his book on Brahms said he was not, even in the best sense of the term, a popular composer. Further back the adjectives most frequently applied to his compositions were "austere," "harsh," "repellant," "obscure." Now it is doubtful that an audience listening to the First Symphony finds any of those qualities in it.

A pioneer in the effort in Boston to cultivate an appreciation of Brahms was George Henschel, who took charge of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881 and persisted in giving these works a place on his programs. Previous to that Carl Zerrahn had introduced the First Symphony with his Harvard Musical Society orchestra in 1878. Later he gave the Second Symphony. But both were received coldly. Theodore Thomas, on occasional visits, did his best for Brahms? Henschel conducted the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture and the Alto Rhapsody. Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third, of which one critic said "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer. The Transcript reviewer pronounced the Haydn Variations "stupendous" but another critic dismissed them as "twenty minutes wasted." Gericke presented the Fourth Symphony and polished and perfected its presentation in subsequent performances. Dr. Leopold Damrosch introduced it to New York.

The Minority Grows

By this time, however, the symphonies were gaining many musical friends. The minority was steadily growing. And in Boston this was largely due to the clarity and thorough musicianship of Gericke's performances. But it remained for Arthur Nikisch, who became conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1889, to reveal to Bostonians tha the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance.

At the news of Brahms' death on April 3, 1897, Emil Pauer arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10 a commemorative program including the Tragic Overture, Vier Ernste Gesaenge, the Concerto for the violin and Cello and the Fourth Symphony in E minor. The soloists were Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

Boston, says the writer of the pamphlet, has been fortunate in its Brahms conductors, had surely one of the finest of them in Dr. Muck. "This retrospect," he says, "is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town."

TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Koussevitzky, Conductor, Is An Industrious Worker.

Sergei Koussevitzky is an indefatigable walker. Before our average business men have opened their eyes, Mr. Koussevitzky is taking his daily ante-breakfast stroll around Jamaica Pond with his inseparable companion, "Droll." Droll is a Boston terrier. The Koussevitzkys adopted him two years ago. Droll has crossed the Atlantic for three summers, to be near at hand during his master's spring seasons in Paris.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

The feature of the splendid interesting program which will be announced in a few days, is the Bolero by Ravel which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to New York audiences this season with tremendous success. Tickets are now on sale for the Hartford concert at Bushnell hall, April 9, at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Good seats are now available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAR 2 1936

THIS afternoon in Symphony hall, Boston, the first concert in the Brahms Festival was performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The festival will continue for five more days, ending Wednesday, March 26. The orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky will be assisted in various Brahms compositions by the Harvard Glee club; Radcliffe Choral society; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Frazer Gange, baritone, and the Burgin String quartet. Works to be performed include the Academic Festival overture; Symphonies No. 1, 2, 3 and 4; Concerto No. 2 for piano and orchestra; German Requiem for solo voices, chorus and orchestra; Song of Destiny, for chorus and orchestra; Concerto for piano; Variations on Haydn theme; Piano Quintet in F-minor; Rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra; Liebeslieder Waltzes, for piano duet and four vocal parts; a group of piano pieces and a group of songs.

Johannes Brahms' significance in the musical world came about through an extremely slow process. Aside from Beethoven and Wagner, hardly any other nineteenth century composer but Brahms offers material sufficient and substantial enough to warrant a festival so elaborate in character as the present one. Brahms was born in Hamburg in 1833 and died in Vienna in 1897. At the early age of 14 he made his debut as a pianist and was acclaimed in subsequent concert tours, winning such an extravagant term from Liszt as "an apostle of extreme romanticism." Yet Brahms, unmoved by either praise or censure, became the standard bearer of the classic past instead of scaling Olympian heights along a newer path.

Those interested in musical history know of the Brahms-Wagner and the Brahms-Bruckner wars. The opponents of Wagner, led by Hanslick, put Brahms forward as the champion of what they termed "absolute music," although Brahms was not at all hostile to Wagner. On the contrary he was a close student of Wagner's scores and even defended him against what he felt was unjust criticism. Later Brahms became the target of criticism almost as bitter as that levelled at the Divine Richard himself.

In his first symphony in C-minor, Brahms showed such a firm grasp of his subject and resources, that Von Bulow characterized it the "tenth symphony," implying that it was worthy of lineal descent from Beethoven's nine works. As was to be expected, Brahms' detractors saw in the appellation a chance to discount the work as a slavish imitation of Beethoven, particularly the similarily of its finale to the finale of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. A comparison, note by note, reveals a similarity more of a rhythmic and emotional character than of musical structure. It has been asked frequently by many of Brahms' champions what other "first" symphony ever showed such a proud and imposing independence? Furthermore this first symphony with its rugged main theme represents the mature Brahms, to which the succeeding three symphonies add little of a technical nature.

Though Brahms in the higher critical and musical circles is judged largely by his massive symphonies, and the great German Requiem, he composed a a very extensive array of works of a lighter, more intimate nature.

THIS CLIPP
LAWRENCE ASS.
EAGLE
MAR 2 1936

THIS afternoon in Symphony hall, Boston, the first concert in the Brahms Festival was performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The festival will continue for five more days, ending Wednesday, March 26. The orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky will be assisted in various Brahms compositions by the Harvard Glee club; Radcliffe Choral society; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Frazer Gange, baritone, and the Burgin String quartet. Works to be performed include the Academic Festival overture; Symphonies No. 1, 2, 3 and 4; Concerto No. 2 for piano and orchestra; German Requiem for solo voices, chorus and orchestra; Song of Destiny, for chorus and orchestra; Concerto for piano; Variations on Haydn theme; Piano Quintet in F-minor; Rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra; Liebeslieder Waltzes, for piano duet and four vocal parts; a group of piano pieces and a group of songs.

Johannes Brahms' significance in the musical world came about through an extremely slow process. Aside from Beethoven and Wagner, hardly any other nineteenth century composer but Brahms offers material sufficient and substantial enough to warrant a festival so elaborate in character as the present one. Brahms was born in Hamburg in 1833 and died in Vienna in 1897. At the early age of 14 he made his debut as a pianist and was acclaimed in subsequent concert tours, winning such an extravagant term from Liszt as "an apostle of extreme romanticism." Yet Brahms, unmoved by either praise or censure, became the standard bearer of the classic past instead of scaling Olympian heights along a newer path.

Those interested in musical history know of the Brahms-Wagner and the Brahms-Bruckner wars. The opponents of Wagner, led by Hanslick, put Brahms forward as the champion of what they termed "absolute music," although Brahms was not at all hostile to Wagner. On the contrary he scores t what Later riticism at the -minor, rasp of at Von h symworthy h's nine

Brahms'

MUSIC CONSERVATORY MEASURE INTRODUCED

After a consultation with leaders in music circles and securing the views of many musicians throughout the country, Representative Gavagan of New York has introduced a bill in the House of Representatives at Washington for the establishment of a National Conservatory of Music in Washington, with branches in various sections of the country. It is understood that an identical bill is to be presented in the Senate. The bill was referred to the House committee on education which will hold hearings on it, on dates not yet decided upon.

detractors saw in the appellation a chance to discount the work as a slavish imitation of Beethoven, particularly the similarily of its finale to the finale of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. A comparison, note by note, reveals a similarity more of a rhythmic and emotional character than of musical structure. It has been asked frequently by many of Brahms' champions what other "first" symphony ever showed such a proud and imposing independence? Furthermore this first symphony with its rugged main theme represents the mature Brahms, to which the succeeding three symphonies add little of a technical nature.

Though Brahms in the higher critical and musical circles is judged largely by his massive symphonies, and the great German Requiem, he composed a a very extensive array of works of a lighter, more intimate nature.

ony
ewell
e

its fare-Provi-
in the ky has ony in and the Bolero," mposer incipal created of many critics is the novelty of the season. There will also be Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, oput 6, No. 10, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina."

The orchestra is now in the midst of a Brahms festival in Symphony Hal, Boston. It began last Friday and continues through Wednesday, the programs embracing the principal orchestral, choral and Chamber works of the composer.

This afternoon, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist, they are playing the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, opus 56a; Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, opus 83, and Symphony No. 4 in 1-minor, opus 98. Tomorrow night the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone, will assist in "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, opus 54, and "A German Requiem" for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, opus 45.

Tuesday night the "Liebeslieder Waltzes," for pianoforte duet and four vocal parts, opus 52, will open the program, the work being given by a small chorus from the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs and Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth at the pianos. Arthur Schnabel will play a group of piano pieces and Margaret Matzenaue will sing a group of songs. The progra closes with the Piano Quintet in minor, opus 34a, played by Mr. Schn and the Burgin String Quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Brahms Festival Features Week In Boston Music

Koussevitzky Offers Major Works; Artur Schnabel, Mme. Matzenauer Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, is holding a Brahms festival at Symphony Hall, which h ay and Sategular sub-of the Acad the third oncert takes a program the B flat ourth symrill be the rogram is f Destiny" d the Gere Harvard ne soloists lette Vree-nge, baryhe Liebesny a small e Club and ith Dr. A.

Woodworth
at the pianos. Mr. Schnabel will play the Intermezzi in B minor, E minor and C major and the E flat rhapsody. Mme. Matzenauer will sing "Sapphische Ode," "Von ewiger Liebe," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Meine Liebe ist grün," and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin Quartet will play the F minor piano quintet, Op. 34a

The closing festival concert will be Wednesday evening, when the Harvard Glee Club and orchestra will take part in the rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist; Mr. Schnabel will play the D minor piano concerto, and the final number will be the first symphony.

Notes in the announcing pamphlet compare the present popularity of Brahms with the somewhat hostile reception his music received in Boston in the late '70s and early '80s. But conductors were indefatigable, nevertheless. Carl Zerrahn and the Harvard Musical Society introduced the first two symphonies to Boston in 1878 and 1879. The Boston Symphony, under George (now Sir George) Henschel, gave the first two symphonies, the "Tragic" Overture and Alto Rhaapsody in its first season. Wilhelm Gericke introduced the third to Boston in 1884. He planned the American premiere of the fourth for November 29, 1886, but, not satisfied with the performance at the public rehearsal, postponed the formal concert premiere to December 23. During the interval, Leopold Damrosch and the Symphony Society had played it in New York.

By 1885 the "Transcript" critic noted that Brahms was gaining with the Boston public, although many still walked out from his symphonies, and the Nikisch regime of 1889-'93 made Boston known as a Brahms center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their Brahms Festival last evening in that city with the composer's "Academic Festival" Overture and Second and Third Symphonies. The program will be repeated tonight. Tomorrow afternoon the Fourth Symphony, variation on a theme by Haydn and the Piano Concerto in B flat, No. 2, with Artur Schnabel as soloist will be the program. Monday evening "A Song of Destiny" and "A German Requiem" will be given by the orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe choruses conducted respectively by Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Tuesday evening the Burgin String Quartet will play the Quintet in F minor with Mr. Schnabel, who will also play Pianoforte Works, the mixed chorus will sing "Liebeslieder."

Margaret Matzenauer will sing four songs. The Festival will close Wednesday evening, the orchestra playing the First Symphony, Mr. Schnabel the Piano Concerto in D minor and the male chorus and orchestra giving the Rhapsody, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

MAR 19 1930

The Brahms Festival

With the regular programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will begin the Brahams festival which Dr. Koussevitzky has had in preparation for some time past. Set for this pair of concerts are the Second and Third Symphonies and the Academic Festival Overture.

The festival continues Sunday afternoon with the Haydn Variations; Piano Concerto No. 2, with Artur Schnabel as the soloist and the Fourth Symphony.

For Monday evening the program will feature the song of Destiny and the German Requiem, in which the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and soloists will assist.

Tuesday evening Libeslieder will be sung by the chorus; piano pieces will be played by Artur Schnabel; songs by Mme Matzenauer, and the Piano Quintet.

Wednesday evening's program includes the Rhapsody, with Mme. Matzenauer and the male chorus; the Piano Concerto No. 1 played by Mr. Schnabel and the First Symphony.

Appreciation of Brahms

A pamphlet describing the music to be performed at the Brahms festival mentioned above, notes also the general increase in the popularity of this composer's work in the last ten years. While the importance of Wagner, Mendelssohn or Tschaikowsky has varied with musical fashions, the contention is made that the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years.

Not so long ago a prediction that the symphonies of Brahms would ever be classed as general favorites would have been regarded as extravagant. As late as 1916 Markham Lee, in his book on Brahms said he was not, even in the best sense of the term, a popular composer. Further back the adjectives most frequently applied to his compositions were "austere," "harsh," "repellant," "obscure." Now it is doubtful that an audience listening to the First Symphony finds any of those qualities in it.

A pioneer in the effort in Boston to cultivate an appreciation of Brahms was George Henschel, who took charge of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881 and persisted in giving these works a place on his programs. Previous to that Carl Zerrahn had introduced the First Symphony with his Harvard Musical Society orchestra in 1878. Later he gave the Second Symphony. But both were received coldly. Theodore Thomas, on occasional visits, did his best for Brahms? Henschel conducted the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture and the Alto Rhapsody. Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third, of which one critic said "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer. The Transcript reviewer pronounced the Haydn Variations "stupendous" but another critic dismissed them as "twenty minutes wasted." Gericke presented the Fourth Symphony and polished and perfected its presentation in subsequent performances. Dr. Leopold Damrosch introduced it to New York.

The Minority Grows

By this time, however, the symphonies were gaining many musical friends. The minority was steadily growing. And in Boston this was largely due to the clarity and thorough musicianship of Gericke's performances. But it remained for Arthur Nikisch, who became conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1889, to reveal to Bostonians tha the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance.

At the news of Brahms' death on April 3, 1897, Emil Pauer arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10 a commemorative program including the Tragic Overture, Vier Ernste Gesaenge, the Concerto for the violin and Cello and the Fourth Symphony in E minor. The soloists were Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

Boston, says the writer of the pamphlet, has been fortunate in its Brahms conductors, had surely one of the finest of them in Dr. Muck. "This retrospect," he says, "is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town."

TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Koussevitzky, Conductor, Is An Industrious Worker.

Sergei Koussevitzky is an indefatigable walker. Before our average business men have opened their eyes, Mr. Koussevitzky is taking his daily ante-breakfast stroll around Jamaica Pond with his inseparable companion, "Droll." Droll is a Boston terrier. The Koussevitzkys adopted him two years ago. Droll has crossed the Atlantic for three summers, to be near at hand during his master's spring seasons in Paris.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

The feature of the splendid interesting program which will be announced in a few days, is the Bolero by Ravel which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to New York audiences this season with tremendous success. Tickets are now on sale for the Hartford concert at Bushnell hall, April 9, at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Good seats are now available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAR 1 1930

THIS hall, the forme phony orches tinue for five nesday, Mar
by Serge Ko in various B Harvard Gle society; Artu garet Matzen nette Vreela baritone, and Works to b Academic F
nies No. 1, for piano a quiem for s chestra; So and orchest Variations Quintet in solo, male eslieder W four vocal pieces and Johannes musical wo extremely Beethoven other nin but Brah cient and rant a fes
ter as the born in in Vienna of 14 he and was cert tours, term from orts enthusiast have been antic ie Convertible Coupe. Respons h car matches both in appearan at was designed so that a clubb

HTING, IGNITIC
AUTOMOBILES,
nd BUSSES
Service for c Shock Absorbe
$28.0

merly $50.00—

treme romanticism." Yet Brahms, unmoved by either praise or censure, became the standard bearer of the classic past instead of scaling Olympian heights along a newer path.

Those interested in musical history know of the Brahms-Wagner and the Brahms-Bruckner wars. The opponents of Wagner, led by Hanslick, put Brahms forward as the champion of what they termed "absolute music," although Brahms was not at all hostile to Wagner. On the contrary he was a close student of Wagner's scores and even defended him against what he felt was unjust criticism. Later Brahms became the target of criticism almost as bitter as that levelled at the Divine Richard himself.

In his first symphony in C-minor, Brahms showed such a firm grasp of his subject and resources, that Von Bulow characterized it the "tenth symphony," implying that it was worthy of lineal descent from Beethoven's nine works. As was to be expected, Brahms'

THIS CLIPP
WRENCE ASS.
EAGLE

2 1930

afternoon in Symphony all, Boston, th first concert in he Brahms Festival was performed by the Boston Symorchestra. The festival will confor five more days, ending Wedy, March 26. The orchestra, led erge Koussevitzky will be assisted arious Brahms compositions by the vard Glee club; Radcliffe Choral iety; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Marret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Frazer Gange, aritone, and the Burgin String quartet. Works to be performed include the Academic Festival overture; Symphonies No. 1, 2, 3 and 4; Concerto No. 2 for [illegible] German Re- quie che and Var Qui solo eslie four pied J mus extr Beet othe but cien rant ter born in V of 1 and cert t term

HTING, IGNITION
AUTOMOBILES,
nd BUSSES Service for c Shock Absorbers
$28.00

treme romanticism." Yet Brahms, unmoved by either praise or censure, became the standard bearer of the classic past instead of scaling Olympian heights along a newer path.

Those interested in musical history know of the Brahms-Wagner and the Brahms-Bruckner wars. The opponents of Wagner, led by Hanslick, put Brahms forward as the champion of what they termed "absolute music," although Brahms was not at all hostile to Wagner. On the contrary he was a close student of Wagner's scores and even defended him against what he felt was unjust criticism. Later Brahms became the target of criticism almost as bitter as that levelled at the Divine Richard himself.

In his first symphony in C-minor, Brahms showed such a firm grasp of his subject and resources, that Von Bulow characterized it the "tenth symphony," implying that it was worthy of lineal descent from Beethoven's nine works. As was to be expected, Brahms' [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR

Last Concert of Boston Symphony

Orchestra Makes Farewell Appearance Here on Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony makes its farewell appearance of the season in Providence on Tuesday night, April 1, in the Albee Theatre. Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major to close the series here and the program. Also billed is Ravel's "Bolero," the latest score of the French composer which, having been played by principal orchestras all over the world, has created a sensation and in the opinion of many critics is the novelty of the season. There will also be Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, oput 6, No. 10, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina."

The orchestra is now in the midst of a Brahms festival in Symphony Hal, Boston. It began last Friday and continues through Wednesday, the programs embracing the principal orchestral, choral and Chamber works of the composer.

This afternoon, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist, they are playing the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, opus 56a; Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, opus 83, and Symphony No. 4 in 1-minor, opus 98. Tomorrow night the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone, will assist in "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, opus 54, and "A German Requiem" for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, opus 45.

Tuesday night the "Liebeslieder Waltzes," for pianoforte duet and four vocal parts, opus 52, will open the program, the work being given by a small chorus from the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs and Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth at the pianos. Arthur Schnabel will play a group of piano pieces and Margaret Matzenaue will sing a group of songs. The progra closes with the Piano Quintet in minor, opus 34a, played by Mr. Schn and the Burgin String Quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

73

Brahms Festival Features Week In Boston Music

Koussevitzky Offers Major Works; Artur Schnabel, Mme. Matzenauer Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, is holding a Brahms festival at Symphony Hall, which began last Friday and Saturday in the orchestra's regular subscription with a program of the Academic Festival Overture and the third and second symphonies.

The first special festival concert takes place this afternoon with a program including Haydn variations, the B flat piano concerto and the fourth symphony. Artur Schnabel will be the soloist.

Tomorrow evening's program is choral, with the "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied), Op. 54, and the German Requiem, sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses. The soloists in the Requiem will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, barytone. On Tuesday evening the Liebeslieder Waltzes will be sung by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, with Dr. A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth at the pianos. Mr. Schnabel will play the Intermezzi in B minor, E minor and C major and the E flat rhapsody. Mme. Matzenauer will sing "Sapphische Ode," "Von ewiger Liebe," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Meine Liebe ist grün," and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin Quartet will play the F minor piano quintet, Op. 34a

The closing festival concert will be Wednesday evening, when the Harvard Glee Club and orchestra will take part in the rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist; Mr. Schnabel will play the D minor piano concerto, and the final number will be the first symphony.

Notes in the announcing pamphlet compare the present popularity of Brahms with the somewhat hostile reception his music received in Boston in the late '70s and early '80s. But conductors were indefatigable, nevertheless. Carl Zerrahn and the Harvard Musical Society introduced the first two symphonies to Boston in 1878 and 1879. The Boston Symphony, under George (now Sir George) Henschel, gave the first two symphonies, the "Tragic" Overture and Alto Rhaapsody in its first season. Wilhelm Gericke introduced the third to Boston in 1884. He planned the American premiere of the fourth for November 29, 1886, but, not satisfied with the performance at the public rehearsal, postponed the formal concert premiere to December 23. During the interval, Leopold Damrosch and the Symphony Society had played it in New York.

By 1885 the "Transcript" critic noted that Brahms was gaining with the Boston public, although many still walked out from his symphonies, and the Nikisch regime of 1889-'93 made Boston known as a Brahms center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their Brahms Festival last evening in that city with the composer's "Academic Festival" Overture and Second and Third Symphonies. The program will be repeated tonight. Tomorrow afternoon the Fourth Symphony, variation on a theme by Haydn and the Piano Concerto in B flat, No. 2, with Artur Schnabel as soloist will be the program. Monday evening "A Song of Destiny" and "A German Requiem" will be given by the orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe choruses conducted respectively by Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Tuesday evening the Burgin String Quartet will play the Quintet in F minor with Mr. Schnabel, who will also play Pianoforte Works, the mixed chorus will sing "Liebeslieder."

Margaret Matzenauer will sing four songs. The Festival will close Wednesday evening, the orchestra playing the First Symphony, Mr. Schnabel the Piano Concerto in D minor and the male chorus and orchestra giving the Rhapsody, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 24

A Brahms Festival

Devoting a week to six concerts consisting wholly of the music of Brahms, the Boston Symphony Orchestra bears witness to the notable growth and change of a musical reputation. Written during the last half of the last century, the music of Brahms was first performed in the United States in the years between 1880 and 1900, a period when the established orchestras of today were first being organized and when the musical taste of the public was first being fashioned. In those days of bustles and side-burns, the symphonies of Beethoven were respected and admired, as they are today, but aside from a few of the symphonies of Mendelssohn and of Mozart they were virtually the Alpha and Omega of symphonic music to the audiences of the time. In the West, Theodore Thomas was instructing his hearers in the beauties of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, but for the most part the overtures of Rossini and the like were held in higher favor. The Italian tradition, deriving from the operas, was strongly implanted. In the ears of most music-lovers save such audacious upstarts as Henry Kriehbel and Walter Damrosch, the music of Wagner was outlandish and barbaric stuff.

Granting the taste of the time, the young generation that hears the music of Brahms can only with difficulty understand how their elders came to form such a strange initial impression of it. Many of the elders themselves may wonder how they believed and averred that the romantic and lyric music which they hear today was "austere" and "harsh." Listening to the translucent and clear phrases of the Third Symphony they may well wonder how they ever agreed that it was "repellent," not to say "obscure." Yet in passing such judgments, they were not without authority. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance of the Second Symphony, so learned a pundit as John S. Dwight declared coldly that even Sterndale Bennett—who is he?—could have written a better. The same symphony Mr. Lawrence Gilman now describes as "an open window into a poet's heart." For the right to hear the music of Brahms, those few who learned to admire it had to fight battles, journalistic and social, no less bitter than those of the minority today which insists that it be entitled occasionally at least to hear the music of Hindemith and Bartok.

The legend that Brahms wrote only dull music in which pedants could take delight persisted long, even down to the present, when the opinion seems wholly without justification, save perhaps when certain pages of his orchestra and pianistic variations are considered. With regard to the great bulk of his scores, however, such mists of misunderstanding have long since been burned away by the warm and sunny nature of the music itself. The man who could write the Academic Festival Overture around the drinking songs of university students, who could compose the stupendously dramatic first measures of the First Symphony, who could relax to the pastoral attitude of the Second Symphony is obviously no writer of dry notes on dry staves.

Final proof of the change that the reputation of Brahms has undergone in thirty years is the circumstance that [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GAZETTE
Rockland, Me.
3
MAR 25 1930

Inspired probably by the great popular and artistic success of the Beethoven festival given to mark the centenary of the composer's death in 1927, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday a series of festival performances of the music of Brahms, in which a number of that master's chief works will be presented. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra in choral numbers, as they did at the Beethoven festival. The celebrated pianist, Schnabel, noted particularly for his playing of Brahms, will come from Berlin to take part in the festival, and Margaret Matzenauer and other singers of note will assist.

The four extra concerts beginning tomorrow really constitute the festival. Tomorrow afternoon, March 23 (a pension fund concert) the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the Second Pianoforte Concerto and the Fourth Symphony in E Minor will be given, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist

* * * *

There is still dispute over the merits of the music of Brahms. To many he is one of the very greatest of composers, to be named with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner. To others he is a much overrated musician, whose work is often dull and labored. In France, Brahms has never won widespread popularity or high repute. But in Germany and wherever German musical influence has dominated, he is now recognized as a supreme genius. In this country the popularity of his music has been of slow but steady growth.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Koussevitzky Offers Ravel's "Bolero" Here Next Tuesday

Long Awaited Presentation of New Work to Mark Close of Symphony Season by Boston Players in This City.—Second Symphony, Given Last Year, Also to Be on Final Program

With the appearance next Tuesday of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present season of symphony orchestra concerts comes to an end.

The program:

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air: Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro

Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel .....Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

The season itself, though by no means remarkable, cannot be called in any sense a lean one. From the symphony storeroom have been brought the Beethoven Fifth, the Beethoven Seventh, the Tschaikowsky Sixth, the Schumann First, the Brahms Second, and the Brahms Fourth. Wagner, as usual, contributed his share; the Faust Overture, the Excerpts from the Meistersingers, the Tannhauser overture; while for modern taste came offerings from Sibelius, Gruenberg, Stravinsky, Ravel, and McKinley; and among these a judicious sprinkling of celebrities from ages early and late.

The staple of the concert next week will be a borrowing from the Brahms festival in Boston. Of the music played in that Symphony Hall observance, Dr. [illegible]tzky has elected to play us the [illegible] which he gave us [illegible]e heard at Cleve[illegible]h ago at the [illegible]n Infantry [illegible]een long [illegible]eard with [illegible]usiasm in [illegible] would be [illegible]ounts of the new work tell [illegible]nted in the staid [illegible]sic there, while parts, at least, of other audiences have been voluble in their appreciation.

The Fourth Chance

The Brahms Second Symphony ought to be fairly familiar to those who give such things close attention; for it has been played here at brief intervals three times since 1927 (Feb. 15, 1927; Dec. 4, 1928; Feb. 18, 1930). Now this fourth adventure will give us an opportunity to meet once more an agreeable acquaintance and to compare the treatment it receives at the hands of two conductors closely related by national ties and characteristics at least.

Those who heard Nikolai Sokoloff's interpretation a month ago will recall his strongly drawn lines, his brilliant shadings, the lambent coloring of his strings and the sunshine of his reeds and woodwind in general, the precision of his attacks, the positiveness of his tempos, and the rugged strength of the whole performance. In what respect Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation differs from that of Dr. Sokoloff we shall soon learn if we do not know already.

The Symphony itself needs at this time no comment; it is sufficient to repeat Dr. Sokoloff's brief characterization: "Here the keynote is geniality, healthy, robust optimism; and it is only in the slow movement that there is any deviation from the path, and there it is only to ponder profoundly, humanwise, in the manner of a Bach, the deeper verities, and always with melody, eloquent, resourceful, and tenderly moving, as the infallible guide."

On a Classic Form

Ravel, the finished composer, French of the French, the artist so skilled that he can conceal his art at will, we might hear more often with profit, regardless of the date or type of composition heard; for his earliest works, like his latest, display wit, subtlety, emotional restraint and an irony beneath which he more or less successfully conceals his emotional intent.

His form is classical in its symmetry, no matter with what trappings of modern harmonies he may happen to drape it; and his lyricism is colored with dashes of humor, malice, comedy, irony and a cynicism that always falls just short of malevolence. For his ability to compress much into the smaller forms, we might turn to his Trio—simple and solid, with its classical outlines, whatever may be said of its harmonies—and his sonata for violin and violoncello, a whole symphonic circle, reduced to the minimum orchestration.

Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" we heard in company with the Brahms Second Symphony at the concert of the Cleveland orchestra. "It is to Rimsky-Korsakoff—that noble rescuer of the unfinished works of his gifted but wayward and short-lived contemporaries—to whom we are indebted for this excerpt from Moussorgsky's second opera."

Just how much of the work is Moussorgsky's we shall never know. Rimsky-Korsakoff says, "Much had to be altered, abridged and added. In acts I and II there turned up much that was superfluous, musically ugly and a drag on the scene. In act V, on the contrary, much was lacking altogether, while a good deal existed only in the roughest of rough draft records. The parts of the opera that the composer had instrumentated I re-orchestrated and, I hope, for the better. All the rest was instrumentated by me, too; I, again, made the arrangement for the piano. By the end of the summer the entire work on Kovantchina could not be finished and I wrote the last of it in St. Petersburg." There is more, but let it rest. Poor Moussorgsky!

Handel's concerto is the sixth of the 12 grand concertos for strings. It consists of a dialogue between a group of soloists and the chorus of instruments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played here the fifth of the series on March 20, 1928.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Borrowing from the Brahms Festival

Koussevitzky Will Bring the Second Symphony Again and Offer Ravel's Noisily Heralded "Bolero" Here for the First Time.—Season's End

With the appearance next Tuesday of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present season of symphony orchestra concerts comes to an end.

The season itself, though by no means remarkable, cannot be called in any sense a lean one. From the symphony storeroom have been brought the Beethoven Fifth, the Beethoven Seventh, the Tschaikowsky Sixth, the Schumann First, the Brahms Second, and the Brahms Fourth. Wagner, as usual, contributed his share; the Faust Overture, the Excerpts from the Meistersingers, the Tannhauser overture; while for modern taste came offerings from Sibelius, Gruenberg, Stravinsky, Ravel, and McKinley; and among these a judicious sprinkling of celebrities from ages early and late.

The staple of the concert next week will be a borrowing from the Brahms festival in Boston. Of the music played in that Symphony Hall observance, Dr. Koussevitzky has elected to play us the Second Symphony, which he gave us last season and which we heard at Cleveland hands only a month ago at the Music Association concert in Infantry Hall.

The Ravel "Bolero" has been long awaited by many here who heard with wistfulness the tales of enthusiasm in distant halls and wished it would be offered them too. The accounts of the Boston premiere of this new work tell of cheering unprecedented in the staid precincts of music there, while parts, at least, of other audiences have been voluble in their appreciation.

The Fourth Chance

The Brahms Second Symphony ought to be fairly familiar to those who give such things close attention; for it has been played here at brief intervals three times since 1927 (Feb. 15, 1927; Dec. 4, 1928; Feb. 18, 1930). Now this fourth adventure will give us an opportunity to meet once more an agreeable acquaintance and to compare the treatment it receives at the hands of two conductors closely related by national ties and characteristics at least.

Those who heard Nikolai Sokoloff's interpretation a month ago will recall his strongly drawn lines, his brilliant shadings, the lambent coloring of his strings and the sunshine of his reeds and woodwind in general, the precision of his attacks, the positiveness of his tempos, and the rugged strength of the whole performance. In what respect Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation differs from that of Dr. Sokoloff we shall soon learn if we do not know already.

The Symphony itself needs at this time no comment; it is sufficient to repeat Dr. Sokoloff's brief characterization: "Here the keynote is geniality, healthy, robust optimism; and it is only in the slow movement that there is any deviation from the path, and there it is only to ponder profoundly, humanwise, in the manner of a Bach, the deeper verities, and always with melody, eloquent, resourceful, and tenderly moving, as the infallible guide."

On a Classic Form

Ravel, the finished composer, French of the French, the artist so skilled that he can conceal his art at will, we might hear more often with profit, regardless of the date or type of composition heard; for his earliest works, like his latest, display wit, subtlety, emotional restraint and an irony beneath which he more or less successfully conceals his emotional intent.

His form is classical in its symmetry, no matter with what trappings of modern harmonies he may happen to drape it; and his lyricism is colored with dashes of humor, malice, comedy, irony and a cynicism that always falls just short of malevolence. For his ability to compress much into the smaller forms, we might turn to his Trio—simple and solid, with its classical outlines, whatever may be said of its harmonies—and his sonata for violin and violoncello, a whole symphonic circle, reduced to the minimum orchestration.

Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" we heard in company with the Brahms Second Symphony at the concert of the Cleveland orchestra. "It is to Rimsky-Korsakoff—that noble rescuer of the unfinished works of his gifted but wayward and short-lived contemporaries—to whom we are indebted for this excerpt from Moussorgsky's second opera."

Just how much of the work is Moussorgsky's we shall never know. Rimsky-Korsakoff says, "Much had to be altered, abridged and added. In acts I and II there turned up much that was superfluous, musically ugly and a drag on the scene. In act V, on the contrary, much was lacking altogether, while a good deal existed only in the roughest of rough draft records. The parts of the opera that the composer had instrumen-

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air: Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro

Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel .....'Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

tated I re-orchestrated and, I hope, for the better. All the rest was instrumentated by me, too; I, again, made the arrangement for the piano. By the end of the summer the entire work on Kovantchina could not be finished and I wrote the last of it in St. Petersburg." There is more, but let it rest. Poor Moussorgsky!

Handel's concerto is the sixth of the 12 grand concertos for strings. It consists of a dialogue between a group of soloists and the chorus of instruments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played here the fifth of the series on March 20, 1928.

M. C. W.

SYMPHONY BY SIBELIUS IS REPEATED

By MOSES SMITH

HAVING spent much labor on the preparation and performance of the Brahms Festival, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, present for this week's regular symphony concerts a program that consists mostly of repetitions of works heard earlier in the season.

The single exception is Walter Piston's "Suite for Orchestra;" and, as if to lighten Mr. Koussevitzky's work the more, the piece is conducted by the composer. This piece consists of three movements, the first of which recalls jazz and blues often, the second is slow and atmospheric, and the third is a sort of march fugue.

As presented at yesterday's matinee the music is often inspiriting; the fast sections are markedly rhythmical. It is often "derivative." We detected—or thought we did—traces of Ravel, Honegger and, believe it or not, George Gershwin. When the classic shades of Harvard (where Mr. Piston teaches) reflect even mildly the light of Tin Pan Alley, jazz has become very respectable indeed.

Yet we were not greatly stirred by the music. There was a tendency to anemia, except in the third movement which had an interesting thematic basis and was well, though briefly, worked out. In fact, brevity is the most respected virtue today. The performance seemed to us excellent, and Mr. Piston, a conductor of unusual capacity.

The other numbers were Haydyn's symphony in D major (with the horn call), Sibelius' sixth symphony and Schorberg's orchestration of a Bach prelude and fugue in E-flat for organ. Our principal interest was in the Sibelius. Hearing it for the third time, we regard it as a little masterpiece.

Plays Remaining

INCORRECT PAGINATION

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 4

A Brahms Festival

Devoting a week to six concerts consisting wholly of the music of Brahms, the Boston Symphony Orchestra bears witness to the notable growth and change of a musical reputation. Written during the last half of the last century, the music of Brahms was first performed in the United States in the years between 1880 and 1900, a period when the established orchestras of today were first being organized and when the musical taste of the public was first being fashioned. In those days of bustles and side-burns, the symphonies of Beethoven were respected and admired, as they are today, but aside from a few of the symphonies of Mendelssohn and of Mozart they were virtually the Alpha and Omega of symphonic music to the audiences of the time. In the West, Theodore Thomas was instructing his hearers in the beauties of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, but for the most part the overtures of Rossini and the like were held in higher favor. The Italian tradition, deriving from the operas, was strongly implanted. In the ears of most music-lovers, save such audacious upstarts as Henry Kriehbel and Walter Damrosch, the music of Wagner was outlandish and barbaric stuff.

Granting the taste of the time, the young generation that hears the music of Brahms can only with difficulty understand how their elders came to form such a strange initial impression of it. Many of the elders themselves may wonder how they believed and averred that the romantic and lyric music which they hear today was "austere" and "harsh." Listening to the translucent and clear phrases of the Third Symphony they may well wonder how they ever agreed that it was "repellent," not to say "obscure." Yet in passing such judgments, they were not without authority. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance of the Second Symphony, so learned a pundit as John S. Dwight declared coldly that even Sterndale Bennett—who is he?—could have written a better. The same symphony Mr. Lawrence Gilman now describes as "an open window into a poet's heart." For the right to hear the music of Brahms, those few who learned to admire it had to fight battles, journalistic and social, no less bitter than those of the minority today which insists that it be entitled occasionally at least to hear the music of Hindemith and Bartok.

The legend that Brahms wrote only dull music in which pedants could take delight persisted long, even down to the present, when the opinion seems wholly without justification, save perhaps when certain pages of his orchestra and pianistic variations are considered. With regard to the great bulk of his scores, however, such mists of misunderstanding have long since been burned away by the warm and sunny nature of the music itself. The man who could write the Academic Festival Overture around the drinking songs of university students, who could compose the stupendously dramatic first measures of the First Symphony, who could relax to the pastoral attitude of the Second Symphony is obviously no writer of dry notes on dry staves.

Final proof of the change that the reputation of Brahms has undergone in thirty years is the circumstance that the musician who, critics declared, could never become popular is now honored at a six days' festival, arranged not perfunctorily in celebration of some anniversary, but out of wide respect and deep liking for his rich and colorful music. For Johannes Brahms, that stout, querulous Germanic composer, has become as popular as the revered Beethoven, a genius acclaimed.

---

ard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra in choral numbers, as they did at the Beethoven festival. The celebrated pianist, Schnabel, noted particularly for his playing of Brahms, will come from Berlin to take part in the festival, and Margaret Matzenauer and other singers of note will assist.

The four extra concerts beginning tomorrow really constitute the festival. Tomorrow afternoon, March 23 (a pension fund concert) the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the Second Pianoforte Concerto and the Fourth Symphony in E Minor will be given, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist

* * * *

There is still dispute over the merits of the music of Brahms. To many he is one of the very greatest of composers, to be named with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner. To others he is a much overrated musician, whose work is often dull and labored. In France, Brahms has never won widespread popularity or high repute. But in Germany and wherever German musical influence has dominated, he is now recognized as a supreme genius. In this country the popularity of his music has been of slow but steady growth.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Koussevitzky Offers Ravel's "Bolero" Here Next Tuesday

Long Awaited Presentation of New Work to Mark Close of Symphony Season by Boston Players in This City.—Second Symphony, Given Last Year, Also to Be on Final Program

With the appearance next Tuesday of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present season of symphony orchestra concerts comes to an end.

The program:

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air: Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro

Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"

Ravel .....Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

The season itself, though by no means remarkable, cannot be called in any sense a lean one. From the symphony storeroom have been brought the Beethoven Fifth, the Beethoven Seventh, the Tschaikowsky Sixth, the Schumann First, the Brahms Second, and the Brahms Fourth. Wagner, as usual, contributed his share: the Faust Overture, the Excerpts from the Meistersingers, the Tannhauser overture; while for modern taste came offerings from Sibelius, Gruenberg, Stravinsky, Ravel, and McKinley; and among these a judicious sprinkling of celebrities from ages early and late.

The staple of the concert next week will be a borrowing from the Brahms festival in Boston. Of the music played in that Symphony Hall observance, Dr. tzky has elected to play us the which he gave us e heard at Cleve- h ago at the n Infantry een long ed with usiasm in would be ounts of the new work tell nted in the staid there, while parts, at least, of other audiences have been voluble in their appreciation.

The Fourth Chance

The Brahms Second Symphony ought to be fairly familiar to those who give such things close attention; for it has been played here at brief intervals three times since 1927 (Feb. 15, 1927; Dec. 4, 1928; Feb. 18, 1930). Now this fourth adventure will give us an opportunity to meet once more an agreeable acquaintance and to compare the treatment it receives at the hands of two conductors closely related by national ties and characteristics at least.

Those who heard Nikolai Sokoloff's interpretation a month ago will recall his strongly drawn lines, his brilliant shadings, the lambent coloring of his strings and the sunshine of his reeds and woodwind in general, the precision of his attacks, the positiveness of his tempos, and the rugged strength of the whole performance. In what respect Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation differs from that of Dr. Sokoloff we shall soon learn if we do not know already.

The Symphony itself needs at this time no comment; it is sufficient to repeat Dr. Sokoloff's brief characterization: "Here the keynote is geniality, healthy, robust optimism; and it is only in the slow movement that there is any deviation from the path, and there it is only to ponder profoundly, humanwise, in the manner of a Bach, the deeper verities, and always with melody, eloquent, resourceful, and tenderly moving, as the infallible guide."

On a Classic Form

Ravel, the finished composer, French of the French, the artist so skilled that he can conceal his art at will, we might hear more often with profit, regardless of the date or type of composition heard; for his earliest works, like his latest, display wit, subtlety, emotional restraint and an irony beneath which he more or less successfully conceals his emotional intent.

His form is classical in its symmetry, no matter with what trappings of modern harmonies he may happen to drape it; and his lyricism is colored with dashes of humor, malice, comedy, irony and a cynicism that always falls just short of malevolence. For his ability to compress much into the smaller forms, we might turn to his Trio—simple and solid, with its classical outlines, whatever may be said of its harmonies—and his sonata for violin and violoncello, a whole symphonic circle, reduced to the minimum orchestration.

Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" we heard in company with the Brahms Second Symphony at the concert of the Cleveland orchestra. "It is to Rimsky-Korsakoff—that noble rescuer of the unfinished works of his gifted but wayward and short-lived contemporaries—to whom we are indebted for this excerpt from Moussorgsky's second opera."

Just how much of the work is Moussorgsky's we shall never know. Rimsky-Korsakoff says, "Much had to be altered, abridged and added. In acts I and II there turned up much that was superfluous, musically ugly and a drag on the scene. In act V, on the contrary, much was lacking altogether, while a good deal existed only in the roughest of rough draft records. The parts of the opera that the composer had instrumentated I re-orchestrated and, I hope, for the better. All the rest was instrumentated by me, too; I, again, made the arrangement for the piano. By the end of the summer the entire work on Kovantchina could not be finished and I wrote the last of it in St. Petersburg." There is more, but let it rest. Poor Moussorgsky!

Handel's concerto is the sixth of the 12 grand concertos for strings. It consists of a dialogue between a group of soloists and the chorus of instruments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played here the fifth of the series on March 20, 1928.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Borrowing from the Brahms Festival

Koussevitzky Will Bring the Second Symphony Again and Offer Ravel's Noisily Heralded "Bolero" Here for the First Time.—Season's End

With the appearance next Tuesday of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present season of symphony orchestra concerts comes to an end.

The season itself, though by no means remarkable, cannot be called in any sense a lean one. From the symphony storeroom have been brought the Beethoven Fifth, the Beethoven Seventh, the Tschaikowsky Sixth, the Schumann First, the Brahms Second, and the Brahms Fourth. Wagner, as usual, contributed his share: the Faust Overture, the Excerpts from the Meistersingers, the Tannhauser overture; while for modern taste came offerings from Sibelius, Gruenberg, Stravinsky, Ravel, and McKinley; and among these a judicious sprinkling of celebrities from ages early and late.

The staple of the concert next week will be a borrowing from the Brahms festival in Boston. Of the music played in that Symphony Hall observance, Dr. Koussevitzky has elected to play us the Second Symphony, which he gave us last season and which we heard at Cleveland hands only a month ago at the Music Association concert in Infantry Hall.

The Ravel "Bolero" has been long awaited by many here who heard with wistfulness the tales of enthusiasm in distant halls and wished it would be offered them too. The accounts of the Boston premiere of this new work tell of cheering unprecedented in the staid precincts of music there, while parts, at least, of other audiences have been voluble in their appreciation.

The Fourth Chance

The Brahms Second Symphony ought to be fairly familiar to those who give such things close attention; for it has been played here at brief intervals three times since 1927 (Feb. 15, 1927; Dec. 4, 1928; Feb. 18, 1930). Now this fourth adventure will give us an opportunity to meet once more an agreeable acquaintance and to compare the treatment it receives at the hands of two conductors closely related by national ties and characteristics at least.

Those who heard Nikolai Sokoloff's interpretation a month ago will recall his strongly drawn lines, his brilliant shadings, the lambent coloring of his strings and the sunshine of his reeds and woodwind in general, the precision of his attacks, the positiveness of his tempos, and the rugged strength of the whole performance. In what respect Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation differs from that of Dr. Sokoloff we shall soon learn if we do not know already.

The Symphony itself needs at this time no comment; it is sufficient to repeat Dr. Sokoloff's brief characterization: "Here the keynote is geniality, healthy, robust optimism; and it is only in the slow movement that there is any deviation from the path, and there it is only to ponder profoundly, humanwise, in the manner of a Bach, the deeper verities, and always with melody, eloquent, resourceful, and tenderly moving, as the infallible guide."

On a Classic Form

Ravel, the finished composer, French of the French, the artist so skilled that he can conceal his art at will, we might hear more often with profit, regardless of the date or type of composition heard; for his earliest works, like his latest, display wit, subtlety, emotional restraint and an irony beneath which he more or less successfully conceals his emotional intent.

His form is classical in its symmetry, no matter with what trappings of modern harmonies he may happen to drape it; and his lyricism is colored with dashes of humor, malice, comedy, irony and a cynicism that always falls just short of malevolence. For his ability to compress much into the smaller forms, we might turn to his Trio—simple and solid, with its classical outlines, whatever may be said of its harmonies—and his sonata for violin and violoncello, a whole symphonic circle, reduced to the minimum orchestration.

Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" we heard in company with the Brahms Second Symphony at the concert of the Cleveland orchestra. "It is to Rimsky-Korsakoff—that noble rescuer of the unfinished works of his gifted but wayward and short-lived contemporaries—to whom we are indebted for this excerpt from Moussorgsky's second opera."

Just how much of the work is Moussorgsky's we shall never know. Rimsky-Korsakoff says, "Much had to be altered, abridged and added. In acts I and II there turned up much that was superfluous, musically ugly and a drag on the scene. In act V, on the contrary, much was lacking altogether, while a good deal existed only in the roughest of rough draft records. The parts of the opera that the composer had instrumen-

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air: Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro

Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"

Ravel .....Bolero"

Brahms .....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

taed I re-orchestrated and, I hope, for the better. All the rest was instrumentated by me, too; I, again, made the arrangement for the piano. By the end of the summer the entire work on Kovantchina could not be finished and I wrote the last of it in St. Petersburg." There is more, but let it rest. Poor Moussorgsky!

Handel's concerto is the sixth of the 12 grand concertos for strings. It consists of a dialogue between a group of soloists and the chorus of instruments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played here the fifth of the series on March 20 1928.

M. C. W.

SYMPHONY BY SIBELIUS IS REPEATED

By MOSES SMITH

HAVING spent much labor on the preparation and performance of the Brahms Festival, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, present for this week's regular symphony concerts a program that consists mostly of repetitions of works heard earlier in the season.

The single exception is Walter Piston's "Suite for Orchestra;" and, as if to lighten Mr. Koussevitzky's work the more, the piece is conducted by the composer. This piece consists of three movements, the first of which recalls jazz and blues often, the second is slow and atmospheric, and the third is a sort of march fugue.

As presented at yesterday's matinee the music is often inspiriting; the fast sections are markedly rhythmical. It is often "derivative." We detected—or thought we did—traces of Ravel, Honegger and, believe it or not, George Gershwin. When the classic shades of Harvard (where Mr. Piston teaches) reflect even mildly the light of Tin Pan Alley, jazz has become very respectable indeed.

Yet we were not greatly stirred by the music. There was a tendency to anemia, except in the third movement which had an interesting thematic basis and was well, though briefly, worked out. In fact, brevity is the most respected virtue today. The performance seemed to us excellent, and Mr. Piston, a conductor of unusual capacity.

The other numbers were Haydyn's symphony in D major (with the horn call), Sibelius' sixth symphony and Schorberg's orchestration of a Bach prelude and fugue in E-flat for organ. Our principal interest was in the Sibelius. Hearing it for the third time, we regard it as a little masterpiece.

Plays Remaining

INCORRECT PAGINATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observer

By Walter Brown

Brahms and His Second Symphony.

Johannes Brahms was in his early forties when he composed the second of his symphonies—the one chosen for performance here by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 3. His first symphonic work had been triumphantly performed the preceding year (1876) and had even been hailed—though mistakenly, it would seem,—as "at last a Tenth Symphony." Certainly Brahms himself did not regard his First as going on where Beethoven stopped though undoubtedly he was grounded on Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven in his classic form.

But the new symphonist of fifty-odd years ago did not hold himself bound absolutely to the old in music; he had feeling for the poetic, the imaginative, the dramatic — feeling that he let his music portray; but he did not seek the unusual, the bizarre, in expressing himself—rather he treated the imaginative, the dramatic, the poetic in earnestness and in truth as his musical genius revealed it to him. He was a conservative of loftiest ideals, who believed in an orderly and sure progress rather than any seemingly brilliant advances that might prove fruitless or worse.

✣ ✣ ✣

That Brahms was a melodist despite his reputation for severity of form and absolutism in expression seems to have been overlooked in many of the earlier commentaries on his music. But certainly in the present that fact is stressed, as it is enjoyed, by all who listen to his music. His first symphony was full of passion and unrest, with strong emotional content that melts in the final allegro into a spirit of joyousness; the second symphony may, perhaps, be said to begin in cheerfulness where the first closes—it has repose and a pastoral simplicity and charm as well.

But it never lacks in dignity though it may find some expression of humor; it has beauty of theme, melodies, strength of contrasts, and it bespeaks attention in its absolute unity to the skill of the composer in the technique of his art as well as in power of expression of thought.

✣ ✣ ✣

The four movements of the symphony are undivided—that is each is played under one heading, while in the Brahms First, for example, the opening and closing movements are divided—with an allegro used for the ending of each. The beginning of the symphony to which we shall listen on April 9 is Allegro ma non troppo, with a first theme beautifully set for the wind instruments, with the horns sounding most festive strains. The strings sing the second theme gracefully and sweetly but the working out disturbs, in no inconsiderable measure, the quiet, pastoral scene; for as the brasses are admitted in strength stormy effects are produced that are, in turn, to be quieted before the Coda by the first theme given fine effect in the oboes; and the movement ends tranquilly and beautifully.

✣ ✣ ✣

The second Adagio has been termed "sphinx-like" by some of the analysts. Unique in form, with themes less clearly stated than in the first movement perhaps, still there is the perfection of workmanship in the standard that Brahms set for himself and maintained; Hermann Deiters—biographer of Brahms in 1880—states that in this second movement the composer has "intentionally striven to express the hesitation and fearfulness experienced on beholding a weird apparition which still irresistibly entices and beckons us onward." Present-day hearers may not get this feeling out of the music; the tendency nowadays is rather against any idea of "programming." Possibly in a case like this each music-lover who listens may do well to think out his own explanation of the music—if he needs one.

✣ ✣ ✣

But if the hearers must dream their own dreams of fear, or horror, or what they will, in the Adagio of Brahms's Second the third movement, Allegretto grazioso, calls for no individual thought—merely the enjoyment of melody, grace and charm, with a sort of rustic dance, full of humor and honest gayety, thrown in for good measure. Here is one of the joyous examples of Brahms as melodist.

The Finale of the symphony, not infrequently termed Mozartian—not in an imitative sense but in its general manner of treatment—revels in variations of preceding themes or reminiscences of them, handled with amazing skill and in constantly shifting calues of tone-color; with a spirited, brilliant and sonorous ending. And so closes the second of the four symphonies of Johannes Brahms—of which Professor Pratt, in his monumental "History of Music" says that they were "notably different from each other, displaying the complex structure, rhythmical and melodic fertility, sustained energy and disdain of merely superficial effect that mark his whole style."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FINE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brahms' second symphony, which was one of the high points of the Brahms Festival celebrated in Boston by the Boston symphony orchestra in the last few days (March 21-26), will also be performed by the famous orchestra in its visit to Hartford for a concert in Bushnell Memorial hall, on Wednesday evening, April 9, at 8:15. The Brahms Festival, consisting of six programs of the orchestral, choral and chamber music of the German master, had a capacity attendance and was praised as one of the most important occasions in the history of musical performance in Boston.

Into the second symphony, Brahms concentrated his rarest expression of that poetic and tender lyricism which runs recurrently through his entire works. Its pastoral, idyllic mood prevails, for the veiled sadness of the adagio is only a cloud passing over the sun's face. Felix Weingartner, (unless he has changed his mind since 1905), considers this symphony Brahms' master work—"In none of his other works does Brahms' spring of invention flow so freshly and spontaneously as in this one; never before or afterwards did he handle the orchestra so sonorously."

Ravel's "Bolero," which is the novelty upon this program, has been performed this season by the principal symphony orchestras of the country and has each time excited a demonstration from the audience. The Spanish melody repeated again and again with accumulative intensity by various instruments of the orchehtra makes this piece one long crescendo, the climax of which is irresistible.

Dr. Sere Koussevitzky will also present the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina." This is a charming mood picture illustrating the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin in Moscow. Before its close the cathedral chimes are heard ringing softly in the distance.

The program will open with Handel's Voncerto Grosso, Opus. 6, No. 10. This music, written for the string orchestra, reveals with exceptional effects the supreme tonal beauty and perfection of ensemble which has made the Boston Symphony orchestra's strings famous.

The program will open with Vivaldi's concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, (edited by A. Siloti). This music reveals with exceptional efects the supreme tonal beauty and perfection of ensemble which has made the Boston Symphony orchestra's strings famous.

Good seats are still available for the concert at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

PISTON'S SUITE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Composer's Work in First Performance

Dr Koussevitzky Repeats Music by Haydn and Schoenberg

A suite for orchestra by Walter Piston, a Boston-born composer, now teaching music in Harvard University, was performed for the first time at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Piston conducted his own work. Dr Koussevitzky filled the rest of the program with repetitions of music already heard in this series of concerts during the current season. Haydn's Symphony "With the Horn Call," Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Schoenberg's arrangement of an organ prelude and fugue by Bach, in E flat, were the chosen numbers.

Mr Piston's new suite, written last Summer, has three movements, allegro, andante, allegro. His brief and modest description of it in the program book follows the admirable current musical fashion of avoiding any attempt at ascribing to music a pictorial or dramatic function it does not possess. He has written "absolute music," and not "program music," to use the cant terms.

It is with the younger and not the elder generation of American composers that Mr Piston must be ranked, not merely by his years, but by the style of his music. A pupil of Nadia Boulanger, he has undergone in Paris the same musical influences that have helped shape the creative imagination of Aaron Copland. He has assimilated the work of such modern French writers as Ravel and Honegger, and of such modern Russians as Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Like Mr Copland, he has listened to American popular pieces of the "jazz" type with a respectful curiosity, though probably with less hope than Copland once displayed of finding in them the inspiration for genuinely "American" music.

Musical Background

This musical background, and a high degree of skill in writing and scoring musc for orchestra, have enabled Mr Piston to produce in the suite heard yesterday a work deserving more than the single hearing too often allotted by the musical powers-that-be to the compositions of American writers.

He has something of his own to say in musc, and he has said it in the language of the present musical day with considerable point and power. There is far more imaginative power in this suite than in earlier works of Mr Piston heard here. Its ingenious rhythms and individual tone color adorn without blurring a firmly knit musical texture.

If one thought, hearing an ejaculatory outburst in the first allegro of Ravel's "La Valse," and if listening to an episode in Mr Piston's fugue finale, one recalled a well known sonorous passage for brass in Debussy's "Fetes," these reminiscences were unimportant in view of the originality and effectiveness of the suite as a whole. What composer old or new, great or minor, has ever succeeded in avoiding in his work all hints of the music of other writers?

Mr Piston, it should be added, conducted his suite wtih a skill not given to most composers. One felt that he was securing from the orchestra just about what he wanted. The players applauded him more heartily at the close than did the majority of an audience notoriously cool to modern pieces. This suite should be heard again in Boston. It is on the program of the next Cambridge concert.

Neglected Work

There is no need to speak at length of the other numbers, all commented upon in these columns within a few weeks. A rehearing confirmed one's notion that the Haydn symphony is a charming and unjustly neglected work. The purists object to transcriptions of Bach, but if a great prelude and fugue were to be arranged for orchestra it could hardly be more skilfully done than it has been by Schoenberg.

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony again seemed an utterly original work, with a finely imaginative and powerful musical content which the composer has not wholly disengaged from some awkwardness of his medium of expression.

Next week we are to have a Beethoven program, with Schnabel as soloist in the G-minor concerto, the "Pastoral Symphony," and "Leonore No. 3" overture.

P. R.

TURDAY, MARCH 29, 1930

MUSIC

Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra arranged this program for the 20th concert in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon: Haydn, Symphony, D major, with the horn call piston. Suite for Orchestra (first performance). Sibelius, Symphony, No. 6. Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg.

Mr. Piston conducted his Suite. The symphonies by Haydn and Sibelius and Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's music had all been recently performed.

It was pleasant to find Haydn and Piston, the old and the new, as neighbors; and it was pleasant to hear again the charming music of the 18th century and interesting to learn the tendency of a contemporary, one who has had advantages here and in France and now occupies an honorable position in the music department of Harvard University.

Again the freshness and charm of the symphony, the performance by virtuosi of the orchestra in the Finale, delighted the audience. There is a curious resemblance between the theme of the Minuet and the song once lustily roared when good men got together: "The Dutch Company." The tune for those words is supposed to be of German origin. Is it not possible that it was Croatian, familiar to Haydn's ears? It should not be forgotten that Haydn made a free use of Croatian folksongs, so much so that books and articles have been wirtten treating of Haydn as "a Croatian composer."

Mr. Piston's Suite was written last summer. In his modest account of it he says that the first movement of light character contains some "Americanisms" but he in no way attempted to write jazz; the second movement is calm; a development of two motives. (It has a Nocturne's character). The third movement is a fugue.

It would be foolish for an American composer in these years to write in the manner of Haydn and endeavor at the same time to express his own individuality. His musical ideas would hardly adapt themselves to the old forms; or he would only be a sedulous ape; that is if he had any ideas at all. Prokofieff wrote a "classical" symphony, and it is delightful; but he is a man of uncommon talent. Stravinsky tried to go back to Bach, and wrote music of Saharan barrenness—not one oasis for refreshment. No, a composer should be a man of his own generation, also country, but not possessed by a Chauvinistic demon so that his compositions would only have parochial interest. Just what Mr. Piston means by "Americanisms" in his first movement is not easy to understand. Mr. Chadwick has shown more than once that a composition, not containing a national air, not having a set program, can yet be charged with the spirit that is accepted here as in Europe as distinctively American, a certain reckless, devil-me-care, snapping -of-fingers-at -the-eternal-verities spirit. One fails to find this spirit, this flavor in Mr. Piston's first movement. There is occasional fury, a use of devices also employed by ingenious makers of jazz, but these can hardly be called Americanisms. In the slow movement there are some truly musical ideas that suggest a poetic feeling and a personal note, yet here one wishes a surer authorative — not aggressive — carrying out of the musical sentiments and a still more pronounced mood. Then there is the fugue.

Composers having made daring or loose experiments, caring little for euphony, disdaining, as is the fashion today, "obvious" tunes, harmonic progressions, enchanting combinations of instruments, suddenly thinking that the Philistines may be disconcerted by what they have done, write a fugue for a sonorous ending. They think that a fugue sanctifies what has gone before. There is safety in a fugue. The very word "fugue" impresses an audience; assures it that the composer knows his trade. And yesterday Mr. Piston's fugue was apparently the one movement honestly enjoyed. It was lively, it kept the attention, it even excited, and without any pedantic discussion as to its technical merit. It provoked hearty applause: that was the answer.

It is easy to see why the sixth symphony of Sibelius has never gained wide-spread popularity—the music is singularly self-restrained for him; an intimate brooding music, as if Sibelius, like Buddha, were lost in omphalic contemplation. No defiant outbursts, no bitter melancholy, no warring against Fate—as in the symphonies that made him famous; in pictorial or dramatic pages, as in the tone-poems inspired by the legends of Finland. The symphony is by no means negligible; but it has only a faint emotional appeal. The quiet ending is of an autumnal sunset beauty. We prefer Sibelius the man of storm and stress, raging or gloomy in his own peculiar manner of preceding years.

The transcription of Bach's prelude and fugue, vexing to the respecters of Bach and the lovers of his organ music, again aroused vigorous applause.

The concert will be repeated tnioght. The program of next week consists of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; piano concerto, G major, No. 4 (Mr. Schnabel, pianist), and the "Lenore" overture, No. 3.

y air to New York for their Easter v

73

SYMPHONY PLAYS WORK BY PISTON

Cambridge Composer Conducts Own Suite

Boston Pst Mar 29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the Brahms Festival and the daily rehearsals for it occupying the attention of Dr. Koussevitzky, and the Symphony Orchestra through last Wednesday evening, scant time was left for the preparation of a regular Symphony programme.

Accordingly Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon his list for yesterday and this evening three pieces already heard within the past few weeks and added to them a new suite by the resident composer, Walter Piston, which Mr. Piston himself conducted.

THREE REPEATS

The three repeated pieces were Haydn's early Symphony of the Horn Call, with the difficult first horn part again admirably played by Mr. Boettcher, Sibelius' Symphony Number Six and Schoenberg's brilliantly sonorous orchestration of Bach's E-Flat Major Organ Prelude and Fugue. All three were new to Boston this season; all three were excellently played yesterday, conductor and orchestra as much on their mettle as though there had been no festival to tax and tire them.

In the case of music so baffling and rarified as is much of this Symphony of Sibelius, a speedy repetition was almost imperative if the composer's message were to be fully comprehended, while in Bach's Prelude and Fugue there is so much of musical substance and complexity that the average listener could make little complaint at hearing it so soon again. Only Haydn's Symphony music of surface charm, interesting chiefly for its orchestral effects and its frequent solo passages for horn, flute, violin and 'cello, seemed superfluously repeated after so short an interval.

Piston's Suite

At the outset Mr. Piston's Suite proved none too inviting. The first movement, leaning heavily upon Honegger and Stravinsky, seemed barren o salient ideas, although the orchestra treatment was on occasion ingenious. For a time too, the succeeding Andante moved in dreary, monotonous fashion, although at the end a not unpleasing mood of calm and resignation was established. The final Fugue is, however, a capital piece of contrapuntal writing in the modern style with a well-marked rhythm to hold the attention and overide the frequent dissonance. But the music itself suggested a spaciousnes that its too speedy termination contradicted. Mr. Piston conducted wit authority and was much applauded.

Sibelius' Symphony grows on one, bu even on a rehearing the barren firs movement suggests an almost pervers avoidance of musical charm. The tw succeeding movements have in the more that can be readily grasped, an the familiar Sibelius returns in th Finale. As to the relative merits o Sibelius' earlier and later symphonies we are still too close to the composer t decide with any finality.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Obser

By Walter Brown

Brahms and His Second Symphony.

Johannes Brahms was in his early forties when he composed the second of his symphonies—the one chosen for performance here by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 3. His first symphonic work had been triumphantly performed the preceding year (1876) and had even been hailed—though mistakenly, it would seem.—as "at last a Tenth Symphony." Certainly Brahms himself did not regard his First as going on where Beethoven stopped though undoubtedly he was grounded on Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven in his classic form.

But the new symphonist of fifty-odd years ago did not hold himself bound absolutely to the old in music; he had feeling for the poetic, the imaginative, the dramatic — feeling that he let his music portray; but he did not seek the unusual, the bizarre, in expressing himself—rather he treated the imaginative, the dramatic, the poetic in earnestness and in truth as his musical genius revealed it to him. He was a conservative of loftiest ideals, who believed in an orderly and sure progress rather than any seemingly brilliant advances that might prove fruitless or worse.

✣ ✣ ✣

That Brahms was a melodist despite his reputation for severity of form and absolutism in expression seems to have been overlooked in many of the earlier commentaries on his music. But certainly in the present that fact is stressed, as it is enjoyed, by all who listen to his music. His first symphony was full of passion and unrest, with strong emotional content that melts in the final allegro into a spirit of joyousness; the second symphony may, perhaps, be said to begin in cheerfulness where the first closes—it has repose and a pastoral simplicity and charm as well.

But it never lacks in dignity though it may find some expression of humor; it has beauty of theme, melodies, strength of contrasts, and it bespeaks attention in its absolute unity to the skill of the composer in the technique of his art as well as in power of expression of thought.

✣ ✣ ✣

The four movements of the symphony are undivided—that is each is played under one heading, while in the Brahms First, for example, the opening and closing movements are divided—with an allegro used for the ending of each. The beginning of the symphony to which we shall listen on April 9 is Allegro ma non troppo, with a first theme beautifully set for the wind instruments, with the horns sounding most festive strains. The strings sing the second theme gracefully and sweetly but the working out disturbs, in no inconsiderable measure, the quiet, pastoral scene; for as the brasses are admitted in strength stormy effects are produced that are, in turn, to be quieted before the Coda by the first theme given fine effect in the oboes; and the movement ends tranquilly and beautifully.

✣ ✣ ✣

The second Adagio has been termed "sphinx-like" by some of the analysts. Unique in form, with themes less clearly stated than in the first movement perhaps, still there is the perfection of workmanship in the standard that Brahms set for himself and maintained; Hermann Deiters—biographer of Brahms in 1880—states that in this second movement the composer has "intentionally striven to express the hesitation and fearfulness experienced on beholding a weird apparition which still irresistibly entices and beckons us onward." Present-day hearers may not get this feeling out of the music; the tendency nowadays is rather against any idea of "programming." Possibly in a case like this each music-lover who listens may do well to think out his own explanation of the music—if he needs one.

✣ ✣ ✣

But if the hearers must dream their own dreams of fear, or horror, or what they will, in the Adagio of Brahms's Second the third movement, Allegretto grazioso, calls for no individual thought—merely the enjoyment of melody, grace and charm, with a sort of rustic dance, full of humor and honest gayety, thrown in for good measure. Here is one of the joyous examples of Brahms as melodist.

The Finale of the symphony, not infrequently termed Mozartian—not in an imitative sense but in its general manner of treatment—revels in variations of preceding themes or reminiscences of them, handled with amazing skill and in constantly shifting values of tone-color; with a spirited, brilliant and sonorous ending. And so closes the second of the four symphonies of Johannes Brahms—of which Professor Pratt, in his monumental "History of Music" says that they were "notably different from each other, displaying the complex structure, rhythmical and melodic fertility, sustained energy and disdain of merely superficial effect that mark his whole style."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FINE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brahms' second symphony, which was one of the high points of the Brahms Festival celebrated in Boston by the Boston symphony orchestra in the last few days (March 21-26), will also be performed by the famous orchestra in its visit to Hartford for a concert in Bushnell Memorial hall, on Wednesday evening, April 9, at 8:15. The Brahms Festival, consisting of six programs of the orchestral, choral and chamber music of the German master, had a capacity attendance and was praised as one of the most important occasions in the history of musical performance in Boston.

Into the second symphony, Brahms concentrated his rarest expression of that poetic and tender lyricism which runs recurrently through his entire works. Its pastoral, idyllic mood prevails, for the veiled sadness of the adagio is only a cloud passing over the sun's face. Felix Weingartner, (unless he has changed his mind since 1905), considers this symphony Brahms' master work—"In none of his other works does Brahms' spring of invention flow so freshly and spontaneously as in this one; never before or afterwards did he handle the orchestra so sonorously."

Ravel's "Bolero," which is the novelty upon this program, has been performed this season by the principal symphony orchestras of the country and has each time excited a demonstration from the audience. The Spanish melody repeated again and again with accumulative intensity by various instruments of the orchehtra makes this piece one long crescendo, the climax of which is irresistible.

Dr. Sere Koussevitzky will also present the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina." This is a charming mood picture illustrating the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin in Moscow. Before its close the cathedral chimes are heard ringing softly in the distance.

The program will open with Handel's Voncerto Grosso, Opus. 6, No. 10. This music, written for the string orchestra, reveals with exceptional effects the supreme tonal beauty and perfection of ensemble which has made the Boston Symphony orchestra's strings famous.

The program will open with Vivaldi's concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, (edited by A. Siloti). This music reveals with exceptional efects the supreme tonal beauty and perfection of ensemble which has made the Boston Symphony orchestra's strings famous.

Good seats are still available for the concert at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

PISTON'S SUITE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Composer's Work in First Performance

Dr Koussevitzky Repeats Music by Haydn and Schoenberg

A suite for orchestra by Walter Piston, a Boston-born composer, now teaching music in Harvard University, was performed for the first time at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Piston conducted his own work. Dr Koussevitzky filled the rest of the program with repetitions of music already heard in this series of concerts during the current season. Haydn's Symphony "With the Horn Call," Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Schoenberg's arrangement of an organ prelude and fugue by Bach, in E flat, were the chosen numbers.

Mr Piston's new suite, written last summer, has three movements, allegro, andante, allegro. His brief and modest description of it in the program book follows the admirable current musical fashion of avoiding any attempt at ascribing to music a pictorial or dramatic function it does not possess. He has written "absolute music," and not "program music," to use the cant terms.

It is with the younger and not the elder generation of American composers that Mr Piston must be ranked, not merely by his years, but by the style of his music. A pupil of Nadia Boulanger, he has undergone in Paris the same musical influences that have helped shape the creative imagination of Aaron Copland. He has assimilated the work of such modern French writers as Ravel and Honegger, and of such modern Russians as Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Like Mr Copland, he has listened to American popular pieces of the "jazz" type with a respectful curiosity, though probably with less hope than Copland once displayed of finding in them the inspiration for genuinely "American" music.

Musical Background

This musical background, and a high degree of skill in writing and scoring musc for orchestra, have enabled Mr Piston to produce in the suite heard yesterday a work deserving more than the single hearing too often allotted by the musical powers-that-be to the compositions of American writers.

He has something of his own to say in musc, and he has said it in the language of the present musical day with considerable point and power. There is far more imaginative power in this suite than in earlier works of Mr Piston heard here. Its ingenious rhythms and individual tone color adorn without blurring a firmly knit musical texture.

If one thought, hearing an ejaculatory outburst in the first allegro of Ravel's "La Valse," and if listening to an episode in Mr Piston's fugue finale, one recalled a well known sonorous passage for brass in Debussy's "Fetes," these reminiscences were unimportant in view of the originality and effectiveness of the suite as a whole. What composer old or new, great or minor, has ever succeeded in avoiding in his work all hints of the music of other writers?

Mr Piston, it should be added, conducted his suite wtih a skill not given to most composers. One felt that he was securing from the orchestra just about what he wanted. The players applauded him more heartily at the close than did the majority of an audience notoriously cool to modern pieces. This suite should be heard again in Boston. It is on the program of the next Cambridge concert.

Neglected Work

There is no need to speak at length of the other numbers, all commented upon in these columns within a few weeks. A rehearing confirmed one's notion that the Haydn symphony is a charming and unjustly neglected work. The purists object to transcriptions of Bach, but if a great prelude and fugue were to be arranged for orchestra it could hardly be more skilfully done than it has been by Schoenberg.

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony again seemed an utterly original work, with a finely imaginative and powerful musical content which the composer has not wholly disengaged from some awkwardness of his medium of expression.

Next week we are to have a Beethoven program, with Schnabel as soloist in the G-minor concerto, the "Pastoral Symphony," and "Leonore No. 3" overture. P. R.

TURDAY, MARCH 29, 1930

MUSIC

Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra arranged this program for the 20th concert in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon: Haydn, Symphony, D major, with the horn call piston. Suite for Orchestra (first performance). Sibellus, Symphony, No. 6. Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg.

Mr. Piston conducted his Suite. The symphonies by Haydn and Sibelius and Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's music had all been recently performed.

It was pleasant to [illegible] Haydn and Piston, the old and the new, as neighbors; and it was pleasant to hear again the charming music of the 18th century and interesting to learn the tendency of a contemporary, one who has had advantages here and in France and now occupies an honorable position in the music department of Harvard University.

Again the freshness and charm of the symphony, the performance by virtuosi of the orchestra in the Finale, delighted the audience. There is a curious resemblance between the theme of the Minuet and the song once lustily roared when good men got together: "The Dutch Company." The tune for those words is supposed to be of German origin. Is it not possible that it was Croatian, familiar to Haydn's ears? It should not be forgotten that Haydn made a free use of Croatian folksongs, so much so that books and articles have been wirtten treating of Haydn as "a Croatian composer."

Mr. Piston's Suite was written last summer. In his modest account of it he says that the first movement of light character contains some "Americanisms" but he in no way attempted to write jazz; the second movement is calm; a development of two motives. (It has a Nocturne's character). The third movement is a fugue.

It would be foolish for an American composer in these years to write in the manner of Haydn and endeavor at the same time to express his own individuality. His musical ideas would hardly adapt themselves to the old forms; or he would only be a sedulous ape; that is if he had any ideas at all. Prokofieff wrote a "classical" symphony, and it is delightful; but he is a man of uncommon talent. Stravinsky tried to go back to Bach, and wrote music of Saharan barrenness—not one oasis for refreshment. No, a composer should be a man of his own generation, also country, but not possessed by a Chauvinistic demon so that his compositions would only have parochial interest. Just what Mr. Piston means by "Americanisms" in his first movement is not easy to understand. Mr. Chadwick has shown more than once that a composition, not containing a national air, not having a set program, can yet be charged with the spirit that is accepted here as in Europe as distinctively American, a certain reckless, devil-me-care, snapping -of-fingers-at -the-eternal-verities spirit. One fails to find this spirit, this flavor in Mr. Piston's first movement. There is occasional fury, a use of devices also employed by ingenious makers of jazz, but these can hardly be called Americanisms. In the slow movement there are some truly musical ideas that suggest a poetic feeling and a personal note, yet here one wishes a surer authorative — not aggressive — carrying out of the musical sentiments and a still more pronounced mood. Then there is the fugue.

Composers having made daring or loose experiments, caring little for euphony, disdaining, as is the fashion today, "obvious" tunes, harmonic progressions, enchanting combinations of instruments, suddenly thinking that the Philistines may be disconcerted by what they have done, write a fugue for a sonorous ending. They think that a fugue sanctifies what has gone before. There is safety in a fugue. The very word "fugue" impresses an audience; assures it that the composer knows his trade. And yesterday Mr. Piston's fugue was apparently the one movement honestly enjoyed. It was lively, it kept the attention, it even excited, and without any pedantic discussion as to its technical merit. It provoked hearty applause: that was the answer.

It is easy to see why the sixth symphony of Sibelius has never gained wide-spread popularly—the music is singularly self-restrained for him; an intimate brooding music, as if Sibelius, like Buddha, were lost in omphalic contemplation. No defiant outbursts, no bitter melancholy, no warring against Fate—as in the symphonies that made him famous; in pictorial or dramatic pages, as in the tone-poems inspired by the legends of Finland. The symphony is by no means negligible; but it has only a faint emotional appeal. The quiet ending is of an autumnal sunset beauty. We prefer Sibelius the man of storm and stress, raging or gloomy in his own peculiar manner of preceding years.

The transcription of Bach's prelude and fugue, vexing to the respecters of Bach and the lovers of his organ music, again aroused vigorous applause.

The concert will be repeated tnioght. The program of next week consists of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; piano concerto, G major, No. 4 (Mr. Schnabel, pianist), and the "Lenore" overture, No. 3.

[illegible] to New York for their Easter v[illegible]

SYMPHONY PLAYS WORK BY PISTON

Cambridge Composer Conducts Own Suite

Piston 73 Mar 29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the Brahms Festival and the daily rehearsals for it occupying the attention of Dr. Koussevitzky, and the Symphony Orchestra through last Wednesday evening, scant time was left for the preparation of a regular Symphony programme.

Accordingly Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon his list for yesterday and this evening three pieces already heard within the past few weeks and added to them a new suite by the resident composer, Walter Piston, which Mr. Piston himself conducted.

THREE REPEATS

The three repeated pieces were Haydn's early Symphony of the Horn Call, with the difficult first horn part again admirably played by Mr. Boettcher, Sibelius' Symphony Number Six and Schoenberg's brilliantly sonorous orchestration of Bach's E-Flat Major Organ Prelude and Fugue. All three were new to Boston this season; all three were excellently played yesterday, conductor and orchestra as much on their mettle as though there had been no festival to tax and tire them.

In the case of music so baffling and rarified as is much of this Symphony of Sibelius, a speedy repetition was almost imperative if the composer's message were to be fully comprehended, while in Bach's Prelude and Fugue there is so much of musical substance and complexity that the average listener could make little complaint at hearing it so soon again. Only Haydn's Symphony, music of surface charm, interesting chiefly for its orchestral effects and its frequent solo passages for horn, flute, violin and 'cello, seemed superfluously repeated after so short an interval.

Piston's Suite

At the outset Mr. Piston's Suite proved none too inviting. The first movement, leaning heavily upon Honegger and Stravinsky, seemed barren of salient ideas, although the orchestral treatment was on occasion ingenious. For a time too, the succeeding Andante moved in dreary, monotonous fashion, although at the end a not unpleasing mood of calm and resignation was established. The final Fugue is, however, a capital piece of contrapuntal writing in the modern style with a well-marked rhythm to hold the attention and override the frequent dissonance. But the music itself suggested a spaciousness that its too speedy termination contradicted. Mr. Piston conducted with authority and was much applauded.

Sibelius' Symphony grows on one, but even on a rehearing the barren first movement suggests an almost perverse avoidance of musical charm. The two succeeding movements have in them more that can be readily grasped, and the familiar Sibelius returns in the Finale. As to the relative merits of Sibelius' earlier and later symphonies we are still too close to the composer to decide with any finality.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Presents Ravel's "Bolero" Tuesday

Orchestral Sensation of the Year Uncanny in Its Crescendo

(Written for the Sunday Journal)
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the pieces included by Dr. Koussevitzky in the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, namely Ravel's "Bolero," may justly be regarded as the orchestral sensation of the year. Possibly it is a sign of the musical poverty of our times that a piece so slight from the purely musical standpoint should be the one to merit this description. Concert audiences, however, are but human, and Ravel has in this composition played upon their susceptibilities with a skill that, whatever else may be said for "Bolero," commands the warmest admiration.

It is a well established musical principle that the prolonged reiteration of a rhythm acts directly upon the listener's nervous system, and properly handled this device can be productive of intense excitement. It is well known, too, that a long orchestral crescendo, a gradual piling-up of instrumental sonorities, will produce a powerful nervous reaction. And in "Bolero," which he wrote, incidentally, as vehicle for the art of the dancer Ida Rubinstein, Ravel has combined these two methods of appeal—or perhaps assault is the accurate word.

A single rhythmic design two measures in length runs through "Bolero," announced first by a snare-drum and never relinqushed until the final chord has sounded. A single melody of two well-defined sections is many times repeated; a single chord, the chord of C major, serves the accompaniment until, just before the close, it is replaced for a few measures by the chord of E major and then resumed.

But the remarkable feature of "Bolero" is not the employment of this principle of organized monotony or the use of the long crescendo—a trick as old as Rossini, or older. It is the uncanny ingenuity with which this crescendo is effected, the adding of instrument after instrument, choir after choir, until the progress from the faintest pianissimo to a thunderous fortissimo has been achieved. And the modulation above referred to, of electrifying effect, is a stroke of genius. The first audience to hear "Bolero" in Boston found release for its pent-up excitements in a veritable storm of applause, stamping and cheers.

The remainder of next Tuesday's program is not of a sensational nature, but it is lacking neither in diversity nor in directness of appeal. For those who care for music in the pure classic style that attains a beauty untroubled by emotion, there is a Concerto Grosso of Handel, in D minor, for strings, one of the set of twelve which he wrote within the brief space of a month for an English publisher. For those who prefer that music should represent some extraneous idea or situation, there is the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" that would suggest the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. And here the creative genius of Moussorgsky, most original of the Russians, is supplemented and reinforced by the rare orchestral cunning of this confrere Rimsky-Korsakov, who scored Moussorgsky's work.

Finally, for those who cherish most of all the combined formal and emotional appeal to be found in the modern symphony, there is the Symphony in D major of Brahms, the second of his four great masterworks in that genre. Coming after the imposing iFrst Symphony in C minor Brahms' Second, with its almost Mendelssohnian grace and clarity, surprised and even disappointed the critics of that day, who were looking for more profundity, for epic breadths. But the most popular of the four. Only in the grave and brooding Adagio is there a lapse from the warmth and geniality, the lyric flow, the rhythmic life that particularly characterize this Symphony. And this slow movement is itself preferred by some Brahmsites to any other that the composer gave us.

In Boston, by the way, the music of Brahms has lately filled five Festival programs, with Dr. Koussevitzky as the motivating force and presiding genius. And the popular enthusiasm with which this liberal dose of Brahms was received bore witness to the general affection in which that composer, once found crabbed the austere, is now held.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

Arthur Schnabel, Pianist, To Appear in Brooklyn

One of the largest factors in the success of the Brahms festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mar. 21—26, was the appearance of Artur Schnabel, the great Austrian pianist, in the two concertos and smaller works of this master. Artur Schnabel has journeyed from Europe for the particular purpose of appearing in the festival and will likewise play with the Orchestra in New York and at the last concert of the series in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, April 11.

Particularly famous as an interpreter of the music of Beethoven and Brahams, Mr. Schnabel is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in G. major, at this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will devote the program to the music of Beethoven, also presenting the Pastoral Symphony No. 6, and the Overture to Leonore No. 3.

Although little known in America except by repute, Artur Schnabel has for many year been regarded in Europe as one of the greatest of living pianists. Before sailing for America, he gave a series of concerts in London to immense audiences. He visited America in 1923, then making but few appearances, including one with this orchestra in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Schnabel in Brooklyn

Artur Schnabel will be a soloist at the Boston Symphony's next concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 11, when he will play the G major piano concerto on an all-Beethoven program. Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers will be the Pastoral Symphony and third "Leonore" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

Boston Orchestra Concludes Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, has just concluded a festival of the music of Johannes Brahms, which includes daily concerts from March 21 to 26. The works performed were the four symphonies, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the "Haydn Variations," the two Piano Concerti, the Violin Concerto, the Piano Quintet, and choral works including the "German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny."

Assisting artists were the choruses of Harvard University and Radcliffe College, directed by Archibald Davison and Wallace Woodworth; the Burgin String Quartet; Arthur Schnabel, pianist; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Audiences were capacity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

$10,000 SOUGHT AS MUSIC FUND

Providence Association Sends Out Plea to Insure Continuance of Concerts.

GREATER PROGRAM PLANNED

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of Organization, Points Out Other Cities Raise Bigger Sums

An appeal for a fund of $10,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts coming to Providence, to finance at least two other major music attractions during the 1930-1931 season and aid in the development of a community appreciation of important music, was sent out yesterday by the Providence Music Association.

Of the total amount needed, $4500 is to be used for the Boston Symphony concerts, to be held in the Albee Theatre. For two or three other concerts, probably two visiting symphonies or three great artists, the Music Association's budget calls for $4750. The balance of the $10,000 is needed to recoup a deficit suffered during the 1929-1930 season because of the fact that the underwriting of the concert series did not come up to expectations.

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, in a letter to a number of Providence supporters of good music, points out that "other cities are raising similar funds to a far larger extent—from Hartford's $12,000 to Detroit's $250,000 yearly."

"Situated as we are in Providence," Mrs. Sharpe's letter continues, "we are in the very fortunate position of being able to bring here the great orchestras and artists who regularly go to Boston and New York."

Because of the successful Cleveland and Detroit orchestra concerts during the past season, the Music Association is developing plans for an extension of its program in this city, particularly for the purpose of interesting children in excellent music, officers of the association said yesterday. It is hoped that children's music can be played by visiting orchestras on the afternoon of the day on which the evening concert is to be played and the expectation is that such attractions can be made entirely self-supporting if a nominal charge is made for children's tickets.

Subscriptions to the Music Association's 1930-1931 fund are being sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer at the offices of the association, 313 Gas Company building. All subscriptions will be acknowledged in the newspapers.

Officers of the Music Association for

Continued on Page 7, Column 5.

Continued from Page 1, Col. 2.

1930-1931 are: President—Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe; Vice President—William S. Innis; Secretary—Hugh F. MacColl; Treasurer—Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.; Assistant Secretary—Berrick Schloss; Executive Committee—The officers and William L. Sweet, Harry Parsons Cross and Maurice Joy.

Members of the Music Association advisory committee for 1930-1931, including a number of new members, are: John B. Archer, Mrs. Clarence A. Barbour, Mrs. Dwight K. Bartlett, Nathaniel D. Brown, Walter H. Butterfield, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Roswell H. Fairman, Albert Fenner, C. Walter Fraleigh, Mrs. R. H. Ives Goddard, Mrs. Lucy Marsh Gordon, Theodore Francis Green, Mrs. Harold J. Gross, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Annette Mason Ham, Andrew L. Intlehouse, Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, Carl B. Marshall, Mrs. Caesar Misch, Miss Margaret S. Morriss, Mrs. Elisha Capron Mowry, Miss Edith Nichols, Mrs. Walter P. Peirce, Mrs. G. W. H. Ritchie, Ellsworth Sisson, Elmer G. Wilson Smith, J. D. Tamarkin, Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., and Rev. Walter Williams.

And still they come. Says The Chesterian in the latest mail from London: "Arthur Honegger is engaged upon the completion of his ballet 'Amphion' after Paul Valery's poem, and is working on a Symphony which is to be performed in Boston upon the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Dr. Koussevitzky, world acclaimed as one of the great conductors of the present time, will conduct the Boston Symphony program to be given at Bushnell Memorial Hall on the evening of April 9, under the auspices of Frank A. Sedgwick.
(C) Caro

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of Boston Symphony in farewell concert of season Tuesday night.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Presents Ravel's "Bolero" Tuesday

Orchestral Sensation of the Year Uncanny in Its Crescendo

(Written for the Sunday Journal)
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the pieces included by Dr. Koussevitzky in the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, namely Ravel's "Bolero," may justly be regarded as the orchestral sensation of the year. Possibly it is a sign of the musical poverty of our times that a piece so slight from the purely musical standpoint should be the one to merit this description. Concert audiences, however, are but human, and Ravel has in this composition played upon their susceptibilities with a skill that, whatever else may be said for "Bolero," commands the warmest admiration.

It is a well established musical principle that the prolonged reiteration of a rhythm acts directly upon the listener's nervous system, and properly handled this device can be productive of intense excitement. It is well known, too, that a long orchestral crescendo, a gradual piling-up of instrumental sonorities, will produce a powerful nervous reaction. And in "Bolero," which he wrote, incidentally, as vehicle for the art of the dancer Ida Rubinstein, Ravel has combined these two methods of appeal--or perhaps assault is the accurate word.

A single rhythmic design two measures in length runs through "Bolero," announced first by a snare-drum and never relinqushed until the final chord has sounded. A single melody of two well-defined sections is many times repeated; a single chord, the chord of C major, serves the accompaniment until, just before the close, it is replaced for a few measures by the chord of E major and then resumed.

But the remarkable feature of "Bolero" is not the employment of this principle of organized monotony or the use of the long crescendo a trick as old as Rossini, or older. It is the uncanny ingenuity with which this crescendo is effected, the adding of instrument after instrument, choir after choir, until the progress from the faintest pianissimo to a thunderous fortissimo has been achieved. And the modulation above referred to, of electrifying effect, is a stroke of genius. The first audience to hear "Bolero" in Boston found release for its pent-up excitements in a veritable storm of applause, stamping and cheers.

The remainder of next Tuesday's program is not of a sensational nature, but it is lacking neither in diversity nor in directness of appeal. For those who care for music in the pure classic style that attains a beauty untroubled by emotion, there is a Concerto Grosso of Handel, in D minor, for strings, one of the set of twelve which he wrote within the brief space of a month for an English publisher. For those who prefer that music should represent some extraneous idea or situation, there is the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" that would suggest the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. And here the creative genius of Moussorgsky, most original of the Russians, is supplemented and reinforced by the rare orchestral cunning of his confrere Rimsky-Korsakov, who scored Moussorgsky's work.

Finally, for those who cherish most of all the combined formal and emotional appeal to be found in the modern symphony, there is the Symphony in D major of Brahms, the second of his four great masterworks in that genre. Coming after the imposing First Symphony in C minor Brahms' Second, with its almost Mendelssohnian grace and clarity, surprised and even disappointed the critics of that day, who were looking for more profundity, for epic breadths. But the most popular of the four. Only in the grave and brooding Adagio is there a lapse from the warmth and geniality, the lyric flow, the rhythmic life that particularly characterize this Symphony. And this slow movement is itself preferred by some Brahmsites to any other that the composer gave us.

In Boston, by the way, the music of Brahms has lately filled five Festival programs, with Dr. Koussevitzky as the motivating force and presiding genius. And the popular enthusiasm with which this liberal dose of Brahms was received bore witness to the general affection in which that composer, once found crabbed the austere, is now held.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

Arthur Schnabel, Pianist, To Appear in Brooklyn

One of the largest factors in the success of the Brahms festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mar. 21—26, was the appearance of Artur Schnabel, the great Austrian pianist, in the two concertos and smaller works of this master. Artur Schnabel has journeyed from Europe for the particular purpose of appearing in the festival and will likewise play with the Orchestra in New York and at the last concert of the series in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, April 11.

Particularly famous as an interpreter of the music of Beethoven and Brahams, Mr. Schnabel is to play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in G. major, at this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will devote the program to the music of Beethoven, also presenting the Pastoral Symphony No. 6, and the Overture to Leonore No. 3.

Although little known in America except by repute, Artur Schnabel has for many year been regarded in Europe as one of the greatest of living pianists. Before sailing for America, he gave a series of concerts in London to immense audiences. He visited America in 1923, then making but few appearances, including one with this orchestra in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Schnabel in Brooklyn

Artur Schnabel will be a soloist at the Boston Symphony's next concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 11, when he will play the G major piano concerto on an all-Beethoven program. Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers will be the Pastoral Symphony and third "Leonore" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

Boston Orchestra Concludes Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, has just concluded a festival of the music of Johannes Brahms, which includes daily concerts from March 21 to 26. The works performed were the four symphonies, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the "Haydn Variations," the two Piano Concerti, the Violin Concerto, the Piano Quintet, and choral works including the "German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny."

Assisting artists were the choruses of Harvard University and Radcliffe College, directed by Archibald Davison and Wallace Woodworth; the Burgin String Quartet; Arthur Schnabel, pianist; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Audiences were capacity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

$10,000 SOUGHT AS MUSIC FUND

Providence Association Sends Out Plea to Insure Continuance of Concerts.

GREATER PROGRAM PLANNED

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of Organization, Points Out Other Cities Raise Bigger Sums

An appeal for a fund of $10,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts coming to Providence, to finance at least two other major music attractions during the 1930-1931 season and aid in the development of a community appreciation of important music, was sent out yesterday by the Providence Music Association.

Of the total amount needed, $4500 is to be used for the Boston Symphony concerts, to be held in the Albee Theatre. For two or three other concerts, probably two visiting symphonies or three great artists, the Music Association's budget calls for $4750. The balance of the $10,000 is needed to recoup a deficit suffered during the 1929-1930 season because of the fact that the underwriting of the concert series did not come up to expectations.

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, in a letter to a number of Providence supporters of good music, points out that "other cities are raising similar funds to a far larger extent from Hartford's $12,000 to Detroit's $250,000 yearly."

"Situated as we are in Providence," Mrs. Sharpe's letter continues, "we are in the very fortunate position of being able to bring here the great orchestras and artists who regularly go to Boston and New York."

Because of the successful Cleveland and Detroit orchestra concerts during the past season, the Music Association is developing plans for an extension of its program in this city, particularly for the purpose of interesting children in excellent music, officers of the association said yesterday. It is hoped that children's music can be played by visiting orchestras on the afternoon of the day on which the evening concert is to be played and the expectation is that such attractions can be made entirely self-supporting if a nominal charge is made for children's tickets.

Subscriptions to the Music Association's 1930-1931 fund are being sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer at the offices of the association, 313 Gas Company building. All subscriptions will be acknowledged in the newspapers.

Officers of the Music Association for

Continued on Page 7, Column 5.

Continued from Page 1, Col. 2.

1930-1931 are: President, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe; Vice President, William S. Innis; Secretary, Hugh F. MacColl; Treasurer, Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.; Assistant Secretary, Perrick Schloss; Executive Committee, The officers and William L. Steel, Harry Parsons Cross and Maurice Jo

Members of the Music Association, 1931, including [illegible] are John B. Archer, Mrs. Charles C. A. Barbour, Mrs. Dwight K. Barber, Nathaniel D. Brown, Walter H. Butterfield, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Roswell H. Fairman, Albert Feiner, C. Walter Fraleigh, Mrs. R. H. Ives Goddard, Mrs. Lucy Marsh Gordon, Theodore Francis Green, Mrs. Harold J. Gross, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Annette Mason Ham, Andrew L. Imlehouse, Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, Carl B. Marshall, Mrs. Caesar Misch, Miss Margaret S. Morriss, Mrs. Elisha Capron Mowry, Miss Edith Nichols, Mrs. Walter P. Peirce, Mrs. G. W. H. Ritchie, Ellsworth Sissor, Elmer G. Wilson Smith, J. D. Tamarkin, Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., and Rev. Walter Williams.

And still they come. Says The Chesterian in the latest mail from London: "Arthur Honegger is engaged upon the completion of his ballet 'Amphion' after Paul Valery's poem, and is working on a Symphony which is to be performed in Boston upon the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Dr. Koussevitzky, world acclaimed as one of the great conductors of the present time, will conduct the Boston Symphony program to be given at Bushnell Memorial Hall on the evening of April 9, under the auspices of Frank A. Sedgwick. (C) Caro

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of Boston Symphony in farewell concert of season Tuesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Will Play Brahm's Symphony on Program Next Week.

Speaking of the First Symphony in C as played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Boston Transcript said, in part:

"The light, misty orchestral tone was veil of beauty upon the intermezzo-like Allegretto. Neither Nikisch nor Dr. Muck himself wrought more suspensive the slow introduction to the finale; received from the horns more sonorous tone. And the finale itself? There are some of us who love not Beethoven's jigging, shouting Ode to Joy to climax the Ninth Symphony, would fain have it end with the Adagio. For them, be it prejudice or blasphemy, Brahm's finale touches a spare and exultant grandeur—Dr. Koussevitzky has reason for his added horns and trombones—while Beethoven's blindly flails the air. And this a a Bramsian [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

LOVERS OF MUSIC CONTRIBUTE $795

Local Association, Seeking $10,000, Plans to Bring Noted Artists Here

First responses to the Music Association's appeal for $10,000 to keep the Boston Symphony concerts and other important music coming to this city brought subscriptions totalling $795, it was reported yesterday at the offices of the Music Association, 313 Gas Company building.

Subscriptions received yesterday were from Mrs. Gammell Cross, $100; John R. Gladding, $100; Mrs. George Hail, $200; G. Pierce Metcalf, $100; Stephen O. Metcalf, $100; William L. Sweet, $50; Wilson G. Wing, $100; Anne Gilbreth Cross, $25; Eliza Clark Greenough, $10; Mrs. Arthur T. Jones, $10.

Last year's total subscription amounted to $7740. This year the Music Association is planning a more extensive programe and has budgeted its needs at $10,000 to pay for the Boston Symphony and two or three other concerts by famous orchestras or great artists. Subscriptions are being mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, and addressed to 313 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Season's Final Program

Familiar Brahms And New Ravel Sensation Charm Large Audience.—Failure of Concerto of Handel To Draw Much Applause Not Surprising. Moussorgsky Prelude Brilliant.

With the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening the season of symphonic music came to an end. The usual large audience attended, charmed alike by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mature technique of the baton and the crisp, clean playing of the followers of the wand; for both conductor and orchestra were in the most animated moods, the one to lead where few could follow, and the other to follow in despite of chasm or climb. So whether one spent his time in watching the intricacies of the conductor's art or listening to his followers trying to build anew the tower of Babel or once more pile Ossa upon Pelion, he had his reward, and a brilliant reward it was. For flushed with the successes of the Brahms Festival and intent upon the cry of the closing season, the players put themselves into their play with more than their wonted ardor, making their performance memorable, in spite of the rather tenuous nature of some of the media with their incidental lack of charm.

The program:

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro
Moussorgsky .....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel ......"Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

Bolero Creates Sensation.

As was to be expected, the much bruited Bolero of Ravel made its proper sensation. Critics had told us already in language more or less guarded that this composition was an ill-disguised musical joke perpetrated to show the susceptibility of a sophisticated music public. After it is played and done with it seems hardly to be that. One might liken it to a dame of uncertain years robed in multi-hued gunny sack, leaping and shrieking in hysterical frenzy in an inane endeavor to prove that she is the belle of the ball, for all the satin and silk and cloth-of-gold-clad rivals that contend for the honor. Half as long, it might be tolerable, and less than that by half, it might be interesting; but as it stands it is sheer wantonness and mockery. The fact that the crowd goes wild over such stuff is not at all surprising, for that is the business of the crowd; but down in its heart the crowd knows that it has been cheated, and it sends up its roar merely to show that it is a good sport. Moreover, it is pleasant to see a great orchestra put through its paces, whether the paces lead to Paradise or the Pit. After which one is tempted to cry Hurrah for Duke Ellington!

On the other hand it is not surprising that the Concerto of Handel failed to elicit the applause that is its musical due. Handel is not quite a la mode at present, so there are few who stop to note the moral significance of his manner, his sense of order, balance, moderation, measure—"in short, a certain easily recognizable manner of conceiving and rendering life." Ours now "is a susceptibility to irregular beauty, a fondness for the striking and the unusual even at the expense of regularity and order, a preference for fascinating detail above symmetry and proportion, a predilection for the coruscations of style—for the glittering phrase, for the exotic turn, for everything that thrills and dazzles, a hunger for sensation, even when these desires lead to a dissipation of the attention—" such are the external qualities that charm and hold us at the present time.

Prelude Brilliant

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov Prelude was more brilliant than that given recently by the Cleveland Orchestra; a greater light flooded the dawning of day over the Red Square in Moscow, but with the light there went not a corresponding warmth. Perhaps it was not so intended by either composer or expositor. The orchestral cunning of Rimsky-Korsakov was apparent enough, but it is more than probable that this very cunning has deleted much that the creative genius of the original composer prized most highly.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed very noticeably his attitude towards Brahms since his last presentation of the D-major symphony here. His Brahms has now become less crabbed, less angular, more chastened, full of a tender grace that was long denied him, and altogether redolent of Flora and the country green. In fact the beautiful lullaby effect of the first movement, coming after the frightful cacophony of the Ravel misdemeanor, seemed like the blessing of God the Father.

Before beginning the regular program Dr. Koussevitzky came out ond paid a touching tribute to the memory of the late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, speaking of him as a devoted patron of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; after which he asked the audience to stand while the orchestra, standing, played a funeral march in memory of him who had gone to rest.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

A Season's Adieu by Koussevitzky

Familiar Brahms and the New Ravel Sensation Build a Program to Terminate the Boston Symphony Series Here.—Moussorgsky and Handel

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento. Allegro moderato; Allegro
Moussorgsky .....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel ......"Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

With the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening the season of symphonic music came to an end. The usual large audience attended, charmed alike by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mature technique of the baton and the crisp, clean playing of the followers of the wand; for both conductor and orchestra were in the most animated moods, the one to lead where few could follow, and the other to follow in despite of chasm or climb. So whether one spent his time in watching the intricacies of the conductor's art or listening to his followers trying to build anew the tower of Babel or once more pile Ossa upon Pelion, he had his reward, and a brilliant reward it was. For flushed with the successes of the Brahms Festival and intent upon the cry of the closing season, the players put themselves into their play with more than their wonted ardor, making their performance memorable, in spite of the rather tenuous nature of some of the media with their incidental lack of charm.

Bolero Creates Sensation.

As was to be expected, the much bruited Bolero of Ravel made its proper sensation. Critics had told us already in language more or less guarded that this composition was an ill-disguised musical joke perpetrated to show the susceptibility of a sophisticated music public. After it is played and done with it seems hardly to be that. One might liken it to a dame of uncertain years robed in multi-hued gunny sack, leaping and shrieking in hysterical frenzy in an inane endeavor to prove that she is the belle of the ball, for all the satin and silk and cloth-of-gold-clad rivals that contend for the honor. Half as long, it might be tolerable, and less than that by half, it might be interesting; but as it stands it is sheer wantonness and mockery. The fact that the crowd goes wild over such stuff is not at all surprising, for that is the business of the crowd; but down in its heart the crowd knows that it has been cheated, and it sends up its roar merely to show that it is a good sport. Moreover, it is pleasant to see a great orchestra put through its paces, whether the paces lead to Paradise or the Pit. After which one is tempted to cry Hurrah for Duke Ellington!

On the other hand it is not surprising that the Concerto of Handel failed to elicit the applause that is its musical due. Handel is not quite a la mode at present, so there are few who stop to note the moral significance of his manner, his sense of order, balance, moderation, measure—"in short, a certain easily recognizable manner of conceiving and rendering life." Ours now "is a susceptibility to irregular beauty, a fondness for the striking and the unusual even at the expense of regularity and order, a preference for fascinating detail above symmetry and proportion, a predilection for the coruscations of style—for the glittering phrase, for the exotic turn, for everything that thrills and dazzles, a hunger for sensation, even when these desires lead to a dissipation of the attention—" such are the external qualities that charm and hold us at the present time.

Prelude Brilliant

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov Prelude was more brilliant than that given recently by the Cleveland Orchestra; a greater light flooded the dawning of day over the Red Square in Moscow, but with the light there went not a corresponding warmth. Perhaps it was not so intended by either composer or expositor. The orchestral cunning of Rimsky-Korsakov was apparent enough, but it is more than probable that this very cunning has deleted much that the creative genius of the original composer prized most highly.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed very noticeably his attitude towards Brahms since his last presentation of the D-major symphony here. His Brahms has now become less crabbed, less angular, more chastened, full of a tender grace that was long denied him, and altogether redolent of Flora and the country green. In fact the beautiful lullaby effect of the first movement, coming after the frightful cacophony of the Ravel misdemeanor, seemed like the blessing of God the Father.

Before beginning the regular program Dr. Koussevitzky came out ond paid a touching tribute to the memory of the late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, speaking of him as a devoted patron of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; after which he asked the audience to stand while the orchestra, standing, played a funeral march in memory of him who had gone to rest.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DR. FAUNCE PAID TRIBUTE IN MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Unexpected but Moving Threnody.

A threnody to the memory of Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, offered by the conductor and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the language of music, in which they are articulate and expressive, called the concert audience at the Albee Theatre to its feet last night to join in homage to the man who had been honorary president of the Providence Music Association since its organization. The playing of a funeral march came as an unexpected but moving tribute to Dr. Faunce. It was followed by the last concert of the Boston Symphony's 1929-1930 series in this city.

The customary applause greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he made his first appearance upon the stage and moved toward the conductor's stand. Instead of turning immediately to lead his musicians, however, he faced the audience, and the house lights were turned up again. He spoke, phrasing his sentences with effort, and for most of the audience it was the first time they had heard his voice.

Dr. Koussevitzky referred to the absence of President Faunce from his usual place and said he missed the welcome the latter usually gave him.

The loss, he said, was a personal one because he had received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music from him.

"Brown University was the first," the conductor added, "to appreciate my efforts for music in this country."

He asked the audience to stand while the orchestra played a funeral march.

When Mr. Koussevitzky was made doctor on Feb. 24, 1926, he resorted to music to make his acknowledgment. At that time he played his double bass, his first public appearance in America as a soloist on that instrument. Again last night he turned to music to express his sentiments.

The audience heard the march in silence, only a few scattering, well-meant bursts of applause greeting its conclusion. When Dr. Koussevitzky returned to his stand a minute later, however, he was given a rousing reception.

Announcement was made to the audience that dates are being held at the Albee Theatre for four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Those dates are Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20 and April 14. The Music Association, which is sponsor for those Providence appearances, inserted in each program last night a printed appeal for subscriptions for next winter. The subscriptions should be forwarded to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, 313 Gas Company building, Providence, the notice stated.

[illegible] desires lead to a dissipation of the attention—" such are the external qualities that charm and hold us at the present time.

Prelude Brilliant

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov Prelude was more brilliant than that given recently by the Cleveland Orchestra; a greater light flooded the dawning of day over the Red Square in Moscow, but with the light there went not a corresponding warmth. Perhaps it was not so intended by either composer or expositor. The orchestral cunning of Rimsky-Korsakov was apparent enough, but it is more than probable that this very cunning has deleted much that the creative genius of the original composer prized most highly.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed very noticeably his attitude towards Brahms since his last presentation of the D-major symphony here. His Brahms has now become less crabbed, less angular, more chastened, full of a tender grace that was long denied him, and altogether redolent of Flora and the country green. In fact the beautiful lullaby effect of the first movement, coming after the frightful cacophony of the Ravel misdemeanor, seemed like the blessing of God the Father.

Before beginning the regular program Dr. Koussevitzky came out ond paid a touching tribute to the memory of the late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, speaking of him as a devoted patron of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; after which he asked the audience to stand while the orchestra, standing, played a funeral march in memory of him who had gone to rest.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

[illegible]

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony accomplished their ambitious tribute to Johannes Brahms in a festival that occupied the major part of the last week of March. The four symphonies were played as well as the Academic Festival overture with its gay student song themes, which made rousing prelude to the whole festival. Arthur Schnabel came from Berlin to play the two concertos and the piano intermezzi opus 119. Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano, and Frazer Gange, baritone, were the vocal soloists.

The choral works given were the "Song of Destiny," the German Requiem and the "Liebeslieder." Mme. Matzenauer did four of the more celebrated songs and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet presented the piano quintet. The reaction of the public to this admittedly heavy diet was described to me by Guy Maier as "enthusiastic enough for a Milan audience at a performance of 'Aida' under Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

-:- MUSIC -:-

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSES

The last symphony concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra was given in the Albee Theatre last night. It was marked by an act of graciousness on Mr. Koussevitzky's part that is deserving of all praise. Coming before his audience, the famous conductor recalled the fact that Brown University was the first in this country to give him an honorary degree. Recalling also his friendship with the late Dr. Faunce and what Dr. Faunce had done to help the symphony concerts along, Dr. Koussevitzky asked the audience to rise while the orchestra played the funeral march. It was a finely impressive moment, and the rendition of the famous march was more than creditable alike to the sincerity of Mr. Koussevitzky's feeling and his musicianship.

* * *

After that preliminary, the programme proper began with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, a composition which neither sears the soul nor brings any wild joy to the spirit but which is pleasant and orderly and full of melodic phrasing. It has the quality of chamber music and it was so received by the audience, with true early Victorian deference and praise free of all excitability. Next came Moussorsky and that, if we may be pardoned the slightly frivolous phrase, was a horse of another color. Moussorsky is now recognized by the discriminating as the greatest of Russian musicians; there is no need to stress the eminence of his opera "Boris Goudonov." But his irregular life caused him to be long neglected, nor would his fame be what it is today had not Rimsky Korsakov, with rare devotion, given himself to the organizing of the material Moussorsky left behind him.

It would be difficult to imagine a more curiously brilliant work of musical interpretation than the Prelude to Khovantchina, the Moussorsky work played last night. The opera to which it belongs deals with the struggle between the old and the new Russias in the days of Peter the Great. But Moussorsky saw these things differently from the average composer; there is no sound and fury in his picture of the battle. Rather, did he bring us down to the cold truth that at bottom the quarrel was intellectual and spiritual. He portrayed the internal, not the external aspects of it. No wonder he is called the most Russian of all the Russian composers.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky followed this with Ravel's "Bolero" which we heard played elsewhere and by another conductor not so long ago. It was really the most brilliant feat of the evening, an achievement which was as Spanish as Spain itself. Of Ravel we need say little, for he is becoming more and more familiar to us. But it seems we ought to say of him that this Frenchman is the cleverest and most colorful composer of our time. Old fogies and others whose minds passed into a condition of decomposition a decade and a half ago dislike this "Bolero." It is a joke on the public, we are told. We wish somebody would write some more jokes of the same kind. Can there be no humor in music? Must the world and his wife always be treated by musicians as if they were a pair of wall-eyed sentimentalists sitting through a concert as they might sit beside the biers of their grandfathers or grandmothers. The light of the arts—all of the arts—must not always be expected to shine ever "like a tall candle before the Holy Rood." Some people who go to concerts or picture exhibitions, in which new ideas are expressed, would do better to stay at home and read the poetry of Ella Wheeler Wilcox or Eddie Guest. They belong with the spiritually dead. They understand not irony, and therefore look at life with unseeing eyes.

* * *

The concert closed with Brahms's Second Symphony in which Mr. Koussevitzky did not shine particularly. We do not know just what it is in Brahms that continues to defy Mr. Koussevitzky. Last night, however, he seemed to be very much in a hurry so that passages whose strength was needed to give the full substance of the symphony were almost lost in the rush. But not even this finished wielder of the baton can be expected to do all things equally well.

M. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Will Play Brahm's Symphony on Program Next Week.

Speaking of the First Symphony in C as played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Boston Transcript said, in part:

"The light, misty orchestral tone was veil of beauty upon the intermezzo-like Allegretto. Neither Nikisch nor Dr. Muck himself wrought more suspensive the slow introduction to the finale; received from the horns more sonorous tone. And the finale itself? There are some of us who love not Beethoven's jigging, shouting Ode to Joy to climax the Ninth Symphony, would fain have it end with the Adagio. For them, be it prejudice or blasphemy, Brahm's finale touches a spare and exultant grandeur—Dr. Koussevitzky has reason for his added horns and trombones—while Beethoven's blindly flails the air. And this a a Bramsian time Dr. Koussevitzky will play Brahms 2d Symphony at Bushnell Memorial hal next week Wednesday, one of the bes the Boston Symphony does. Seats or sale at McCoy's, No 89 Asylum street.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

LOVERS OF MUSIC CONTRIBUTE $795

Local Association, Seeking $10,000, Plans to Bring Noted Artists Here

First responses to the Music Association's appeal for $10,000 to keep the Boston Symphony concerts and other important music coming to this city brought subscriptions totalling $795, it was reported yesterday at the offices of the Music Association, 313 Gas Company building.

Subscriptions received yesterday were from Mrs. Gammell Cross, $100; John R. Gladding, $100; Mrs. George Hail, $200; G. Pierce Metcalf, $100; Stephen O. Metcalf, $100; William L. Sweet, $50; Wilson G. Wing, $100; Anne Gilbreth Cross, $25; Eliza Clark Greenough, $10; Mrs. Arthur T. Jones, $10.

Last year's total subscription amounted to $7740. This year the Music Association is planning a more extensive programe and has budgeted its needs at $10,000 to pay for the Boston Symphony and two or three other concerts by famous orchestras or great artists. Subscriptions are being mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, and addressed to 313 Gas Company building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

A Season's Adieu by Koussevitzky

Familiar Brahms and the New Ravel Sensation Build a Program to Terminate the Boston Symphony Series Here.—Moussorgsky and Handel

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel.... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento. Allegro moderato; Allegro
Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel .....
.....Bolero"
Brahms..... Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

With the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening the season of symphonic music came to an end. The usual large audience attended, charmed alike by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mature technique of the baton and the crisp, clean playing of the followers of the wand; for both conductor and orchestra were in the most animated moods, the one to lead where few could follow, and the other to follow in despite of chasm or climb. So whether one spent his time in watching the intricacies of the conductor's art or listening to his followers trying to build anew the tower of Babel or once more pile Ossa upon Pelion, he had his reward, and a brilliant reward it was. For flushed with the successes of the Brahms Festival and intent upon the cry of the closing season, the players put themselves into their play with more than their wonted ardor, making their performance memorable, in spite of the rather tenuous nature of some of the media with their incidental lack of charm.

Bolero Creates Sensation.

As was to be expected, the much bruited Bolero of Ravel made its proper sensation. Critics had told us already in language more or less guarded that this composition was an ill-disguised musical joke perpetrated to show the susceptibility of a sophisticated music public. After it is played and done with it seems hardly to be that. One might liken it to a dame of uncertain years robed in multi-hued gunny sack, leaping and shrieking in hysterical frenzy in an inane endeavor to prove that she is the belle of the ball, for all the satin and silk and cloth-of-gold-clad rivals that contend for the honor. Half as long, it might be tolerable, and less than that by half, it might be interesting; but as it stands it is sheer wantonness and mockery. The fact that the crowd goes wild over such stuff is not at all surprising, for that is the business of the crowd; but down in its heart the crowd knows that it has been cheated, and it sends up its roar merely to show that it is a good sport. Moreover, it is pleasant to see a great orchestra put through its paces, whether the paces lead to Paradise or the Pit. After which one is tempted to cry Hurrah for Duke Ellington!

On the other hand it is not surprising that the Concerto of Handel failed to elicit the applause that is its musical due. Handel is not quite a la mode at present, so there are few who stop to note the moral significance of his manner, his sense of order, balance, moderation, measure—"in short, a certain easily recognizable manner of conceiving and rendering life." Ours now "is a susceptibility to irregular beauty, a fondness for the striking and the unusual even at the expense of regularity and order, a preference for fascinating detail above symmetry and proportion, a predilection for the coruscations of style—for the glittering phrase, for the exotic turn, for everything that thrills and dazzles, a hunger for sensation, even when these desires lead to a dissipation of the attention—" such are the external qualities that charm and hold us at the present time.

Prelude Brilliant

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov Prelude was more brilliant than that given recently by the Cleveland Orchestra; a greater light flooded the dawning of day over the Red Square in Moscow, but with the light there went not a corresponding warmth. Perhaps it was not so intended by either composer or expositor. The orchestral cunning of Rimsky-Korsakov was apparent enough, but it is more than probable that this very cunning has deleted much that the creative genius of the original composer prized most highly.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed very noticeably his attitude towards Brahms since his last presentation of the D-major symphony here. His Brahms has now become less crabbed, less angular, more chastened, full of a tender grace that was long denied him, and altogether redolent of Flora and the country green. In fact the beautiful lullaby effect of the first movement, coming after the frightful cacophony of the Ravel misdemeanor, seemed like the blessing of God the Father.

Before beginning the regular program Dr. Koussevitzky came out ond paid a touching tribute to the memory of the late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, speaking of him as a devoted patron of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; after which he asked the audience to stand while the orchestra, standing, played a funeral march in memory of him who had gone to rest.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FAUNCE PAID TRIBUTE IN MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Unexpected but Moving Threnody.

A threnody to the memory of Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, offered by the conductor and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the language of music, in which they are articulate and expressive, called the concert audience at the Albee Theatre to its feet last night to join in homage to the man who had been honorary president of the Providence Music Association since its organization. The playing of a funeral march came as an unexpected but moving tribute to Dr. Faunce. It was followed by the last concert of the Boston Symphony's 1929-1930 series in this city.

The customary applause greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he made his first appearance upon the stage and moved toward the conductor's stand. Instead of turning immediately to lead his musicians, however, he faced the audience, and the house lights were turned up again. He spoke, phrasing his sentences with effort, and for most of the audience it was the first time they had heard his voice.

Dr. Koussevitzky referred to the absence of President Faunce from his usual place and said he missed the welcome the latter usually gave him.

The loss, he said, was a personal one because he had received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music from him.

"Brown University was the first," the conductor added, "to appreciate my efforts for music in this country."

He asked the audience to stand while the orchestra played a funeral march.

When Mr. Koussevitzky was made doctor on Feb. 24, 1926, he resorted to music to make his acknowledgment. At that time he played his double bass, his first public appearance in America as a soloist on that instrument. Again last night he turned to music to express his sentiments.

The audience heard the march in silence, only a few scattering, well-meant bursts of applause greeting its conclusion. When Dr. Koussevitzky returned to his stand a minute later, however, he was given a rousing reception.

Announcement was made to the audience that dates are being held at the Albee Theatre for four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Those dates are Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20 and April 14. The Music Association, which is sponsor for those Providence appearances, inserted in each program last night a printed appeal for subscriptions for next winter. The subscriptions should be forwarded to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, 313 Gas

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

REMARKABLE CRITIC

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony accomplished their ambitious tribute to Johannes Brahms in a festival that occupied the major part of the last week of March. The four symphonies were played as well as the Academic Festival overture with its gay student song themes, which made rousing prelude to the whole festival. Arthur Schnabel came from Berlin to play the two concertos and the piano intermezzi opus 119. Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano, and Frazer Gange, baritone, were the vocal soloists.

The choral works given were the "Song of Destiny," the German Requiem and the "Liebeslieder." Mme. Matzenauer did four of the more celebrated songs and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet presented the piano quintet. The reaction of the public to this admittedly heavy diet was described to me by Guy Maier as "enthusiastic enough for a Milan audience at a performance of 'Aida' under Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

75

-:- MUSIC -:-

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSES

The last symphony concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra was given in the Albee Theatre last night. It was marked by an act of graciousness on Mr. Koussevitzky's part that is deserving of all praise. Coming before his audience, the famous conductor recalled the fact that Brown University was the first in this country to give him an honorary degree. Recalling also his friendship with the late Dr. Faunce and what Dr. Faunce had done to help the symphony concerts along, Dr. Koussevitzky asked the audience to rise while the orchestra played the funeral march. It was a finely impressive moment, and the rendition of the famous march was more than creditable alike to the sincerity of Mr. Koussevitzky's feeling and his musicianship.

* * *

After that preliminary, the programme proper began with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, a composition which neither sears the soul nor brings any wild joy to the spirit but which is pleasant and orderly and full of melodic phrasing. It has the quality of chamber music and it was so received by the audience, with true early Victorian deference and praise free of all excitability. Next came Moussorsky and that, if we may be pardoned the slightly frivolous phrase, was a horse of another color. Moussorsky is now recognized by the discriminating as the greatest of Russian musicians; there is no need to stress the eminence of his opera "Boris Goudonov." But his irregular life caused him to be long neglected, nor would his fame be what it is today had not Rimsky Korsakov, with rare devotion, given himself to the organizing of the material Moussorsky left behind him.

It would be difficult to imagine a more curiously brilliant work of musical interpretation than the Prelude to Khovantchina, the Moussorsky work played last night. The opera to which it belongs deals with the struggle between the old and the new Russias in the days of Peter the Great. But Moussorsky saw these things differently from the average composer; there is no sound and fury in his picture of the battle. Rather, did he bring us down to the cold truth that at bottom the quarrel was intellectual and spiritual. He portrayed the internal, not the external aspects of it. No wonder he is called the most Russian of all the Russian composers.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky followed this with Ravel's "Bolero" which we heard played elsewhere and by another conductor not so long ago. It was really the most brilliant feat of the evening, an achievement which was as Spanish as Spain itself. Of Ravel we need say little, for he is becoming more and more familiar to us. But it seems we ought to say of him that this Frenchman is the cleverest and most colorful composer of our time. Old fogies and others whose minds passed into a condition of decomposition a decade and a half ago dislike this "Bolero." It is a joke on the public, we are told. We wish somebody would write some more jokes of the same kind. Can there be no humor in music? Must the world and his wife always be treated by musicians as if they were a pair of wall-eyed sentimentalists sitting through a concert as they might sit beside the biers of their grandfathers or grandmothers. The light of the arts—all of the arts—must not always be expected to shine ever "like a tall candle before the Holy Rood." Some people who go to concerts or picture exhibitions, in which new ideas are expressed, would do better to stay at home and read the poetry of Ella Wheeler Wilcox or Eddie Guest. They belong with the spiritually dead. They understand not irony, and therefore look at life with unseeing eyes.

* * *

The concert closed with Brahms's Second Symphony in which Mr. Koussevitzky did not shine particularly. We do not know just what it is in Brahms that continues to defy Mr. Koussevitzky. Last night, however, he seemed to be very much in a hurry so that passages whose strength was needed to give the full substance of the symphony were almost lost in the rush. But not even this finished wielder of the baton can be expected to do all things equally well.

M. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

...Ravel Sensation Charm...
...of Concerto of Handel
...plause Not Surprising.
...relude Brilliant.

With the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening the season of symphonic music came to an end. The usual large audience attended, charmed alike by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mature technique of the baton and the crisp, clean playing of the followers of the wand; for both conductor and orchestra were in the most animated moods, the one to lead where few could follow, and the other to follow in despite of chasm or climb. So whether one spent his time in watching the intricacies of the conductor's art or listening to his followers trying to build anew the tower of Babel or once more pile Ossa upon Pelion, he had his reward, and a brilliant reward it was. For flushed with the successes of the Brahms Festival and intent upon the cry of the closing season, the players put themselves into their play with more than their wonted ardor, making their performance memorable, in spite of the rather tenuous nature of some of the media with their incidental lack of charm.

Bolero Creates Sensation.

As was to be expected, the much bruited Bolero of Ravel made its proper sensation. Critics had told us already in language more or less guarded that this composition was an ill-disguised musical joke perpetrated to show the susceptibility of a sophisticated music public. After it is played and done with it seems hardly to be that. One might liken it to a dame of uncertain years robed in multi-hued gunny sack, leaping and shrieking in hysterical frenzy in an inane endeavor to prove that she is the belle of the ball, for all the satin and silk and cloth-of-gold-clad rivals that contend for the honor. Half as long, it might be tolerable, and less than that by half, it might be interesting; but as it stands it is sheer wantonness and mockery. The fact that the crowd goes wild over such stuff is not at all surprising, for that is the business of the crowd; but down in its heart the crowd knows that it has been cheated, and it sends up its roar merely to show that it is a good sport. Moreover, it is pleasant to see a great orchestra put through its paces, whether the paces lead to Paradise or the Pit. After which one is tempted to cry Hurrah for Duke Ellington!

On the other hand it is not surprising that the Concerto of Handel failed to elicit the applause that is its musical due. Handel is not quite a la mode at present, so there are few who stop to note the moral significance of his manner, his sense of order, balance, moderation, measure—"in short, a certain easily recognizable manner of conceiving and rendering life." Ours now "is a susceptibility to irregular beauty, a fondness for the striking and the unusual even at the expense of regularity and order, a preference for fascinating detail above symmetry and proportion, a predilection for the coruscations of style—for the glittering phrase, for the exotic turn, for everything that thrills and dazzles, a hunger for sensation, even when these desires lead to a dissipation of the attention—" such are the external qualities that charm and hold us at the present time.

Prelude Brilliant

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov Prelude was more brilliant than that given recently by the Cleveland Orchestra; a greater light flooded the dawning of day over the Red Square in Moscow, but with the light there went not a corresponding warmth. Perhaps it was not so intended by either composer or expositor. The orchestral

The program:

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento: Allegro moderato; Allegro
Moussorgsky .....
.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel .....
.....Bolero"

Brahms.....Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

KOUSSEVITZKY.

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

COURANT

The Brahms First Symphony.

Tuesday morning Mr. Sedgwick telephoned me that Dr. Koussevitsky had consented to a change from the announced Second Symphony of Brahms for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert here next Wednesday, to the Brahms "First"—and Mr. Sedgwick seemed duly elated. For it seemed to him that the substitution meant a strengthening of the program that Hartford music-lovers will enjoy—and he called attention particularly to the manner in which the rendition of the Brahms First Symphony was acclaimed by the Boston music critics last week.

Among them Mr. Parker, in the Transcript of March 27 wrote:

"Event belied anticipation. Not last Sunday afternoon, with the Second Piano-Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, but last evening with the First Piano-Concerto and the First Symphony, came the climax of the Brahms Festival. Applause ran full tide at the close of the First Symphony, the concert, and the festival. The house rang with the plaudits. By the new Bostonian custom, feet now stamped for the conductor as they had for Mr. Schnabel. Shouts rose besides. Flowers were handed upward. Time and again Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled until at last the whole audience was on its feet for better acclamation. In his years at Symphony Hall, he has known many such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison."

From this account of the First Symphony's recent reception in Boston one may well imagine that the same work by the same orchestra, under the same direction, may prove highly acceptable to the great audience that will assemble in the Bushnell Memorial Hall on April 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

JOURNAL

SYMPHONY HONORS LATE DEAN OF BROWN

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Apr. 2.—(AP)—A funeral march in memory of the late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president emeritus of Brown University, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the start of its last concert of the season here. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, received the honorary degre of doctor of music from Dr. Faunce in 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Music Notes.

Remembering the recent Brahms festival in Boston sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians will offer only Brahms to their Carnegie Hall audiences of next week. For Thursday evening, April 10, the program comprises the "Academic Festival" overture, the second piano concerto (in B flat) and the fourth symphony (in E minor); for Saturday afternoon, April 12, the "Academic Festival" overture, the first piano concerto (in D minor) and the first symphony (in C minor). Artur Schnabel, who appeared here previously eight seasons ago, will be the soloist of both concerts.

Schnabel's Way With Beethoven

Jour & Trans

AFTER all, it takes a classicist to play the classics. The proof of it was given at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, when Mr. Artur Schnabel, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, in G major. Mr. Schnabel believes in the classics as the greatest achievement that musical art has produced. Music, pure music, unmixed by the extraneous or programmatic, proportioned as perfectly as the man can proportion it and obeying only its own laws, this is the pinnacle around which he centers all else. Thus he idealizes an art which is like unto the gods on Mount Olympus. For him no figure probably stands higher on this pinnacle than the figure of Beethoven. Thus he was interpreting an ideal last evening in Cambridge. That his skill as an executant approaches closely the purity of his idealism has become evident to Bostonians through the concerts of the recent Brahms festival; had been suspected for some years through the report of artist pupils, who in ever increasing numbers flock to him, subsequently spreading the gospel of his insight and skill. The vehicle chosen for further acquainting his hearers with that insight and skill, Beethoven's concerto in G minor, came to some with a loftiness and authority which made them question whether they had ever really heard it before. The Olympian calm one felt in superlative degree. Subordinate to it all were decorative effects, however charming; all lyricism, however telling or expressive in itself. This is not the place for more detail. The concerto is part of today's program at Symphony Hall, the review of which is occasion for more extended comment. Suffice it to say that the concerto as a whole rather than any of its specific features made last evening's performance what it was. And in that whole the work of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men is not to be forgotten.

For the rest of the program, the orchestra played Schubert's two movements called the Unfinished Symphony, Mr. Walter Piston's Suite for Orchestra, Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture, all recently heard or well established in the repertory. Mr. Piston conducted his own suite. The impressions of last Friday were renewed. His conducting is above that of many a composer-conductor. His music shows the growing composer who has made a long step forward. An opening movement indicates skill in the handling of his material; and material that is pleasing to the receptive ear and mind. An Andante brings a gentle mood that satisfies. The positive character of the theme of the final fugue and its powerful handling gives this movement a feeling of great vitality, makes it a worthy climax to what has gone before. Not as dry dust and ashes is this fugue. A finale for the suite could hardly be better conceived. One looks forward with interest and anticipation to the future work of Walter Piston.

With Schubert's symphony Dr. Koussevitzky revealed beauties in his wonted manner. Dr. Koussevitzky, when opportunity offers, is with his orchestra a singer of songs even as is Schubert with his symphony. Once again the melodies sang themselves out to their heart's content. Once again they combined to build larger structures of symphonic proportions. Once again they gave pleasure.

The Germanic humors of the "Academic" overture are almost as well known as the melodies of Schubert. With them, too, Dr. Koussevitzky gave revealing performance. It, too, is a work of tunes, but tunes of far different import than the lyric melodies of Schubert. Each was sharpened, aptly charactered. Brahms and his "academic" tunes made splendid final number for a pleasurable evening.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

EVENING POST

Boston Symphony

Its New York Season Ends—Philadelphia and Philharmonic Programs Next Week—Stadium Concert Plans

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who recently gave a Brahms Festival in Boston, will present two programs of Brahms at the closing New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, April 10, and Saturday afternoon, April 12. Artur Schnabel, who came to America for the special purpose of appearing in the Brahms Festival, will likewise play with this orchestra, presenting the two concertos of Brahms. Mr. Schnabel is little known in America except by repute, having made but one brief visit here several seasons ago. In Europe, however, his reputation is of the highest. He has long been particularly known there as an interpreter of Brahms music.

Thursday's program will consist of the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Second Pianoforte Concerto in B flat and the fourth Symphony in E minor. The Saturday afternoon program presents the "Academic Festival" Overture, the First Pianoforte Concerto in D minor and the First Symphony in C minor.

[illegible] selected an

Herald Apr 3

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

These works of Beethoven's were performed yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall at the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor: the "Pastoral" Symphony; the Piano Concerto in G major, No. 4 (Artur Schnabel, pianist), and the Leonora Overture No. 3.

The performance of the symphony was one of remarkable beauty; remarkable also for technical excellence. There have been performances in the past under other conductors when, by reason of sluggish tempi, sentimentalism, and a lack of spirit in the third movement (even in the thunderstorm), the symphony seemed even to the fanatical worshippers of Beethoven, a bore; so that one was tempted to say of the composer what George Moore years ago wrote of a famous novel by Thomas Hardy: "We are invited to assist at a sheep-shearing scene or at a harvest supper . . . because Mr. Hardy is anxious to show how jolly country he is."

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was conspicuous not only for the fortunate choice of tempi: There was continuity of the musical thought in not a succession of detached episodes. There was no attempt to "megaphonize" flowing measure, simple in their beauty—there was always exquisite proportion, incomparable euphony.

So much for the first movement. We have heard the "Scene by the Brookside" played in so lazy, so perfunctory a manner by conductors more anxious for rigid precision than for poetic expression that it seemed as if the audience would join the composer in sleeping, lulled by the monotonous stream. The "Jolly Gathering of Country Folk" was for once really jolly in an appropriately boisterous manner; the thunder storm was no tuppeny sheet-iron affair; the Shepherd's Song of Gratitude was not so majestic as to be out of character. There have been conductors here who fearing that the audience was somnolent if not fast asleep, and not wishing to be reproached for undue realism in the approach and fury of the storm, have treated the finale in a bombastic manner; but, Beethoven's shepherds are simple folk.

Dr. Koussevitzky has given many eloquent interpretations of music by Beethoven. No conductor of past seasons here has rivaled him in this field, much less surpassed him. Never has he been more musically poetic than in the performance yesterday of the "Pastoral." Nor has the superb orchestra, which is his creation, played this symphony with finer sentiment, tonal beauty, and poetic feeling.

On the other hand there was the gloriously dramatic performance of the familiar overture, in itself a condensation of what is dramatic in an opera that has commonplace, yes bourgeois pages. Hearing this overture as it was played yesterday, one was spared the sight of a Bulbous and shrieking prima donna; of a tenor whose throat had been seriously affected by long confinement in a "demed, moist" dungeon; of the operetta young man and woman chatting with a flat-iron among the stage properties; of four persons, each with an individual sentiment, singing the same tune in an approved scholastic form.

Mr. Schnabel was loudly applauded for his performance of the concerto; a polished performance thoughtfully and musically planned, finely phrased, technically superior as in the brilliant treatment of runs and trills. It is to be regretted that he introduced any cadenza, no matter by whom it was composed. The performance was an excellent, compelling example of his own school of piano playing.

It was not an emotional reading; not even deeply emotional in the marvelous slow movement, though near the end of it there were memorable measures. An absence of legato contributed to many effects that were metallic. An absence of nuances gave too often the impression of uniform sonority in spite of the necessary alternations of forte and piano.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will give concerts in Hartford, New York and Brooklyn. The program of the concerts in Symphony hall on April 18 and 19th will be as follows: Stravinsky, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." Samuel Gardner, "Broadway" (first performance); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor (with Organ) No. 3.

puppies.

SCHNABEL ONCE MORE SOLOIST

Eminent Pianist Adds Much to Program by Symphony

Jour Apr 3

To an all Beethoven program, Dr. Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra added yesterday the delight of again hearing the eminent pianist, Arthur Schnable, as soloist. The program held the "Pastorale" symphony, the G major concerto and the overture to "Leonore."

In the sixth of his symphonies, Beethoven chose to discourse on nature, her intimate beauties and her simplicity. The program notes are highly descriptive, but perhaps it can more correctly be said that this music reflects rather than depicts the rustic scenes brought to the composer's mind during his sojourns in the country. The key-note of the sixth, differing from the lofty spiritualism of its predecessors, is simplicity. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it yesterday made of it the superbly lovely expression of music it is.

Following the intermission, Mr. Schnabel once again took his place at the piano. Acclaimed by his audiences during his recent appearances with the Brahms festival group, Mr. Schnabel was warmly received. Surely there is no greater artist at the piano, particularly playing with orchestra, on the concert stage today. Not alone to Brahms can he give his best. The clarity of his tone, the warmth and feeling, the repose of his legato, the brilliant ease of his technique, his masterly use of the often abused pedal, at once set Mr. Schnabel apart as the greatest of artists. The scale passenges in the concerto's allegro emerged as dazzling pyramids of sound and color. Seldom does Boston have the privilege of such a rarely beautiful performance.

The program closed with the familar and exciting overture to "Leonore," martial in strain with the off-stage trumpet call. It is perhaps once in a season that we have such a superb concert program.

Fathers and mothers are writing to us to make sure that [illegible] charms the playgoer.

BEETHOVEN IS FEATURE AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

FESTIVAL programs have been so common at the Symphony concerts this year that they have almost become the rule rather than the exception, as they should be. After the Brahms orgy—and a most delectable orgy it was—of a little more than a week ago comes this week's all-Beethoven program.

The connecting link is the appearance as soloist of Artur Schnabel, extraordinary German pianist, who was the great light of the Brahms Festival. In Beethoven's G major Concerto he had a "vehicle" even less virtuoso-piece than the two Brahms Concertos. For here is more of the serene, musing, melodic Beethoven than the composer of heroic heights and passionate depths.

Mr. Schnabel played this music in what we conceive to be Beethoven's spirit, with measured pace, infinite care and with ravishingly beautiful touch. The section of thrills in the slow movement was rendered so poetically, yet so unsentimentally, that, a sort of ethereal sigh went up from the audience when he had finished the movement.

The pianist was recalled by applause several times at the close of the concerto. The demonstration was not stormy, as he has experienced several times recently in Boston. But then, one does not shout after this concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky, who contributed notable efforts, shared in the last round of this applause.

The balance of the program consisted of the "Pastorale" Symphony and the Third "Leonore" Overture. Although all this music was finely played by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, the program was unsufficiently varied. Only the overture at the end relieved an hour and a half of mostly "quiet" Beethoven.

CANDLES FOR

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

A Balanced Mind Plays Over Music

As He Takes Leave of Boston, Artur Schnabel Speaks Warmly and Wisely

ARTUR SCHNABEL. No name has been more in the mind of the musical public during the last few weeks. Much Brahms and a little Beethoven have been enthusiastically received from him. In his Brahms and in his Beethoven the master mind has been apparent. Further, his students praise him as a musician of great resource, as a musical thinker of comprehensive scope. To this man, then, went the interviewer, to see what he might have to say for an American newspaper.

There are interviews and interviews. There is the question-and-answer interview, in which the questioner seems to catechize the subject, almost as an attorney questions a witness. There is the interview in which the famous subject is modest, or shy, or devoid of ideas, in which the interviewer finds it necessary to tell him what to say and then to convince him that he has said it. And finally there is the ideal interview in which the interviewer simply listens, while from the richness of the mind of the interviewed there flows a full stream of the reactions of that mind upon the many experiences that have come to it. This paragraph could never have been written had the interview with Artur Schnabel not fallen into the last of those three classes. The interviewer was most cordially received; conversation began, as if by magic, almost out of nothing, continued interestingly for more than an hour, which seemed far less than half that time, when the exigencies of a schedule made a break necessary—with many matters not touched upon that the interviewer would gladly have discussed.

Artur Schnabel the pianist of the concert hall is also the human being of closer, more intimate contact. When the pianist who is Schnabel strides with firm, swift steps the considerable distance to the front of the platform at Symphony Hall, one reads determined purpose into his every move. This masterfulness of personality one feels also in the intimacies of personal converse. It is not a pose of the concert hall; it is the man. In fact, after conversation with him, one cannot imagine that this man would assume a pose upon any occasion or for any purpose. He is what he is, just so.

But this purposiveness of character does not make the man in the least forbidding. His seriousness upon the platform might arouse such fears for one who had not met him. The granite in the character is overlaid with a geniality that puts the visitor at his ease the first moment. The eyes twinkle; the face is wreathed with the smiles of good nature; one suspects a fund of humor, wonders whether one can bring it out. And one finds soon that he does not want to try to bring anything out, that merely to listen is better.

He discovers that Mr. Schnabel is a philosopher who happens to express himself through the medium of an art. A typical German, he thinks deeply and conclusively upon the things which interest him most. Being a musician, he reasons closely concerning esthetics, and historical currents, and values which may be expressed by his art. Those who have been so fortunate as to hear him in the past few weeks know that this philosophizing does not result in dryness or in unemotionalized interpretation. From his conversation as from his playing, one feels that with him head does not stifle heart, nor does heart run away with head. The geniality which makes the visitor at once so much at home is witness of a love of mankind, a warmth and a richness of emotional personality which, in playing, results in those marvellously well-rounded readings of the great masters. Mr. Schnabel is man and musician in whom a large, warm heart and a deep, active, penetrating mind are at work in a condition of almost perfect equilibrium.

To return to the interview. The interviewer began with a compliment upon the artist's great playing; the artist returned with a compliment upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon the idea of giving such a series of concerts as the recent Brahms Festival. The flow of ideas had begun. "You have the most aristocratic orchestra in the world," said Mr. Schnabel with a burst of feeling, affirming and re-affirming the statement with some emphasis. He continued more or less in this wise, "After all, art is an aristocratic matter. In its very nature it can never be levelled down to a 'democratic' plane. It can serve a democracy only by the attempt to level up to its own plane. A festival like this that you have just lived through, seems to me a wonderfully fine thing. For the time you are lifted completely out of everything that seems accidental or trivial or secondary in this life. Consider, as one phase of it, the musicians in the orchestra. They are of many nationalities. But as they give themselves to such a task as this, they are of no nationality whatsoever. They are united in a bond which goes much higher than any nationality ever can go, the bond of pure humanity. When you listened to those concerts did you think of being in Boston, or in America? Would you have thought of being in Paris or Berlin if you had happened to hear such a thing there? Would you not have felt much the same, would you not have been much the same, wherever you might have been? And so I think all fine and great art draws us away from the things that separate us and brings us into the things that unite us."

Talking of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel said, "He has given you a marvelous picture of Brahms in these few days. He has grown tremendously since I last saw him. That was in Moscow in 1914, just before the war. He was playing with his own orchestra then. It was very fine. But he has grown much. Yes, I have been in Russia since the time, four times for concerts since the war."

Here was a subject upon which to secure information if possible. Mr. Schnabel disclaimed ability to give an opinion upon the social and political experiment in Soviet Russia. "It is evident that something colossal is going on. Whether it will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletariat is probably living on a higher level than before. But even one else is being dragged down. The present Russia is no place for a tourist. He will discover nothing. Moreover, there is nothing in Russia for me. Political Communism is not the least concerned with the art-life or with the artistic side of life. It deals with art chiefly as a part of its propaganda. And art itself has no relation to Communism or to any other political theory. Art and propaganda do not have anything to do with one another. There is nothing in common between them.

"I am reminded of a tour into Italy since the beginning of Fascist times. There also one finds an attempt to use art as a part of political propaganda. I had given a few concerts when I was notified by my manager that the Italians were glad to have me play, that they liked my playing, but that if I wanted to play in Italy I would be obliged to make up my programs so that they contained no less than 50 per cent of Italian works. Imagine a pianist making programs 50 per cent Italian. A singer could, and perhaps a violinist—but a pianist!

"Similarly, the Soviet Russians wish to use art. Unquestionably there is much strong talent among them. The students which this new Russia sends me are possessed of an intense and burning seriousness. They seem aflame with eagerness and intensity. As they come in contact with the civilization of western Europe, they look scornfully upon its lack of something 'advanced.' We are far, far behind for them. We are doing many things which seem to them utterly dead and lacking in worth."

Knowing the many and various, loose and incorrect uses of the word "modern," and hoping to get a reaction upon it; knowing further Mr. Schnabel's love for the "classics," one asked him a question about his attitude toward "modern" music. The reaction came swiftly in the demand for a definition of "modern." "What does it mean? A quality or a quantity? A time or a type?" And without waiting for an answer Mr. Schabel launched into a philosophic discussion of musical history and esthetics.

"If you mean contemporary music, I will say that the problem of the twentieth century is to get rid of the nervousness which the nineteenth century created." Upon that somewhat startling statement followed another broadside. "Music grew and developed from about 1650 until about 1830. Since then there has been decline. The twentieth century must concern itself with arresting the decline. The situation at present is hopeful." And in explanation of those positive views, Mr. Schnabel began with an equally startling statement. "I don't see a particle of difference between a piece by Mozart and a piece by Beethoven. What differences may be discovered are differences in the means which the composers used, and [emphatically] means don't count. Take Mozart, for example. The means which he uses in the making of his music are so simple that with him means don't count at all as a part of his music. And yet there is a freshness and a vitality there which makes us feel that it is music not of today, let alone of the past, but that it is always the music of tomorrow. No, means don't count. It is what is behind that counts.

"Every great piece of music, every great work of art, is a balance between affirmation and revolt. Earth, heaven and hell, each must find its place in the equilibrium of a great synthesis. The great art work must transcend everything that is incidental or specialized. If it uses the incidental or the specialized it must find something with which to balance it. For the equilibrium of forces must be maintained. Thus a great transcendental calm will result. This calm is the perfect opposite of everything that tends toward nervousness. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert wrote such transcendental music, music in which the percentage of equilibrium of the various forces is unusually high. Handel, on the other hand, seems to me merely decorative. In the nineteenth century, with its introduction of specialization, with its introduction of things essentially extraneous to music, the percentage of equilibrium within a given work is much lower. The materialistic advances of the nineteenth century were not favorable to advance in art. Nervousness, tension, rather than elemental power too often was the result. The work in itself does not offer the release from the tension which it creates. Wagner, for example, may in some ways be considered roughly analogous to the baroque period in art as compared with the great period which preceded it.

"There are composers in the nineteenth century who go counter to the downward current. There is no nervousness, no specialization in Verdi. His music is independent of his epoch, not materialistic, an excellently balanced synthesis of opposing forces. The percentage of equilibrium is rather high in Berlioz, whose music suffers too often from unreasonable unpopularity. It is high in Brahms, though there are traces of specialization in Brahms, where one might expect more universal qualities. Debussy presents a high degree of specialization and very little synthesis of opposites.

"Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

"Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Krenek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher.

Continued on Page Six

Artur Schnabel

Continued from Page Five

"Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, that of a well-balanced synthesis. 'Oedipus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal than his previous work. They are free from the impurities of the musically extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the artist away (—really the charming hostess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes of the interview an ogre), announcing to us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the present if there were time," Mr. Schnabel continued. The talent of the twentieth century is strong, sound, and clear. It is not nervous. It does not believe in authorities. It must find the best balance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

"My pupils? They are the gifted from all nations. They know the seriousness of work. They know that they can not mix their pleasures with their work and they give work its just preference. America? America sends me some of the best of my pupils. Their talent is incomparable. They are as well prepared as any others; but sometimes their outlook is a bit more naive than that of some of the others. They themselves have excellent poise, an excellent personal equilibrium, in that they have a strong sense of seriousness which carries with it nothing that is depressing. It is a great combination of qualities, this combination of the young Americans."

But the five minutes must have elapsed, and reluctantly but gratefully the interviewer surrendered the musician-philosopher to his next engagement.

A. H. M.

SCHNABEL HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Pianist Again Is Warmly Applauded

All-Bethoven Program Pleases Lovers of the Classics

Artur Schnabel, the noted pianist, whose conspicuous share in the recent Brahms Festival here contributed greatly to its success, was heard as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. Again Mr Schnabel won exceptionally cordial applause.

The other numbers on an all-Beethoven program were the Sixth Symphony, and the "Leonore No. 3" overture. This concert delighted the lovers of the classics. It must have consoled some of them for the many occasions when moderns have predominated on Dr Koussevitzky's programs.

Mr Schnabel's unusually sensitive feeling for the line of Beethoven's melody, his ability to make even the least pianistic measures sound felicitously written for his instrument, his way of revealing the broad outlines of a musical composition without slighting any individual detail again distinguished his playing of this concerto.

One might feel that he and Dr Koussevitzky chose too slow a pace for the andante con moto, one might deplore a slight tendency to hardness of tone in several bold fortissimo passages, but in general one could only admire and delight in a remarkably fine performance of a concerto which by common consent is a masterpiece.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pastoral Symphony" struck one as the finest he has yet given here of any Beethoven symphony. He avoided the excessive loudness, the violent contrasts of tempi and of tonal masses which have disfigured some of his previous interpretations of Beethoven. There were still a few pianissimi that verged on the inaudible, but otherwise the performance had a balance, a sense of proportion, a clarity and fluency of style that were thoroughly in keeping with the music. Seldom has the present Boston Symphony regained as much of the tonal beauty of the vanished prewar orchestra, still so bitterly regretted by many musicians, as it did yesterday in this symphony.

Beethoven, let for once to speak with his own eloquence, his own fervors, in the Sixth Symphony, could not fail to prove once more his title to rank among the two or three greatest masters of music, by touching a listener's heart as well as stirring his imagination. It is easy enough now to note that there are weak spots in this symphony, too many repetitions of the same musical ideas in every movement, a failure to maintain in the third movement the standard of creative power attained in the other three, and so on.

One may admit that the bird calls at the end of the slow movement and the thunder storm err by excess of imitation of actual sounds. And yet there is in this symphony a creative power, an imaginative splendor to which Brahms, for example, never attained.

The great familiar overture, too, is still superb, still triumphant, even in a noisy and ill-coordinated performance such as yesterday's. Beethoven may have failed to make Leonore's story enthralling in the opera "Fidelio," but nobody has yet written music more truly dramatic than this third "Leonore" overture.

Some musicians these days make a boast of their weariness with Beethoven. It is true that he belongs heart and soul to the 19th century, of which the 20th century has grown tired. He is intense, idealistic, eloquent, profound. He has none of the cleverness, the irony, the skepticism, the sophistication of the moderns. He ventures to wear his great heart on his sleeve. It is their boast that they are heartless, disillusioned, world weary.

Beethoven is popular, and when at his best invariably essentially simple. His style, once audaciously original, has been imitated by a century of lesser men until its procedures are all thrice familiar. But who has written music more genuinely noble, m profoundly heart-searching than hi

Consider how many defects of century he avoided. He is never in greater works sentimental, nev bombastic, never shallow, never ove ornamented.

Is not the real proof of Beethoven genius the fact that even lifelon familiarity and endless repetitions ca not weary most people of his work?

Next week the orchestra goes to Ne York. The program now announced f April 18 and 19 includes the suite fro Stravinsky's "Apollo," Samuel Gar ner's new tone poem "Broadway," ar Saint-Saens' organ symphony. P. R.

PRES EMERITUS HADLEY'S BODY ARRIVES AT NEW HAVE

NEW HAVEN, April 4 (A. P.)—The body of Arthur Twining Hadley, president emeritus of Yale University, arrived here today at the end of a journey from Kobe, Japan, where he died on March 5.

SEVERIN M. LAMARRE

FALL RIVER, April 4—The funeral of attorney Severin M. Lamarre, acting city solicitor during the first months of the administration of former Mayor W. Harry Monks, was held today at St Roch's Church in the presence of city officials, justices and other court officials, members of the bar and many relatives and friends.

Rev Charles Clerk celebrated solemn high mass of requiem, assisted by Rev Joseph Bourque as deacon and Rev Arthur Gagnon as subdeacon. Mayor Talbot headed the group of city officials in attendance.

Burial was in Notre Dame Cemetery.

ABNER KINGMAN

MONTREAL, April 4—Abner Kingman, capitalist, philanthropist director of many of Montreal's important financial and industrial corporations, as well as its benevolent and educational institutions, died today at his residence, 4469 Redpath st

Mr Kingman was a native of ton, having been born there on 27, 1856, a son of Abner Kingman well known banker and mercha Boston, of English ancestry, Sarah Anderson, who was of Sc descent. The family were desc from the original Mayflower sto have lived in New England sin landing of the Pilgrim fathers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

...e Contributors to Current Music

...role of Carmen, Saturday night; Artur Schnabel, ... Beniamino Gigli, who sings tonight in Carnegie H...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

ELIMINARY GLIMPSE

...phony;

The Boston Symphony, which gave a Brahms festival in Boston two weeks ago, will give all-Brahms programs for its last two Carnegie Hall concerts of the season under Serge Koussevitsky's direction next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Arthur Schnabel, a soloist in the Boston festival, will play the second piano concerto in B flat on Thursday, and the first, in D minor, on Saturday. On Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music he will play Beethoven's G major concerto in a Beethoven-Brahms program, replacing the originality announced all-Beethoven list.

Mr. Schnabel, who has not been heard here for some years, was born in Lipnik, Czeckoslovakia, in 1882, began his piano study at the age of six with Hans Schmitt in Vienna, and was accepted as a pupil by Leschetizky three years later, in a class of which Ossip Gabrilowitsch was also a member. He first played in America in December, 1921.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A Balanced Mind Plays Over Music

As He Takes Leave of Boston, Artur Schnabel Speaks Warmly and Wisely

ARTUR SCHNABEL. No name has been more in the mind of the musical public during the last few weeks. Much Brahms and a little Beethoven have been enthusiastically received from him. In his Brahms and in his Beethoven the master mind has been apparent. Further, his students praise him as a musician of great resource, as a musical thinker of comprehensive scope. To this man, then, went the interviewer, to see what he might have to say for an American newspaper.

There are interviews and interviews. There is the question-and-answer interview, in which the questioner seems to catechize the subject, almost as an attorney questions a witness. There is the interview in which the famous subject is modest, or shy, or devoid of ideas, in which the interviewer finds it necessary to tell him what to say and then to convince him that he has said it. And finally there is the ideal interview in which the interviewer simply listens, while from the richness of the mind of the interviewed there flows a full stream of the reactions of that mind upon the many experiences that have come to it. This paragraph could never have been written had the interview with Artur Schnabel not fallen into the last of those three classes. The interviewer was most cordially received; conversation began, as if by magic, almost out of nothing, continued interestingly for more than an hour, which seemed far less than half that time, when the exigencies of a schedule made a break necessary—with many matters not touched upon that the interviewer would gladly have discussed.

Artur Schnabel the pianist of the concert hall is also the human being of closer, more intimate contact. When the pianist who is Schnabel strides with firm, swift steps the considerable distance to the front of the platform at Symphony Hall, one reads determined purpose into his every move. This masterfulness of personality one feels also in the intimacies of personal converse. It is not a pose of the concert hall; it is the man. In fact, after conversation with him, one cannot imagine that this man would assume a pose upon any occasion or for any purpose. He is what he is, just so.

But this purposiveness of character does not make the man in the least forbidding. His seriousness upon the platform might arouse such fears for one who had not met him. The granite in the character is overlaid with a geniality that puts the visitor at his ease the first moment. The eyes twinkle; the face is wreathed with the smiles of good nature; one suspects a fund of humor, wonders whether one can bring it out. And one finds soon that he does not want to try to bring anything out, that merely to listen is better.

He discovers that Mr. Schnabel is a philosopher who happens to express himself through the medium of an art. A typical German, he thinks deeply and conclusively upon the things which interest him most. Being a musician, he reasons closely concerning esthetics, and historical currents, and values which may be expressed by his art. Those who have been so fortunate as to hear him in the past few weeks know that this philosophizing does not result in dryness or in unemotionalized interpretation. From his conversation as from his playing, one feels that with him head does not stifle heart, nor does heart run away with head. The geniality which makes the visitor at once so much at home is witness of a love of mankind, a warmth and a richness of emotional personality which, in playing, results in those marvellously well-rounded readings of the great masters. Mr. Schnabel is man and musician in whom a large, warm heart and a deep, active, penetrating mind are at work in a condition of almost perfect equilibrium.

To return to the interview. The interviewer began with a compliment upon the artist's great playing; the artist returned with a compliment upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon the idea of giving such a series of concerts as the recent Brahms Festival. The flow of ideas had begun. "You have the most aristocratic orchestra in the world," said Mr. Schnabel with a burst of feeling, affirming and re-affirming the statement with some emphasis. He continued more or less in this wise, "After all, art is an aristocratic matter. In its very nature it can never be levelled down to a 'democratic' plane. It can serve a democracy only by the attempt to level up to its own plane. A festival like this that you have just lived through, seems to me a wonderfully fine thing. For the time you are lifted completely out of everything that seems accidental or trivial or secondary in this life. Consider, as one phase of it, the musicians in the orchestra. They are of many nationalities. But as they give themselves to such a task as this, they are of no nationality whatsoever. They are united in a bond which goes much higher than any nationality ever can go, the bond of pure humanity. When you listened to those concerts did you think of being in Boston, or in America? Would you have thought of being in Paris or Berlin if you had happened to hear such a thing there? Would you not have felt much the same, would you not have been much the same, wherever you might have been? And so I think all fine and great art draws us away from the things that separate us and brings us into the things that unite us."

Talking of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel said, "He has given you a marvelous picture of Brahms in these few days. He has grown tremendously since I last saw him. That was in Moscow in 1914, just before the war. He was playing with his own orchestra then. It was very fine. But he has grown much. Yes, I have been in Russia since that time, four times for concerts since the war."

Here was a subject upon which to get information if possible. Mr. Schnabel disclaimed ability to give an opinion upon the social and political experiment of Soviet Russia. "It is evident that something colossal is going on. Whether it will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletariat is probably living on a higher level than before. But every one else is being dragged down. The present Russia is no place for a tourist. He will discover nothing. Moreover, there is nothing in Russia for me. Political Communism is not the least concerned with the art-life or with the artistic side of life. It deals with art chiefly as a part of its propaganda. And art itself has no relation to Communism or to any other political theory. Art and propaganda do not have anything to do with one another. There is nothing in common between them.

"I am reminded of a tour into Italy since the beginning of Fascist times. There also one finds an attempt to use art as a part of political propaganda. I had given a few concerts when I was notified by my manager that the Italians were glad to have me play, that they liked my playing, but that if I wanted to play in Italy I would be obliged to make up my programs so that they contained no less than 50 per cent of Italian works. Imagine a pianist making programs 50 per cent Italian. A singer could, and perhaps a violinist—but a pianist!

"Similarly, the Soviet Russians wish to use art. Unquestionably there is much strong talent among them. The students which this new Russia sends me are possessed of an intense and burning seriousness. They seem aflame with eagerness and intensity. As they come in contact with the civilization of western Europe, they look scornfully upon its lack of something 'advanced.' We are far, far behind for them. We are doing many things which seem to them utterly dead and lacking in worth."

Knowing the many and various, loose and incorrect uses of the word "modern," and hoping to get a reaction upon it; knowing further Mr. Schnabel's love for the "classics," one asked him a question about his attitude toward "modern" music. The reaction came swiftly in the demand for a definition of "modern." "What does it mean? A quality or a quantity? A time or a type?" And without waiting for an answer Mr. Schabel launched into a philosophic discussion of musical history and esthetics.

"If you mean contemporary music, I will say that the problem of the twentieth century is to get rid of the nervousness which the nineteenth century created." Upon that somewhat startling statement followed another broadside. "Music grew and developed from about 1650 until about 1830. Since then there has been decline. The twentieth century must concern itself with arresting the decline. The situation at present is hopeful." And in explanation of those positive views, Mr. Schnabel began with an equally startling statement. "I don't see a particle of difference between a piece by Mozart and a piece by Beethoven. What differences may be discovered are differences in the means which the composers used, and [emphatically] means don't count. Take Mozart, for example. The means which he uses in the making of his music are so simple that with him means don't count at all as a part of his music. And yet there is a freshness and a vitality there which makes us feel that it is music not of today, let alone of the past, but that it is always the music of tomorrow. No, means don't count. It is what is behind that counts.

"Every great piece of music, every great work of art, is a balance between affirmation and revolt. Earth, heaven and hell, each must find its place in the equilibrium of a great synthesis. The great art work must transcend everything that is incidental or specialized. If it uses the incidental or the specialized it must find something with which to balance it. For the equilibrium of forces must be maintained. Thus a great transcendental calm will result. This calm is the perfect opposite of everything that tends toward nervousness. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert wrote such transcendental music, music in which the percentage of equilibrium of the various forces is unusually high. Handel, on the other hand, seems to me merely decorative. In the nineteenth century, with its introduction of specialization, with its introduction of things essentially extraneous to music, the percentage of equilibrium within a given work is much lower. The materialistic advances of the nineteenth century were not favorable to advance in art. Nervousness, tension, rather than elemental power too often was the result. The work in itself does not offer the release from the tension which it creates. Wagner, for example, may in some ways be considered roughly analogous to the baroque period in art as compared with the great period which preceded it.

"There are composers in the nineteenth century who go counter to the downward current. There is no nervousness, no specialization in Verdi. His music is independent of his epoch, not materialistic, an excellently balanced synthesis of opposing forces. The percentage of equilibrium is rather high in Berlioz, whose music suffers too often from unreasonable unpopularity. It is high in Brahms, though there are traces of specialization in Brahms, where one might expect more universal qualities. Debussy presents a high degree of specialization and very little synthesis of opposites.

"Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

"Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stra-

Continued on Page Six

r Schnabel

Continued from Page Five

ay, the "Man- he two , "it's ngering t" . . . slowly e quite will it oser of Chortly to Thomhaps, ford, ved in and Chelchestort of Sund the Hung, and Req if so, Or man" phon, the duct es we sisti ing is (Mis well Frer re we Psal, and it in sic." Br poser da ke a eve point Br good Qu nowl- En kov ars No Lo Cl] in ek are writing works of r, works in which the perquilibrium of the opposing wing higher and higher.

began by writing music st, like most of the ninety composers. I personally much for 'Le Sacre.' His show that he is at work on ntal problem of the art-work, l-balanced synthesis. 'Oedipus' 'Apollon Musagete' go far tion. These works are not y are not specialized, they in the direction of univer- show less of the personal vious work. They are free mpurities of the musically these matters were under ogre appeared to carry the —really the charming host- d to keep Mr. Schnabel's mind; still for the purposes iew an ogre), announcing to might talk just five minutes ould like to say more of the here were time," Mr. Schna- d. The talent of the twen- y is strong, sound, and clear. ervous. It does not believe es. It must find the best balance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

"My pupils? They are the gifted from all nations. They know the seriousness of work. They know that they can not mix their pleasures with their work and they give work its just preference. America? America sends me some of the best of my pupils. Their talent is incomparable. They are as well prepared as any others; but sometimes their outlook is a bit more naive than that of some of the others. They themselves have excellent poise, an excellent personal equilibrium, in that they have a strong sense of seriousness which carries with it nothing that is depressing. It is a great combination of qualities, this combination of the young Americans."

But the five minutes must have elapsed, and reluctantly but gratefully the interviewer surrendered the musician-philosopher to his next engagement.

A. H. M.

SCHNABEL HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Pianist Again Is Warmly Applauded

All-Bethoven Program Pleases Lovers of the Classics

Artur Schnabel, the noted pianist, whose conspicuous share in the recent Brahms Festival here contributed greatly to its success, was heard as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. Again Mr Schnabel won exceptionally cordial applause.

The other numbers on an all-Beethoven program were the Sixth Symphony, and the "Leonore No. 3" overture. This concert delighted the lovers of the classics. It must have consoled some of them for the many occasions when moderns have predominated on Dr Koussevitzky's programs.

Mr Schnabel's unusually sensitive feeling for the line of Beethoven's melody, his ability to make even the least pianistic measures sound felicitously written for his instrument, his way of revealing the broad outlines of a musical composition without slighting any individual detail again distinguished his playing of this concerto.

One might feel that he and Dr Koussevitzky chose too slow a pace for the andante con moto, one might deplore a slight tendency to hardness of tone in several bold fortissimo passages, but in general one could only admire and delight in a remarkably fine performance of a concerto which by common consent is a masterpiece.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pastoral Symphony" struck one as the finest he has yet given here of any Beethoven symphony. He avoided the excessive loudness, the violent contrasts of tempi and of tonal masses which have disfigured some of his previous interpretations of Beethoven. There were still a few pianissimi that verged on the inaudible, but otherwise the performance had a balance, a sense of proportion, a clarity and fluency of style that were thoroughly in keeping with the music. Seldom has the present Boston Symphony regained as much of the tonal beauty of the vanished prewar orchestra, still so bitterly regretted by many musicians, as it did yesterday in this symphony.

Beethoven, let for once to speak with his own eloquence, his own fervors, in the Sixth Symphony, could not fail to prove once more his title to rank among the two or three greatest masters of music, by touching a listener's heart as well as stirring his imagination. It is easy enough now to note that there are weak spots in this symphony, too many repetitions of the same musical ideas in every movement, a failure, to maintain in the third movement the standard of creative power attained in the other three, and so on.

One may admit that the bird calls at the end of the slow movement and the thunder storm err by excess of imitation of actual sounds. And yet there is in this symphony a creative power, an imaginative splendor to which Brahms, for example, never attained.

The great familiar overture, too, is still superb, still triumphant, even in a noisy and ill-coordinated performance such as yesterday's. Beethoven may have failed to make Leonore's story enthralling in the opera "Fidelio," but nobody has yet written music more truly dramatic than this third "Leonore" overture.

Some musicians these days make a boast of their weariness with Beethoven. It is true that he belongs heart and soul to the 19th century, of which the 20th century has grown tired. He is intense, idealistic, eloquent, profound. He has none of the cleverness, the irony, the skepticism, the sophistication of the moderns. He ventures to wear his great heart on his sleeve. It is their boast that they are heartless, disillusioned, world weary.

Beethoven is popular, and when at his best invariably essentially simple. His style, once audaciously original, has been imitated by a century of lesser men until its procedures are all thrice familiar. But who has written music more genuinely noble, m profoundly heart-searching than hi

Consider how many defects of century he avoided. He is never in greater works sentimental, nev bombastic, never shallow, never ove ornamented.

Is not the real proof of Beethoven genius the fact that even lifelon familiarity and endless repetitions ca not weary most people of his work?

Next week the orchestra goes to Ne York. The program now announced f April 18 and 19 includes the suite fro Stravinsky's "Apollo," Samuel Ga ner's new tone poem "Broadway," a Saint-Saens' organ symphony. P. R.

PRES EMERITUS HADLEY'S BODY ARRIVES AT NEW HAVE

NEW HAVEN, April 4 (A. P.)—Th body of Arthur Twining Hadley, presi dent emeritus of Yale University, arrived here today at the end of a journey from Kobe, Japan, where he died on March 5.

SEVERIN M. LAMARRE

FALL RIVER, April 4—The funera of attorney Severin M. Lamarre, act ing city solicitor during the first months of the administration of former Mayor W. Harry Monks, was held today at St Roch's Church in the pres ence of city officials, justices and othe court officials, members of the bar and many relatives and friends.

Rev Charles Clerk celebrated solemn high mass of requiem, assiste by Rev Joseph Bourque as deacon an Rev Arthur Gagnon as subdeaco Mayor Talbot headed the group of ci officials in attendance.

Burial was in Notre Dame Cemete

ABNER KINGMAN

MONTREAL, April 4—Abner Ki man, capitalist, philanthropist director of many of Montreal's m important financial and indust corporations, as well as its benevo and educational institutions, died t at his residence, 4469 Redpath st

Mr Kingman was a native of ton, having been born there on 27, 1856, a son of Abner Kingma well known banker and mercha Boston, of English ancestry, Sarah Anderson, who was of Sc descent. The family were desc from the original Mayflower sto have lived in New England sin landing of the Pilgrim fathers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

ne Contributors to Current Musi role of Carmen, Saturday night; Artur Schnabe Beniamino Gigli, who sings tonight in Carnegie H

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

ELIMINARY GLIMPSE

ation or phony;

The Boston Symphony, w Brahms festival in Boston ago, will give all-Brahms progr its last two Carnegie Hall concerts of the season under Serge Koussevitsky's direction next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Arthur Schnabel, a soloist in the Boston festival, will play the second piano concerto in B flat on Thursday, and the first, in D minor, on Saturday. On Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music he will play Beethoven's G major concerto in a Beethoven-Brahms program, replacing the originality announced all-Beethoven list.

Mr. Schnabel, who has not been heard here for some years, was born in Lipnik, Czeckoslovakia, in 1882, began his piano study at the age of six with Hans Schmitt in Vienna, and was accepted as a pupil by Leschetizky three years later, in a class of which Ossip Gabrilowitsch was also a member. He first played in America in December, 1921.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

78

THIS CLIPPING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
Mar 6

BEETHOVEN CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Artur Schnabel Plays Fourth Concerto for Piano

Post Apr 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The one-composer programme suggests an occasion, and Dr. Koussevitzky loves occasions. With the musical air still vibrating with the last echoes of the recent Brahms Festival, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a Beethoven programme with Artur Schnabel, co-star of the Festival, for piano soloist.

PLAYS FOURTH CONCERTO

For his piece Mr. Schnabel chose the Fourth Concerto with which, by the way, he had made his debut here seven years ago. Since this Concerto is a slender piece, Dr. Koussevitzky wisely prefaced it with one of the lesser symphonies, to wit, the "Pastoral," and supplied the otherwise missing heroics with the Overture to Leonora, No. 3, which served as concluding number.

It is, indeed, with the lesser Beethoven symphonies, the even-numbered ones, that Dr. Koussevitzky has been most triumphantly successful. Or, to put it differently, when he has conducted them there has been no dissenting voice. In them no captious critic has accused him of straining after effect, of forcing the issue. In the "Pastoral" yesterday, as in the Fourth Symphony a few weeks ago, there was first of all a release of the true Beethoven spirit. The music in an indefinable way sounded Beethovenish.

Close to Perfection

And this performance of yesterday was remarkable also for its euphony, its balance of tone, for the ingratiating manner in which all the melodies were sung. From first bar to last the music flowed. There was unceasing plasticity. One enthusiast would have it, indeed, that Dr. Koussevitzky had never before achieved a performance that come so close to absolute perfection.

If those who heard Mr. Schnabel yesterday were expecting are petition of the excitements, the electrically charged atmosphere, the general air of exaltation, that marked his and the orchestra's recent performances of the two Brahms concertos they were doomed to disappointment. A festival is one thing; a Friday afternoon Symphony Concert another. And the concertos of Beethoven are not the concertos of Brahms. There are those—call them heretics, if you will—who find this G major Concerto at the most possessed of a certain fragile charm and who, while admitting the effectiveness of the slow movement with its romantic dialogue between the pianoforte and the strings, are disposed to regard the piece, as a whole, as unsympathetically written for the solo instrument and as an example of how not to combine the sonorities of piano and orchestra, inherently so difficult to reconcile.

Mr. Schnabel's Playing

Mr. Schnabel played, of course, with his wonted musicianship and technical mastery, his notable command of dynamics, his sensitive phrasing. He was warmly applauded.

The Leonora Overture was played dramatically but with not quite the feeling for tonal balance and proportion that distinguished the performance of the Symphony.

Local Pianist Returns From Brahms' Festival

THE Washington pianist, Frances Gutelius, has just returned from Boston, where she attended the six-day Brahms festival. Miss Gutelius has written the following from her impressions gained at the festival:

"Johannes Brahms, the great classic-romanticist, born in Hamburg in 1833 and died in Vienna in 1897, was honored by a six-day festival of his music by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and assisting soloists the last week of March in Boston.

"As the center of the controversy over his music, first aroused when Schumann hailed him as Beethoven's successor; when Liszt was ready to recognize in him an apostle of the music of the future; when Europe was divided between romanticists and classicists, each eager to welcome him to their camp, Brahms maintained the even tenor of his way, content to work as best he might, and with little regard for the opinion of his cotemporaries.

"One of the outstanding works to be heard (because of the proportions of the performers necessary for its presentation) was 'A German Requiem,' in six movements, sung by Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Fraser Gange, baritone, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliff Choral Society and the full symphony orchestra. It has often been said that Brahms wrote his 'Deutches Requiem' as a tribute to his mother, but there is abundant proof that the requiem was intended 'as a last great funeral rite for Robert Schumann.' Lack of space forbids adequate description of this noble, melancholy and powerful music.

"It was not until the age of 43 that Brahms gave his first symphony to the world. After Beethoven's towering ninth, his first sketches seemed unworthy to this inwardly modest and self-exacting artist. 'I shall never compose a symphony!' he wrote to Levi. 'You have no conception of how the likes of us feel when we hear the tramp of a giant like him behind us.'

"That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms' most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. 'Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer,' wrote Markham Lee in 1916. 'To the ordinary amateur [illegible]

FRANCES GUTELIUS.

once repelled, they now only add a special character and impressiveness. The four symphonies were played in the course of the festival.

"The 'Liebeslieder Waltzes,' for pianoforte duet and four vocal parts, were delightfully given by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Radcliff Choral Society, and small chorus from these organizations. Brahms wrote to the publisher, Simrock: 'The waltzes must appear as they are. * * * I hope it's a composition for house music and will be quickly much sung.'

"Artur Schnabel, who came from Europe for the festival, won tremendous ovations at his several appearances as soloist for the two concertos and a group of piano pieces, and also in the quintet for piano and strings in F minor, with the Burgin Quartet. He was, decidedly, the figure of the hour at each of his appearances.

"Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, at the top of her powers, also was accorded hearty appreciation when she sang a group of four songs and the alto solo in the rhapsody [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
CITIZEN

The Boston Symphony's Fine List

The program selected by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Bushnell Memorial next Wednesday evening has been the subject of discussion, especially in relation to the Brahms symphony and the Ravel "Bolero." But not very much has been said of the Vivaldi Orchestral Concerto, which comes first on the program.

And this week, as re-edited by Alexander Siloti, the Russian composer, will be one of the notable features of the concert, and perhaps may be thought of with peculiar interest in that it was the first number on the first program conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in America—when he began his conductorship of the Boston orchestra in 1924.

✣ ✣ ✣

Vivaldi was one of the most illustrious composers of the golden age of instrumental music in Italy at the end of the 17th century. He also was a famous violinist and long held the position of violinist at St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, his native city. Vivaldi was a priest and known as "il prete rosso," according to some on account of his red hair, and according to others from his custom of wearing a semi-clerical habit of red. Many legends cluster about this picturesque figure of early Italian music. Ernst Gerber wrote in 1890 the following description of Vivaldi in his old age:

"About 1730 he was extraordinarily pious, so that he would not put his rosary aside until he took up the pen to write an opera, which happened frequently. It is also said of him that once, celebrating his daily mass, a musical idea came into his head that delighted him. He left the altar and went into the sacristy to write it down, and then returned to go on with the mass. Taken before officers of the Inquisition, he was declared not wholly sane. The only punishment meted out to him was that he should not be allowed to celebrate the mass. Is this fact or legend?"

✣ ✣ ✣

A few seats for the Boston Symphony concert are still available at McCoy's Music Store, Asylum Street. The orchestra is coming to Hartford under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick who has sponsored the annual concerts here for many years.

Music in Brooklyn

The Second Symphony of Brahms in D Major will be the closing number of the program and the Brooklyn season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. This symphony figured importantly in the Brahms Festival recently given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra in Boston, March 21-26. The Festival which embraced the principal symphonic, choral and chamber music of Brahms, had an immense success and has been described as one of the finest achievements to date of the illustrious Russian conductor.

Artur Schnabel came to America for the special purpose of appearing in the Brahms Festival. He is little known in America except by repute, having made but one brief visit here several seasons ago. In Europe, however, his reputation is of the highest. He has long been particularly known there as an interpreter of Brahms' music. This artist likewise holds an enviable fame for his reading of the music of Beethoven. His performance of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G major at the Brooklyn concert is anticipated as a rare event in our world of music.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

Into his second symphony, composed shortly after the first, Brahms concentrated his rarest expression of that poetic and tender lyricism which runs recurrently through his entire works. Its pastoral, idyllic mood prevails, for the veiled sadness of the adagio is only a cloud passing over the sun's face. Felix Weingartner (unless he has changed his mind since 1905) considers this symphony Brahms' master work. "In none of his other works does Brahms' spring of invention flow so freshly and spontaneously as in this one; never before or afterwards did he handle the orchestra so sonorously."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Brahms's First Symphony.

The original announcement of the Second Symphony of Brahms for the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led me to talk about that symphony in this column last week Thursday; and now that the First Symphony has been substituted—well, I suppose there may be readers who will not object to some lines on that subject; though it should be distinctly understood that I'm not at all sorry to have had you read about the Second Symphony!

✣ ✣ ✣

This First of the four symphonies composed by Johannes Brahms, was the one hailed by von Buelow in the words "At last we have a 'Tenth' Symphony"—giving the new symphonist, of course, credit for beginning where Beethoven left off in his immortal Ninth. That this praise was disputed, defended, argued, and more or less forgotten later, is something well known to readers on musical matters. But it is something to remember that among symphonists Brahms stands, possibly with Schumann alone, in giving out in his first symphony a really important message. Haydn's and Mozart's first symphonies are sometimes rated unimportant; Beethoven's certainly did not carry the full-fired torch of his genius; but Brahms, putting his First Symphony before the world at the comparatively late age of 43, speaks his boldest words.

✣ ✣ ✣

In no sense is this First Symphony "program" music; but in it the composer works out his musical ideas in fine detail, with beautifully melodic passages abounding, with a very free use of effective decrescendo and crescendo—this latter especially to be noted in the latter part of the first movement of the work.

The second movement, with its exquisitely melodious opening measures melting into the intensely passionate second theme, as a whole is as genuinely romantic in sentiment as it is tonally beautiful; and melody shines, likewise, in the clarinet's graceful measures that usher in the third movement (Un poco allegretta e grazioso) and those that follow in the voices of clarinet and flute. The third melody here is announced by the clarinet to be finished by oboe and flute with string accompaniment.

The Finale, dramatic in power, summarizes the whole symphony. In a majestic Adagio, that "seems to be an alternation between hope and fate" as Upton writes his evaluation of the work, there is mystery; in the rapid passages that the horns and [illegible] is great beauty the Allegro that calls the chorus 's Ninth Symes to drive away n, mystery, that

Concert-Chronicle

Hans Apr 7

Adieux of Mr. Schnabel

FOR a sixth and last time in his present visit, a Bostonian audience heard Mr. Schnabel, the pianist, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. This week he goes with the orchestra to New York to play in Carnegie Hall the two concertos of Brahms; in the Academy of Music at Brooklyn the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. A few days later he takes ship for Berlin, with the likelihood of no distant return for a considerable tour. To have brought him hither, with a Brahms Festival for occasion, is large credit to Dr. Koussevitzky and the management of the Symphony Orchestra in a field that they seldom enter. In his earlier visits to America, in 1921 and 1923, Mr. Schnabel came and went as an able but relatively unheeded pianist. More recently he has risen to European note, now at zenith. Symphony Hall was quick to see an opportunity and improve it. It would present an illustrious, but in America strangely overlooked, pianist to its public in Boston and New York. Through a Brahms Festival and other concerts in regular course he should be wholly—and reasonably—its own.

So far the event has justified every anticipation. Mr. Schnabel became the new and impressive figure in the Brahms Festival. From his hands and Dr. Koussevitzky's the composer's two Piano Concertos rose unclouded, undiminished, in very voice and stature. At the chamber-concert, Mr. Schnabel was no less the masterly Brahmsian. Naturally, subscribers to the regular series of concerts in Boston and in Cambridge would have him also. They heard him, last Thursday, Friday and Saturday, in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto and covered him with applause. Not until he had reappeared four times on Saturday evening—once with the conductor—did they give him leave to go. Sometimes Mr. Schnabel fears that he may not advance in his work, which progress is the artist's ambition and reason for being. There was no cause on Saturday for such misgivings in the voluptuous richness of the trills; the cool, limpid, even runs; the sense, through the first movement, of a music called note by note and phrase by phrase into new and vivid life measured upon our ears; the hushed beauty of the slow movement breaking at last—and with what jet of power!—into its one moment of wild outburst; the fire, as of improvisation, driving the rhythms of the finale. On the stage and in the auditorium, there might hardly have been more characteristic and auspicious leave-taking.

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

BEETHOVEN CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Artur Schnabel Plays Fourth Concerto for Piano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The one-composer programme suggests an occasion, and Dr. Koussevitzky loves occasions. With the musical air still vibrating with the last echoes of the recent Brahms Festival, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a Beethoven programme with Artur Schnabel, co-star of the Festival, for piano soloist.

PLAYS FOURTH CONCERTO

For his piece Mr. Schnabel chose the Fourth Concerto with which, by the way, he had made his debut here seven years ago. Since this Concerto is a slender piece, Dr. Koussevitzky wisely prefaced it with one of the lesser symphonies, to wit, the "Pastoral," and supplied the otherwise missing heroics with the Overture to Leonora, No. 3, which served as concluding number.

It is, indeed, with the lesser Beethoven symphonies, the even-numbered ones, that Dr. Koussevitzky has been most triumphantly successful. Or, to put it differently, when he has conducted them there has been no dissenting voice. In them no captious critic has accused him of straining after effect, of forcing the issue. In the "Pastoral" yesterday, as in the Fourth Symphony a few weeks ago, there was first of all a release of the true Beethoven spirit. The music in an indefinable way sounded Beethovenish.

Close to Perfection

And this performance of yesterday was remarkable also for its euphony, its balance of tone, for the ingratiating manner in which all the melodies were sung. From first bar to last the music flowed. There was unceasing plasticity. One enthusiast would have it, indeed, that Dr. Koussevitzky had never before achieved a performance that come so close to absolute perfection.

If those who heard Mr. Schnabel yesterday were expecting are petition of the excitements, the electrically charged atmosphere, the general air of exaltation, that marked his and the orchestra's recent performances of the two Brahms concertos they were doomed to disappointment. A festival is one thing; a Friday afternoon Symphony Concert another. And the concertos of Beethoven are not the concertos of Brahms. There are those—call them heretics, if you will—who find this G major Concerto at the most possessed of a certain fragile charm and who, while admitting the effectiveness of the slow movement with its romantic dialogue between the pianoforte and the strings, are disposed to regard the piece, as a whole, as unsympathetically written for the solo instrument and as an example of how not to combine the sonorities of piano and orchestra, inherently so difficult to reconcile.

Mr. Schnabel's Playing

Mr. Schnabel played, of course, with his wonted musicianship and technical mastery, his notable command of dynamics, his sensitive phrasing. He was warmly applauded.

The Leonora Overture was played dramatically but with not quite the feeling for tonal balance and proportion that distinguished the performance of the Symphony.

Local Pianist Returns From Brahms' Festival

THE Washington pianist, Frances Gutelius, has just returned from Boston, where she attended the six-day Brahms festival. Miss Gutelius has written the following from her impressions gained at the festival:

"Johannes Brahms, the great classic-romanticist, born in Hamburg in 1833 and died in Vienna in 1897, was honored by a six-day festival of his music by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and assisting soloists the last week of March in Boston.

"As the center of the controversy over his music, first aroused when Schumann hailed him as Beethoven's successor; when Liszt was ready to recognize in him an apostle of the music of the future; when Europe was divided between romanticists and classicists, each eager to welcome him to their camp, Brahms maintained the even tenor of his way, content to work as best he might, and with little regard for the opinion of his cotemporaries.

"One of the outstanding works to be heard (because of the proportions of the performers necessary for its presentation) was 'A German Requiem,' in six movements, sung by Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Fraser Gange, baritone, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliff Choral Society and the full symphony orchestra. It has often been said that Brahms wrote his 'Deutches Requiem' as a tribute to his mother, but there is abundant proof that the requiem was intended 'as a last great funeral rite for Robert Schumann.' Lack of space forbids adequate description of this noble, melancholy and powerful music.

"It was not until the age of 43 that Brahms gave his first symphony to the world. After Beethoven's towering ninth, his first sketches seemed unworthy to this inwardly modest and self-exacting artist. 'I shall never compose a symphony!' he wrote to Levi. 'You have no conception of how the likes of us feel when we hear the tramp of a giant like him behind us.'

"That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms' most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. 'Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer,' wrote Markham Lee in 1916. 'To the ordinary amateur, who can enjoy his Beethoven and Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, but it is apt to repel him.' Surely the melodious profusion of Brahms' themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word, the sheer musical wealth—is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today and applauded to the echo. As for the graver moods that once repelled, they now only add a special character and impressiveness. The four symphonies were played in the course of the festival.

FRANCES GUTELIUS.

"The 'Liebeslieder Waltzes,' for pianoforte duet and four vocal parts, were delightfully given by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Radcliff Choral Society, and small chorus from these organizations. Brahms wrote to the publisher, Simrock: 'The waltzes must appear as they are. * * * I hope it's a composition for house music and will be quickly much sung.'

"Artur Schnabel, who came from Europe for the festival, won tremendous ovations at his several appearances as soloist for the two concertos and a group of piano pieces, and also in the quintet for piano and strings in F minor, with the Burgin Quartet. He was, decidedly, the figure of the hour at each of his appearances.

"Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, at the top of her powers, also was accorded hearty appreciation when she sang a group of four songs and the alto solo in the rhapsody from Goethe's 'Harzreise im Winter," for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra.

"These notes, taken, in part, from Philip Hale's program annotations, offer only a meager bit of observation of six days of musical feasting by an ardent pilgrim from Washington. We are promised a Beethoven festival by Dr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra next season."

will be one of the notable features of the concert, and perhaps may be thought of with peculiar interest in that it was the first number on the first program conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in America—when he began his conductorship of the Boston orchestra in 1924.

✣ ✣ ✣

Vivaldi was one of the most illustrious composers of the golden age of instrumental music in Italy at the end of the 17th century. He also was a famous violinist and long held the position of violinist at St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, his native city. Vivaldi was a priest and known as "il prete rosso," according to some on account of his red hair, and according to others from his custom of wearing a semi-clerical habit of red. Many legends cluster about this picturesque figure of early Italian music. Ernst Gerber wrote in 1890 the following description of Vivaldi in his old age:

"About 1730 he was extraordinarily pious, so that he would not put his rosary aside until he took up the pen to write an opera, which happened frequently. It is also said of him that once, celebrating his daily mass, a musical idea came into his head that delighted him. He left the altar and went into the sacristy to write it down, and then returned to go on with the mass. Taken before officers of the Inquisition, he was declared not wholly sane. The only punishment meted out to him was that he should not be allowed to celebrate the mass. Is this fact or legend?"

✣ ✣ ✣

A few seats for the Boston Symphony concert are still available at McCoy's Music Store, Asylum Street. The orchestra is coming to Hartford under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick who has sponsored the annual concerts here for many years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Brahms's First Symphony.

The original announcement of the Second Symphony of Brahms for the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led me to talk about that symphony in this column last week Thursday; and now that the First Symphony has been substituted—well, I suppose there may be readers who will not object to some lines on that subject; though it should be distinctly understood that I'm not at all sorry to have had you read about the Second Symphony!

✣ ✣ ✣

This First of the four symphonies composed by Johannes Brahms, was the one hailed by von Buelow in the words "At last we have a 'Tenth' Symphony"—giving the new symphonist, of course, crdit for beginning where Beethoven left off in his immortal Ninth. That this praise was disputed, defended, argued, and more or less forgotten later, is something well known to readers on musical matters. But it is something to remember that among symphonists Brahms stands, possibly with Schumann alone, in giving out in his first symphony a really important message. Haydn's and Mozart's first symphonies are sometimes rated unimportant; Beethoven's certainly did not carry the full-fired torch of his genius; but Brahms, putting his First Symphony before the world at the comparatively late age of 43, speaks his boldest words.

✣ ✣ ✣

In no sense is this First Symphony "program" music; but in it the composer works out his musical ideas in fine detail, with beautifully melodic passages abounding, with a very free use of effective decrescendo and crescendo—this latter especially to be noted in the latter part of the first movement of the work.

The second movement, with its exquisitely melodious opening measures melting into the intensely passionate second theme, as a whole is as genuinely romantic in sentiment as it is tonally beautiful; and melody shines, likewise, in the clarinet's graceful measures that usher in the third movement (Un poco allegretta e grazioso) and those that follow in the voices of clarinet and flute. The third melody here is announced by the clarinet to be finished by oboe and flute with string accompaniment.

The Finale, dramatic in power, summarizes the whole symphony. In a majestic Adagio, that "seems to be an alternation between hope and fate" as Upton writes his evaluation of the work, there is mystery; in the rapid passages that the horns and trombones sing there is great beauty—all leading up to the Allegro that in some measure recalls the choral melody of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and that serves to drive away all the gloom, passion, mystery, that have obtained.

✣ ✣ ✣

in D Major will be the closing number of the program and the Brooklyn season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. This symphony figured importantly in the Brahms Festival recently given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra in Boston, March 21-26. The Festival which embraced the principal symphonic, choral and chamber music of Brahms, had an immense success and has been described as one of the finest achievements to date of the illustrious Russian conductor.

Artur Schnabel came to America for the special purpose of appearing in the Brahms Festival. He is little known in America except by repute, having made but one brief visit here several seasons ago. In Europe, however, his reputation is of the highest. He has long been particularly known there as an interpreter of Brahms' music. This artist likewise holds an enviable fame for his reading of the music of Beethoven. His performance of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G major at the Brooklyn concert is anticipated as a rare event in our world of music.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

Into his second symphony, composed shortly after the first, Brahms concentrated his rarest expression of that poetic and tender lyricism which runs recurrently through his entire works. Its pastoral, idyllic mood prevails, for the veiled sadness of the adagio is only a cloud passing over the sun's face. Felix Weingartner (unless he has changed his mind since 1905) considers this symphony Brahms' master work. "In none of his other works does Brahms' spring of invention flow so freshly and spontaneously as in this one; never before or afterwards did he handle the orchestra so sonorously."

Concert-Chronicle

Adieux of Mr. Schnabel

FOR a sixth and last time in his present visit, a Bostonian audience heard Mr. Schnabel, the pianist, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. This week he goes with the orchestra to New York to play in Carnegie Hall the two concertos of Brahms; in the Academy of Music at Brooklyn the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. A few days later he takes ship for Berlin, with the likelihood of no distant return for a considerable tour. To have brought him hither, with a Brahms Festival for occasion, is large credit to Dr. Koussevitzky and the management of the Symphony Orchestra in a field that they seldom enter. In his earlier visits to America, in 1921 and 1923, Mr. Schnabel came and went as an able but relatively unheeded pianist. More recently he has risen to European note, now at zenith. Symphony Hall was quick to see an opportunity and improve it. It would present an illustrious, but in America strangely overlooked, pianist to its public in Boston and New York. Through a Brahms Festival and other concerts in regular course he should be wholly—and reasonably—its own.

So far the event has justified every anticipation. Mr. Schnabel became the new and impressive figure in the Brahms Festival. From his hands and Dr. Koussevitzky's the composer's two Piano Concertos rose unclouded, undiminished, in very voice and stature. At the chamber-concert, Mr. Schnabel was no less the masterly Brahmsian. Naturally, subscribers to the regular series of concerts in Boston and in Cambridge would have him also. They heard him, last Thursday, Friday and Saturday, in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto and covered him with applause. Not until he had reappeared four times on Saturday evening—once with the conductor—did they give him leave to go. Sometimes Mr. Schnabel fears that he may not advance in his work, which progress is the artist's ambition and reason for being. There was no cause on Saturday for such misgivings in the voluptuous richness of the trills; the cool, limpid, even runs; the sense, through the first movement, of a music called note by note and phrase by phrase into new and vivid life measured upon our ears; the hushed beauty of the slow movement breaking at last—and with what jet of power!—into its one moment of wild outburst; the fire, as of improvisation, driving the rhythms of the finale. On the stage and in the auditorium, there might hardly have been more characteristic and auspicious leave-taking.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN,
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Six Pullman Cars Will Bring Unit to Hartford.

A special train of six Pullman cars will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, to this city for its concert Wednesday evening at 8:15 at Bushnell Memorial hall. Following the concert, the orchestra of 110 men will board the special train as a unit. The train will carry two baggage cars, for the larger instruments, such as double basses, 'cellos, harps, tympanies, drums, the larger brass instruments and trunks of music, etc.

On the arrival of the train at the Union depot Wednesday afternoon Mr. Koussevitsky and his manager will go directly to the Hotel Heublein while the members of the orchestra will disperse to various other hotels. The men will be at leisure until the hour for the beginning of the concert.

Many of the musicians will stroll about the city and seek out its historic places of interest, as has been their custom in the past. Others, immediately upon arrival, will make their way to the hall and practice a difficult passage or two on their instruments before dinner.

Soon after dinner the men will, as a rule, retire to their dressing rooms at the hall for individual practice and to tune their instruments to the proper pitch before they appear on the stage.

Patrons are especially requested to be seated by 8:15 as no one is seated during the rendition of the first number on the program. Ticket sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Symphony Concert Fund Gets $3427 Toward Endowment

To keep the Boston Symphony concerts coming to this city and to finance several other nationally known orchestra visits a total of $3427 has already been subscribed in answer to the Music association's appeal for a fund of $10,000 to finance its program for the 1930-31 season.

Letters to music lovers in this city were sent out by the Music associa- are received daily at the association's offices, 313 Gas Co. building. Officers of the association reports that there is an increase of $1187 over the sum received from the same subscribers last year, an encouraging sign, it is said, because this year's goal is slightly higher and the sum to be raised must also meet a $750 de- tion a week ago and subscriptions ficit incurred last season.

A subscription of $10,000 from the public will insure appearance of the Boston Symphony in this city next season and make possible two or three other concerts by important music organizations.

Subscriptions not previously announced are:

$500, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell. $125, Herbert W. Rice. $100, Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Walter R. Callender, Mrs. Zechariah Chafee, James C. Collins, R. Clinton Fuller, William Gammell, Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. John W. Knowles, Hugh MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Matteson, Marsden J. Perry, Dorothy Sturges.

$50, Wallace W. Dempster, Mr. and Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, William C. Fry, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Emma M. Schott. $25, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Barbour, Mrs. Richard B. Comstock, Walter J. Comstock, Dr. and Mrs. Frank A. Cummings, Edith W.X Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Ely, Mrs. Florence Cole Lanpher, Mrs. Kate A. Richardson, William A. Viall.

$20, Mrs. Emma DeRussey Baker, Frederick C. Freeman. $10, Mary Green Chapin, E. Lindsey Cummings, Elmer S. Hosmer, Mrs. Alice M. Johnson, Alice Loraine Johnson, Max A. Langy, MacDowell club, Margaret I. Morriss, George F. Phillips, Belle C. Russell, Mrs. M. E. Simmons, Mrs. George B. Waterhouse, Mrs. George H. Webb. $5, Miriam Hosmer, the Rev. Henry M. Saville, Carrie Lee Smith, Mary Carver Smith, Ruth Whippel. $2, Deaconess Frances Semle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

It is rather a matter to be deplored that it is necessary to think of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at the Bushnell Memorial on Wednesday evening, as an unusual event—but with only one concert a year in Hartford at most, Dr. Koussevitzky's players that concert assumes the proportions of the unusual.

It is hoped and expected that a capacity audience will greet the orchestra.

* * *

And there is yet another event of the week, too, that isn't the most common in dramatic history here—the coming of Mrs. Fiske in "The

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY.

Music == Dance == Films

After Brahms An Afternoon Of Beethoven

Festival in Miniature with Mr. Schnabel Again Compelling Figure

To a Brahms Festival in extenso succeeded, yesterday at Symphony Hall, a Beethoven Festival in brief. It consisted of three numbers—a Symphony, a Concerto, an Overture—as though Dr. Koussevitzky had returned to the most orthodox prescriptions of mid-nineteenth-century program-making. The Symphony was "The Pastoral," to which the audience listened placidly, upon which it bestowed more dutiful than eager applause. The Concerto was the Fourth, in G major, for Piano and Orchestra, with Mr. Schnabel playing the solo-part. The house heard him in a silence that first quivered with expectation and excitement; then drew tense with rapturous listening; burst at pause and close into a storm of plaudits. The Overture was the Third "Leonora," which most seemed to hear as complacently as they had the "Pastoral Symphony."

The gentle, musing, Beethoven of that piece; the improvising, romantic Beethoven of the Concerto; the dramatizing, puissant Beethoven of the Overture. For all three an audience that listened as to the regular thing in the regular way, to be stirred only when a keen musical mind and a fine-strung musical imagination pervaded the performance of the Concerto. Time was when many were agog to discover what way Dr. Koussevitzky would take with this or that Symphony of Beethoven. Now most know that he will lead this "Pastoral" with light and flowing hand; take it simply and sympathetically; illuminate it with a tranquil clarity; pace it animatedly; shade it with pastel-colors from a virtuoso-orchestra. Likewise, most are aware that he will dramatize to his utmost the Third "Leonora" Overture, loosing upon it and measuring with it the plasticity, poignancy and power of his responsive instrument.

All of which circumstance is no reproach to the conductor's prowess and devotion. He played the Symphony and the Overture, yesterday, as at all times he plays every other piece—as though for the while there is nothing else in the world, as though he would penetrate the audience with his own mood. The obstacle is Beethoven, the accustomed and too familiar classic. Only the youngest and the newest in that habituated audience of Friday afternoons, "sitting in" year after year at twenty-four symphonic matinées, may hear him with fresh and opening ears. To many an elder, if we really search ourselves, he is "just Beethoven." Being lazy-minded, we let him go at that—until some newfound personality, like Mr. Schnabel, comes along to set us every one alert.

There is no moral—unless it is that Beethoven should be played seldom in these days, and always with the renewed vitality with which Dr. Koussevitzky impregnates the more stirring symphonies. Or unless it is pardon for those restless spirits whose thoughts would wander from pastoral peasants and pieties to those bedevilled and berated Variations of Schönberg, which the conductor announced but is not likely to attempt this season. Or in the third place, unless it is to extenuate those surly souls who—with Dvorák behind them, "The Pastoral" before them, and Saint-Saëns ahead of them—have heard enough "nice" symphonies for one year and crave leave-taking in music of sharper tang.

For, as it seemed once more yesterday, the "Pastoral Symphony" parts in the middle, leaving the last three divisions minor and outmoded Beethoven. If a less illustrious name were signed to it, many might find little more than a jocund ballet-scene in the scherzo of the dancing peasants and the rustic band; than a realistic thundershower within the orchestral limitations of Beethoven's day; than final and tedious pieties that the graces of neither flute nor clarinet may much lighten. Indeed, there are cynics who remember that Rossini was a Viennese vogue in Beethoven's day; that the great Ludwig frequented his operas; then hint that these final moralizings are prettily Rossinian—without, of course, the composer's tongue in cheek.

The first two movements are another thing. The brookside song is a lengthening chain of limpid and fragrant music which Dr. Koussevitzky neither slackened nor hurried nor dulled, letting it charm with those ingenuous imitations of woodland sounds as naive and fresh to this day as though good Papa Haydn were setting them into his oratorio of "Creation." Far as is the eighteenth-century notion of nature from ours, a simple-hearted, upswelling joy in the delights of wood and field, sun, sky and air fills the first movement. It possessed Beethoven and he writes a music as artless, with its smiling phrases, as it is happy, lovely and enduring. But, be it noted, we are always justifying this "Pastoral Symphony" in the terms of a Beethoven who lived according to a particular habit in a particular time; whereas who thinks of his better part as anything but universal and timeless?

The one place and time in which to hear the Third "Leonora" Overture is the opera house, in a performance of "Fidelio," at the pause before the final scene. Then and there the course of the drama is fresh in every mind; in visible and audible presence the personages have come and gone. We have known them, however, in such semblance and speech as tangible and also imperfect men and women of the singing theater may give them. We have also shared in an action more or less confined within the conventions and exigencies of the stage.

Forthwith the orchestra passes to the Third "Leonora" Overture. The drama is enacted in sound; the stage is limitless; the passions, the situations, the stress and the suspense,emerge at the heights and depths, in the epic voice, that Beethoven could gain in symphonic music, but that in theater-music struggles constrained. Then this Overture seems music-drama concentrated, clarified, intensified as nowhere else. The concert-hall is not its seat; the summarizing program-book but poor substitute for an action heard and seen. Therefore the conductors outdo themselves to dramatize, and the "Third Leonora" becomes a music of pointed paragraphs, sharpened contrasts, well-wrought transition and climax. Dr. Koussevitzky succeeds as well as do most. But away from the opera house and "Fidelio," the epic splendor lessens; the drama, passioned into music, inevitably wanes.

The Fourth Piano-Concerto escapes nearly every handicap upon Symphony or Overture. Like all Beethoven's Concertos, it is a virtuoso-music, designed in degree to display the performer, submitting readily to Mr. Schnabel's inserted cadenza. Therefore to this day pianists seek it out and profit by it. Like its fellow, the Fifth Concerto in B-flat, it is also a quasi-symphonic music, according to Beethoven's contentious habit. In the slow movement of the Fourth, piano and orchestra are at persistent odds. In the first movement, they are prone to snatch subject and development one from the other. Only in the finale do they march hand in hand—not too contentedly.

The Fourth Concerto is also romantic music. In the first movement, the piano-part is often expressive, as we should say nowadays, even rhapsodic as with sudden upspringing energy. The slow movement contains the celebrated contrast of the pleading, single-voiced piano against the united, relentless strings. A gentle gravity of mood haunts even the light-paced finale. Atmosphere is not exactly characteristic of piano-concertos ancient or modern. Yet a distinctive improvising air, now musing, now animated, pervades and preserves this Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. For atmosphere Schumann's is its only compeer.

Of Mr. Schnabel's playing of the piano-part it is hard to write temperately, yet convey all that he wrought upon his hearers. In the slow movement, he attained the very poetry and beauty of musical sound. The piano interceded for itself against the implacable orchestra, but without hint of mawkish sentiment. It was tender; it was dreamful; it whispered and sighed and saddened and submitted. Yet every note had its just musical value; every phrase stood shapen and poised; every period came rounded. Here was music imparted in its full and living self, thereby gaining poesy.

In the finale, light hand, alert rhythm, quick transition, bright and fluid tone. Yet always the unfolding of the whole design in musical integrity. The first movement is a web of interwoven motives, as though the musing Beethoven might hardly sort out his quick-coming fancies; between piano and orchestra distribute them. Mr. Schnabel was as clear as the day with the patterns; kept the improvising vein; shaded from sonority into sonority, from euphony into euphony; while under the surface-smoothness went the measured propulsive energy. Therein is the secret of all that he has done during his stay in Boston. He takes thought, and it warms into emotion. He makes music so vitally and completely that out of it, granted the composer, spring pathos and poetry, gravity or gayety, beauty, power, and strangeness, and illusion.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

It is rather a matter to be deplored that it is necessary to think of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at the Bushnell Memorial on Wednesday evening, as an unusual event—but with only one concert a year in Hartford at most, Dr. Koussevitzky's players that concert assumes the proportions of the unusual.

It is hoped and expected that a capacity audience will greet the orchestra.

* * *

And there is yet another event of the week, too, that isn't the most common in dramatic history here—the coming of Mrs. Fiske in "The Rivals." She is scheduled to make her assault

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

79

$3427 SUBSCRIBED TO SYMPHONY FUND

Music Association Seeks $10,000 to Finance Program for 1930-31 Season.

To keep the Boston Symphony concerts coming to this city and to finance several other nationally known orchestra visits, a total of $3427 already has been subscribed in answer to the Music Association's appeal for a fund of $10,000 to finance its program for the 1930-1931 season.

Letters to music patrons in this city were sent out by the Music Association a week ago and subscriptions are being received daily at the offices of the association, 313 Gas Company building. Officers of the association reported yesterday that there is an increase of $1187 over the amount received from the same subscribers last year, an encouraging sign, it is said, because this year's goal is slightly higher and the amount to be raised must also meet a $750 deficit incurred last season.

A subscription of $10,000 from the public will insure the appearance of the Boston Symphony in this city next season and also make possible two or three other concerts by important music organizations.

Subscriptions not previously announced are as follows: $500—Mrs Robert Ives Gammell; $125—Herbert W. Rice; $100—Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Walter R. Callender, Mrs. Zechariah Chafee, James C. Collins, R. Clinton Fuller, William Gammell, Mrs. Peter Gerry, Mrs. John W. Knowles, Hugh MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Matteson, Marsden J. Perry, Dorothy Sturges.

$50—Wallace W. Dempster, Mr. and Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, William C. Fry, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Emma M. Schott; $25—Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Barbour, Mrs. Richard B. Comstock, Walter J. Comstock, Dr. and Mrs. Frank A. Cummings, Edith W. Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. William Ely, Mrs. Florence Cole Lanpher, Mrs. Kate A. Richardson, William A. Viall.

$20—Mrs. Emma DeRussey Baker, Frederick C. Freeman; $10—Mary Green Chapin, E. Lindsey Cummings, Elmer S. Hosmer, Mrs. Alice M. Johnson, Alice Loraine Johnson, Max A. Langy, MacDowell Club, Margaret I. Morriss, George F. Phillips, Belle C. Russell, Mrs. M. E. Simmons, Mrs. George B. Waterhouse, Mrs. George H. Webb; $5—Miriam Hosmer, Rev. Henry M. Saville, Carrie Lee Smith, Mary Carver Smith, Ruth Whipple; $2—Deaconess Frances Semle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

* * *

Stars in the Orchestra.

Not long ago on the occasion of my trip to New Haven with Frank Sedgwick to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, we naturally talked about the orchestra and its personnel, as well as its conductor. And I asked Mr. Sedgwick how many of the string players in the orchestra could step to the front as soloists if occasion required; and he said "Oh, a dozen or so, anyway." However some information about the individual players that reached me a little later raises that number by doubling it! Which shows, in some measure at least, a reason for the quality of the string tone of the orchestra.

Mr. Burgin the concert-master, has been heard as soloist and also has acted as conductor of the orchestra here on one or two occasions. He had very fine notices this season for his solo work with the orchestra. Mr. Theodorowidz, senior among the violinists, played here many times with the Kneisel Quartet and also has been heard as soloist and Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist, is well known in his art in Hartford.

The leader of the violas is Jean Lefranc; George Laurent is famous as flautist; Fernand Gillet plays first oboe. Georges Hamelin first clarinet. Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer is responsible for the elegant tones of the English Horn.

Georg Boettcher came last season to be leader of the French Horns in the orchestra; George Mager is first trumpet and Johannes Rochut is first trombone while Bernard Zighera plays first harp.

These names are listed in the programs issued for the orchestra's concerts but they may be of interest here in advance of this evening's program. Of course not all the fine playing that is heard in answering phrases from choir to choir in the orchestra comes from the "first" players—but in compositions where there are solo passages the players named above will be heard.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 10 1930

Orchestra Is Greeted With Enthusiasm

Boston Symphony At Concert in Bushnell Hall Plays Magnificently Under Koussevitzky

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA —Directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; in concert under management of Frank A. Sedgwick; at Bushnell Memorial Hall last evening.

Program.

Vivaldi, Concerto in D minor for Orchestra
Maestoso-Largo-Allegro
Moussorgsky, Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel, Bolero
Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

A brilliant audience, testing the capacity of the Bushnell Memorial, gave Dr. Koussevitzky a hearty welcome as he made his appearance on the stage last evening, and applauded each and every numoer on the program in most enthusiastic and sincere fashion. And the comments heard as the crowd dispersed were mainly expressive of regret that the concert might not have been longer—although certainly a full program had been played.

The orchestra was in very fine form—and having said that of the Boston Symphony not much more need be said of the quality of the playing; and Dr. Koussevitzky led with most intense enthusiasm and gave brilliant and satisfying readings of all the scores. Aside from the symphony the numbers played were unfamiliar to most of the music-lovers present—and the symphony itself has been too seldom heard; the occasion presented an orchestra not enjoyed here in concert for more than a year; Dr. Koussevitzky making his first appearance in Hartford in two years; and the delights of the great organization's playing in the new hall—surely a fine combination of circumstances.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Vivaldi work begins with a tremendous boldness of unison violin tone, opening out into delightful harmonies and the tonal values of the orchestra's string sections were at once made apparent. The Largo in lovely sustained melody, sang to a beautifully made and played ending and the final Allegro was delightful in color effects of tone.

Mossorgsky, painting in his Prelude the 'coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow,' finds exquisite tone for his effects as well as melody very Russian, very lovely indeed. In the measure that this work may come under the head of "program music" it shows the composer's skill in the use of suggestion in tone, and in the finer, higher fields of music for music's sake it is a delight to the imaginative, with playing such as we heard last evening and a reading that brought out every grace of each measure.

✣ ✣ ✣

The audience took the Ravel work to its heart with great enthusiasm; and the really magnificent piling up of tone on one brief melody repeated and re-repeated for fourteen minutes of playing time, found its customary response in the thunder of applause that began almost before that remarkably surprising change of key and crashing tone brought the wild dance to an end. It is quite likely that several hearings of this work may dull the edge of the hearer's joy in it. The present reviewer has heard it three times and it seems as remarkable as ever in the way Dr. Koussevitzky and his men play it; but its first effect on its own account has faded not a little.

Last evening's playing was done with all the fire and sprit that could have been asked of a first performance, and certainly the audience took its thrill in the playing—which is practically evenly divided, in point of elapsed time, from the whisper of the first measures to a moderate forte; from that to a big one; and finally, through the complication of masses of tone, to the wildly tremendous crashing of the final measures.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 is a gorgeously beautiful and effective work as the orchestra unfolds it before us. Its stormy opening passages give way to a beautifully melodic calm. There is exquisite tone called for, and given by, each of the choirs of the orchestra; the reading that Dr. Koussevitzky offers is poignantly beautiful, with splendid effects alike of power and repression.

The second movement shines in heart-searching melodies, eloquently rendered, and the quality of conductor and players was fully apparent in the delightful ease of the tricky tempo of the beginning of the Scherzo. And finally the noble tones of barss and woodwind and strings in the Adagio as the chorale returns in its beauty, and the almost overwhelming force and splendor of the full orchestra in the Allegro bring a truly remarkable performance of a great symphony to an end.

The audience made no move to go until Dr. Koussevitzky had been brought back to the stage several times to bow his appreciation of its enthusiasm, and to call on his players to rise and share it with him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN,
TIMES
APR

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FINE RECITAL

Famous Orchestra, Koussevitzky Leading, Wins New Laurels.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, always a favorite with the Hartford music-loving public, gave its annual concert last evening in the large auditorium at the Bushnell Memorial. The event was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The famous Serge Koussevitzky conducted and the audience was the largest to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. The program follows:

Vivaldi .....
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra (edited by A. Siloti)
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Moussorgsky .....
..... Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel ..... Bolero
Brahms .....
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

Dr. Koussevitzky presented his usual well-trained and capable orchestra. Ranking with the great orchestras of the world, the Boston orchestra has always been a decided favorite with Hartford audiences. The players last evening seemed inspired. Dr. Koussevitzky, himself a super-musician and a showman of remarkable calibre, was an ideal leader. His talents as a dramatist were in evidence and as a director his work was ideal.

In the lovely Vivaldi number Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to devote even more than his usual care to the presentation of this gem of orchestral writing. The strings sang with lovely cantilenes and there was a splendid blending of tone. The orchestra gave one of its most effective performances in the exquisite "Largo". The concluding "Allegro" was also splendidly given and the entire "Concerto" proved an ideal introduction.

Unique in its writing, yet showing a variety of tone which had an instant appeal was the Moussorgsky number. Dr. Koussevitzky gave examples of tone painting which were of indescribable beauty. The wood winds had ample opportunity for display and the reeds, delicate in their voicing, carried a melody, typically Russian, yet with a comprehensive appeal to all.

Undoubtedly the outstanding popular offering was the Ravel "Bolero," the most generally discussed and most popular novelty composition played by any American orchestra during the present season. "Bolero" has taken New York and Boston by storm, and its first presentation in Hartford found receptive hearers. Strange and at times weird in its character, the original melody, simple yet effective in its context, is taken on by the various choirs, and carried to a triumphant climax. The audience was quick to show its appreciation and Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled many times until he graciously called on his orchestra to rise and share in the applause.

The Brahms "Symphony" was given a triumphant and wonderfully effective appeal. Here again Dr. Koussevitzky gave a truly sublime presentation. The orchestra recently gave a Brahms festival at Boston and this symphony was one of the most popular features of the various programs. The "Andante" was given with a delicacy and a depth of [illegible] which was notable. The noble

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 10 1930

While thus venting some of my ill nature this morning may I confess to a minor nuance of irritation over the repetition of "Dr. Koussevitzy" in the public prints of Boston. I somehow wish they wouldn't. I understand that some university has made a doctor of laws or something of the able and emotional conductor of the Boston Symphony. That is all right, if he can stand it. I don't particularly hold its against an honest musician or other self-respecting artist that when he was bidden walk up for an honorary degree he responded. It might have been ungracious not to accept the academic distinction, even though one knows what awful tripe of a linguistic sort goes usually with the conferring of such degrees. After the ordeal, however, the victim does not ordinarily continue to wear his cap and gown in the streets. I for one could wish he would not continue to sport his "Dr.," or encourage others to sport it for him. I must confess to a feeling that "Mr. Koussevitzy" is a shade more dignified than "Dr. Koussevitzky." The latter title has been cheapened, anyway, by advertisements of Old Dr. So-and-So and by the jocular "Doc."

***

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR

BRAHMS PROGRAM SUPERBLY DONE BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is being dedicated these days to communion with the music of Brahms.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his men have just finished a Brahms Festival in Boston for which Artur Schnabel was specially imported from Berlin to play two piano concertos of the master.

Last evening the orchestra, Koussevitzky, and Schnabel, journeyed here with some of the choice selections from the recent Brahms Festival and served them at a concert of their regular series in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised the "Academic Festival Overture," the B flat piano concerto, and the fourth symphony in E minor.

No doubt specialized and intensive rehearsing had been undergone for the celebration in Boston, and the result showed in as superb a brand of orchestral performance as New York has heard in many moons.

Precision in attack, fastidious balance of choirs, polished technique and taste in dynamics, and rich beauty of tone, distinguished all the orchestral playing last evening. Koussevitsky commands an orchestra that takes second place to none.

The Russian conductor was irreproachable at this concert in the fine spirit of his interpretations and the seeming self-effacement with which he projected them. He read the overture with moodal variety and effective display of its sumptuous orchestration. The familiar strains of "American" college songs must have smitten strangely upon ears that did know those melodies were made in Germany.

In the symphony, Koussevitzky sounded devotedly its earnestness, beauty and depth of feeling.

Artur Schnabel returns here after an absence of about eight years, during which he has become one of the pianistic favorites of Europe, particularly in Germany and England.

He played the Brahms concerto, in large styles, with epically drawn design. It was a musicianly and authoritative presentation. There were some highly impressive moments of dignity and might. The lyrical line of the work receded somewhat in the handling of Schnabel, who occasionally forgot beauty in the insistence upon dramatic intention.

The Schnabel tone is clear and precise rather than sensuously lovely. It was on the whole an intellectual and musically superior version of a gigantic and great composition.

In spite of the three-quarters of an hour of listening, the audience applauded Schnabel with quite uncommon enthusiasm and he had to bow his thanks repeatedly.

Koussevitzky furnished a truly devoted and close-knit orchestral background for the symphonic concerto. He might, however, have seen to it that the piano and the orchestra were in better tune. Sensitive ears were offended at the discordant differences of pitch.

Three great orchestras were heard here in as many successive days—the Philadelphia on Tuesday, the Philharmonic on Wednesday, and the Boston on Thursday. Comparisons are tempting, but dangerous.

The dying season goes out in a blaze of Brahms, for next Saturday afternoon the Carnegie Hall audience will hear the brave Boston Symphonists play that composer's first symphony, C minor; the "Academic Overture" again, and the D minor piano concerto, with Schnabel repeating as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky Orders More Firmament, and the Heavens Sing of Brahms

Fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall; piano soloist, Artur Schnabel.

ALL-BRAHMS PROGRAM

1. "Academic Festival" overture, Op. 80
2. Piano Concerto No. 2, in B flat major, Op. 83
Artur Schnabel, pianist
3. Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98

IT may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable "Green Pastures" that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that Paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. "Dey ain't," reports the custard-maker, "a drap in de jug." Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by passing a miracle. "Let it be some firmament!" he commands. "An' when I say let it be some firmament I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!"

Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, "Let it be some Brahms!" Apparently he added the warning, "Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms!"

And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

* * *

APPARENTLY Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical custard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses and such lustrous soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel, the imported pianist who has made intellectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

* * *

IN New York we are not being quite so lavishly provided by Mr. Koussevitzky with Brahmsian firmament. Yet the Lawd of the Bostonian heaven is doing very well by us. Last night in Carnegie Hall he set before his people if not a whole mess of Brahms, certainly much more than a little bitty dab. He gave us one of the greatest of the symphonies, an overture, and the most persuasive, if not the weightiest of the piano concertos, with Mr. Schnabel as the pianistic Gabriel, sounding his clarion through Johannes's keyboard evocation of a vernal earth.

That every one was happy there can be little doubt. Brahms is proper Festival material, with or without an anniversary pretext. He has the fullness and variety of content, the volume, the power, the greatness of style, the imaginative reach and depth, to justify and reward an unqualified disclosure of his works. A first-rate genius, a Maker (as the mystically daring Emerson might have called him), he is fecund and inexhaustible. Like Whitman, Brahms could have said, "I am large, I contain multitudes."

Last night we had him in two of his major phases: the Brahms who in the B-flat Concerto is chiefly the poet of Southern amplitudes and fervors, radiant, expansive, sensitive and magical, and the austerer Brahms of the E minor Symphony, the Northern Brahms, bardic, magistral, and prevailingly dark hued.

It was the first of these manifestations that counted most in the sum of the evening's pleasure—not because the B-flat Concerto is a greater work than the E minor Symphony (though the point is debatable), but because we have less frequent opportunities to hear it, and because it involved last night the participation of Mr. Schnabel.

* * *

MR. SCHNABEL illustrates what Arnold called the application of ideas to life—which, by extension and inclusion, means the application of ideas to poetry. He has pre-eminently that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or overawed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant.

Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty, under the conditions fixed by the laws of its own nature and its own imperial domain. Naturally, like any Court, legal or aesthetic, the artist interprets these laws as he sees fit. But always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

* * *

THE Concerto that Mr. Schnabel played last night gave him occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. We know that Brahms conceived this music with the ichor of an Italian Spring in his blood—that in it he mirrored the spectacle that so enchanted him in his visits to Italy a half century ago: the spectacle of a Mediterranean Spring shedding its immemorial loveliness over the valleys and hill-slopes of the haunted South.

This abidingly wonderful music Mr. Schnabel helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach."

After this, the Fourth Symphony, for all its blend of Gothic magnificence and bardic speech, was an experience necessarily less revealing. The evening was Mr. Schnabel's, and the Brahms that he conveyed to us. For this our thanks, however, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who ordained this beneficent enrichment of our Brahmsian skies. If there were any who murmured, like the Paradisaical witnesses in "The Green Pastures," "Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament," their voices were not audible.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Very Likely

Sir—On the editorial page of your distinguished contemporary appears this statement: "If the people had by vote expressed a preference in the matter of the orchestras, we feel that a majority would have desired precisely the three that had been engaged: The Philadelphia, the Boston, and the Cleveland Symphonies."

I am not so sure of that. If the people had by vote expressed a preference, it would probably have been for the orchestras of Rudy Vallee, Vincent Lopez and Paul Whiteman.

S. K. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 10 1932

Orchestra Is Greeted With Enthusiasm

Boston Symphony At Concert in Bushnell Hall Plays Magnificently Under Koussevitzky

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA —Directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; in concert under management of Frank A. Sedgwick; at Bushnell Memorial Hall last evening.

Program.

Vivaldi, Concerto in D minor for Orchestra
Maestoso-Largo-Allegro
Moussorgsky, Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel, Bolero
Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

A brilliant audience, testing the capacity of the Bushnell Memorial, gave Dr. Koussevitzky a hearty welcome as he made his appearance on the stage last evening, and applauded each and every number on the program in most enthusiastic and sincere fashion. And the comments heard as the crowd dispersed were mainly expressive of regret that the concert might not have been longer—although certainly a full program had been played.

The orchestra was in very fine form—and having said that of the Boston Symphony not much more need be said of the quality of the playing; and Dr. Koussevitzky led with most intense enthusiasm and gave brilliant and satisfying readings of all the scores. Aside from the symphony the numbers played were unfamiliar to most of the music-lovers present—and the symphony itself has been too seldom heard; the occasion presented an orchestra not enjoyed here in concert for more than a year; Dr. Koussevitzky making his first appearance in Hartford in two years; and the delights of the great organization's playing in the new hall—surely a fine combination of circumstances.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Vivaldi work begins with a tremendous boldness of unison violin tone, opening out into delightful harmonies and the tonal values of the orchestra's string sections were at once made apparent. The Largo in lovely sustained melody, sang to a beautifully made and played ending and the final Allegro was delightful in color effects of tone.

Mossorgsky, painting in his Prelude the 'coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow,' finds exquisite tone for his effects as well as melody very Russian, very lovely indeed. In the measure that this work may come under the head of "program music" it shows the composer's skill in the use of suggestion in tone, and in the finer, higher fields of music for music's sake it is a delight to the imaginative, with playing such as we heard last evening and a reading that brought out every grace of each measure.

✣ ✣ ✣

The audience took the Ravel work to its heart with great enthusiasm; and the really magnificent piling up of tone on one brief melody repeated and re-repeated for fourteen minutes of playing time, found its customary response in the thunder of applause that began almost before that remarkably surprising change of key and crashing tone brought the wild dance to an end. It is quite likely that several hearings of this work may dull the edge of the hearer's joy in it. The present reviewer has heard it three times and it seems as remarkable as ever in the way Dr. Koussevitzky and his men play it; but its first effect on its own account has faded not a little.

Last evening's playing was done with all the fire and spirit that could have been asked of a first performance, and certainly the audience took its thrill in the playing—which if practically evenly divided, in point of elapsed time, from the whisper of the first measures to a moderate forte; from that to a big one; and finally, through the complication of masses of tone, to the wildly tremendous crashing of the final measures.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 is a gorgeously beautiful and effective work as the orchestra unfolds it before us. Its stormy opening passages give way to a beautifully melodic calm. There is exquisite tone called for, and given by, each of the choirs of the orchestra; the reading that Dr. Koussevitzky offers is poignantly beautiful, with splendid effects alike of power and repression.

The second movement shines in heart-searching melodies, eloquently rendered, and the quality of conductor and players was fully apparent in the delightful ease of the tricky tempo of the beginning of the Scherzo. And finally the noble tones of barss and woodwind and strings in the Adagio as the chorale returns in its beauty, and the almost overwhelming force and splendor of the full orchestra in the Allegro bring a truly remarkable performance of a great symphony to an end.

The audience made no move to go until Dr. Koussevitzky had been brought back to the stage several times to bow his appreciation of its enthusiasm, and to call on his players to rise and share it with him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN,
TIMES
APR

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FINE RECITAL

Famous Orchestra, Koussevitzky Leading, Wins New Laurels.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, always a favorite with the Hartford music-loving public, gave its annual concert last evening in the large auditorium at the Bushnell Memorial. The event was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The famous Serge Koussevitzky conducted and the audience was the largest to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. The program follows:

Vivaldi .....
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra (edited by A. Siloti)
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Moussorgsky .....
..... Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Ravel ..... Bolero
Brahms .....
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

Dr. Koussevitzky presented his usual well-trained and capable orchestra. Ranking with the great orchestras of the world, the Boston orchestra has always been a decided favorite with Hartford audiences. The players last evening seemed inspired. Dr. Koussevitzky, himself a super-musician and a showman of remarkable calibre, was an ideal leader. His talents as a dramatist were in evidence and as a director his work was ideal.

In the lovely Vivaldi number Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to devote even more than his usual care to the presentation of this gem of orchestral writing. The strings sang with lovely cantilenes and there was a splendid blending of tone. The orchestra gave one of its most effective performances in the exquisite "Largo". The concluding "Allegro" was also splendidly given and the entire "Concerto" proved an ideal introduction.

Unique in its writing, yet showing a variety of tone which had an instant appeal was the Moussorgsky number. Dr. Koussevitzky gave examples of tone painting which were of indescribable beauty. The wood winds had ample opportunity for display and the reeds, delicate in their voicing, carried a melody, typically Russian, yet with a comprehensive appeal to all.

Undoubtedly the outstanding popular offering was the Ravel "Bolero," the most generally discussed and most popular novelty composition played by any American orchestra during the present season. "Bolero" has taken New York and Boston by storm, and its first presentation in Hartford found receptive hearers. Strange and at times weird in its character, the original melody, simple yet effective in its context, is taken on by the various choirs, and carried to a triumphant climax. The audience was quick to show its appreciation and Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled many times until he graciously called on his orchestra to rise and share in the applause.

The Brahms "Symphony" was given a triumphant and wonderfully effective appeal. Here again Dr. Koussevitzky gave a truly sublime presentation. The orchestra recently gave a Brahms festival at Boston and this symphony was one of the most popular features of the various programs. The "Andante" was given with a delicacy and a depth of feeling which was notable. The noble "Chorale" of the final movement was remarkable for its effectiveness and its dramatic fervor. The climax was taken with a tremendous outburst of sound. At the conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled several times.

the ...
in the public ...
somehow wish they w...
derstand that some universi... made a doctor of laws or something of the able and emotional conductor of the Boston Symphony. That is all right, if he can stand it. I don't particularly hold its against an honest musician or other self-respecting artist that when he was bidden walk up for an honorary degree he responded. It might have been ungracious not to accept the academic distinction, even though one knows what awful tripe of a linguistic sort goes usually with the conferring of such degrees. After the ordeal, however, the victim does not ordinarily continue to wear his cap and gown in the streets. I for one could wish he would not continue to sport his "Dr.," or encourage others to sport it for him. I must confess to a feeling that "Mr. Koussevitzy" is a shade more dignified than "Dr. Koussevitzky." The latter title has been cheapened, anyway, by advertisements of Old Dr. So-and-So and by the jocular "Doc."

***

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR

BRAHMS PROGRAM SUPERBLY DONE BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is being dedicated these days to communion with the music of Brahms.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his men have just finished a Brahms Festival in Boston for which Artur Schnabel was specially imported from Berlin to play two piano concertos of the master.

Last evening the orchestra, Koussevitzky, and Schnabel, journeyed here with some of the choice selections from the recent Brahms Festival and served them at a concert of their regular series in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised the "Academic Festival Overture," the B flat piano concerto, and the fourth symphony in E minor.

No doubt specialized and intensive rehearsing had been undergone for the celebration in Boston, and the result showed in as superb a brand of orchestral performance as New York has heard in many moons.

Precision in attack, fastidious balance of choirs, polished technique and taste in dynamics, and rich beauty of tone, distinguished all the orchestral playing last evening. Koussevitsky commands an orchestra that takes second place to none.

The Russian conductor was irreproachable at this concert in the fine spirit of his interpretations and the seeming self-effacement with which he projected them. He read the overture with moodal variety and effective display of its sumptuous orchestration. The familiar strains of "American" college songs must have smitten strangely upon ears that did know those melodies were made in Germany.

In the symphony, Koussevitzky sounded devotedly its earnestness, beauty and depth of feeling.

Artur Schnabel returns here after an absence of about eight years, during which he has become one of the pianistic favorites of Europe, particularly in Germany and England.

He played the Brahms concerto, in large styles, with epically drawn design. It was a musicianly and authoritative presentation. There were some highly impressive moments of dignity and might. The lyrical line of the work receded somewhat in the handling of Schnabel, who occasionally forgot beauty in the insistence upon dramatic intention.

The Schnabel tone is clear and precise rather than sensuously lovely. It was on the whole an intellectual and musically superior version of a gigantic and great composition.

In spite of the three-quarters of an hour of listening, the audience applauded Schnabel with quite uncommon enthusiasm and he had to bow his thanks repeatedly.

Koussevitzky furnished a truly devoted and close-knit orchestral background for the symphonic concerto. He might, however, have seen to it that the piano and the orchestra were in better tune. Sensitive ears were offended at the discordant differences of pitch.

Three great orchestras were heard here in as many successive days—the Philadelphia on Tuesday, the Philharmonic on Wednesday, and the Boston on Thursday. Comparisons are tempting, but dangerous.

The dying season goes out in a blaze of Brahms, for next Saturday afternoon the Carnegie Hall audience will hear the brave Boston Symphonists play that composer's first symphony, C minor; the "Academic Overture" again, and the D minor piano concerto, with Schnabel repeating as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky Orders More Firmament, and the Heavens Sing of Brahms

Fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall; piano soloist, Artur Schnabel.

ALL-BRAHMS PROGRAM

1. "Academic Festival" overture, Op. 80
2. Piano Concerto No. 2, in B flat major, Op. 83
Artur Schnabel, pianist
3. Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98

IT may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable "Green Pastures" that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that Paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. "Dey ain't," reports the custard-maker, "a drap in de jug." Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by passing a miracle. "Let it be some firmament!" he commands. "An' when I say let it be some firmament I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!"

Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, "Let it be some Brahms!" Apparently he added the warning, "Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms!"

And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

* * *

APPARENTLY Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical custard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses and such lustrous soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel, the imported pianist who has made intellectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

* * *

IN New York we are not being quite so lavishly provided by Mr. Koussevitzky with Brahmsian firmament. Yet the Lawd of the Bostonian heaven is doing very well by us. Last night in Carnegie Hall he set before his people if not a whole mess of Brahms, certainly much more than a little bitty dab. He gave us one of the greatest of the symphonies, an overture, and the most persuasive, if not the weightiest of the piano concertos, with Mr. Schnabel as the pianistic Gabriel, sounding his clarion through Johannes's keyboard evocation of a vernal earth.

That every one was happy there can be little doubt. Brahms is proper Festival material, with or without an anniversary pretext. He has the fullness and variety of content, the volume, the power, the greatness of style, the imaginative reach and depth, to justify and reward an unqualified disclosure of his works. A first-rate genius, a Maker (as the mystically daring Emerson might have called him), he is fecund and inexhaustible. Like Whitman, Brahms could have said, "I am large, I contain multitudes."

Last night we had him in two of his major phases: the Brahms who in the B-flat Concerto is chiefly the poet of Southern amplitudes and fervors, radiant, expansive, sensitive and magical, and the austerer Brahms of the E minor Symphony, the Northern Brahms, bardic, magistral and prevailingly dark hued.

It was the first of these manifestations that counted most in the sum of the evening's pleasure—not because the E-flat Concerto is a greater work than the E minor Symphony (though the point is debatable), but because we have less frequent opportunities to hear it, and because it involved last night the participation of Mr. Schnabel.

* * *

MR. SCHNABEL illustrates what Arnold called the application of ideas to life—which, by extension and inclusion, means the application of ideas to poetry. He has pre-eminently that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or overawed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant.

Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty, under the conditions fixed by the laws of its own nature and its own imperial domain. Naturally, like any Court, legal or aesthetic, the artist interprets these laws as he sees fit. But always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

* * *

THE Concerto that Mr. Schnabel played last night gave him occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. We know that Brahms conceived this music with the ichor of an Italian Spring in his blood—that in it he mirrored the spectacle that so enchanted him in his visits to Italy a half century ago: the spectacle of a Mediterranean Spring shedding its immemorial loveliness over the valleys and hill-slopes of the haunted South.

This abidingly wonderful music Mr. Schnabel helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach."

After this, the Fourth Symphony, for all its blend of Gothic magnificence and bardic speech, was an experience necessarily less revealing. The evening was Mr. Schnabel's, and the Brahms that he conveyed to us. For this our thanks, however, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who ordained this beneficent enrichment of our Brahmsian skies. If there were any who murmured, like the Paradisaical witnesses in "The Green Pastures," "Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament," their voices were not audible.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Very Likely

Sir—On the editorial page of your distinguished contemporary appears this statement: "If the people had by vote expressed a preference, in the matter of the orchestras, we feel that a majority would have desired precisely the three that had been engaged: The Philadelphia, the Boston, and the Cleveland Symphonies."

I am not so sure of that. If the people had by vote expressed a preference, it would probably have been for the orchestras of Rudy Vallee, Vincent Lopez and Paul Whiteman.

S. K. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Boston Symphony Plays Brahms

Arthur Schnabel Is Pianist for 'Academic Festival' in Last Concert for Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Over in Boston they have been in the throes of a Brahms festival. Therefore Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw no reason why we should not have our share of it when the Brahmins came to New York for their final concerts of this season. Last night in Carnegie Hall they presented us with the "Academic Festival" overture (presumably included in the Boston scheme to honor fair Harvard), the B flat concerto for piano and orchestra and the fourth symphony. The pianist was Arthur Schnabel, who was brought from Europe especially for the festival.

His share in the evening's total was noteworthy. He was always known here as an interpreter of intellectual grasp and a pianist who excelled in firmly drawn outline. He has undoubtedly grown since he last visited us. His performance of the B flat concerto last night was memorable. It had all his former merits and some added ones. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as an equal partner in the drama.

Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in all its forms, and this perhaps chills his tone, which is admirable for crystalline quality rather than for liquidity. On the other hand his delicate sense of the curve of every phrase and his fine perception of its place in the general scheme impel him to the use of nuances of ravishing gradation. Some of his crescendi and diminuendi last evening were so unerringly placed and so matchlessly executed as to lift the pages in which they occurred into an unusually beautiful and radiant glow of life. Particularly in the last movement did the pianist not only interpret Brahms but play piano as only a master can.

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. Music lovers were all very glad last night that Boston had indulged in a Brahms festival and caused such a thorough preparation of the work. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Artur Schnabel, pianist.

Brahms Program

Academic Festival Overture.
Concerto in B Flat, opus 83.
Mr. Schnabel.
Symphony No. 4, in E. Minor.

Having recently celebrated Brahms copiously in their home town, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra extended their enthusiasm for the great German composer sufficiently to take in their final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts. The first of these occurred last night; the last will take place Saturday afternoon. Last night's celebration took account of the master's Academic Festival Overture, the B flat piano concerto and the Fourth Symphony. Next Saturday we shall be privileged to bow before the Academic Overture again, the piano concerto in D minor and the First Symphony. Mr. Arthur Schnabel, the eminent pianist who was the star of yesterday's concert, will also play at the matinee.

Mr. Schnabel has been absent from our shores for the last eight years, I believe, an interval which he has utilized in acquiring great renown in Mittel-Europa. He was greeted last night with unusual warmth, and after he had done with the concerto he was recalled many times to bow his acknowledgments to the Boston subscribers. Unfortunately his performance ran up against a snag at the very outset—the orchestra and the piano appeared to be slightly out of tune with each other. That, however, could not be remedied at the moment, and Mr. Schnabel addressed himself to the Brahms with his reputed skill and authority.

The impression left on this reviewer was of one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised to art. Mr. Schnabel played every note of the music with unheard-of precision. Equally precise was the pianist's rhythm and his presentation of the themes and their developments. Employing a rather unyielding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a surgeon engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the expression of the lyrical element he gave one the feeling that he was inwardly chafing at the necessity, so grudging was he of the softer qualities of the work—the poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, one which placed the concerto in an entirely new light.

For his part Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt more lovingly on the poetic Brahms in the accompaniment to the concerto as he did in the Academic Overture and the fourth symphony. Between the soloist and the conductor the large audience of Brahms lovers which assembled last night was able to piece together a fair likeness of the last of the great symphonists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Schnabel Triumphs as Soloist with Bostonians

The third concert by a major symphony orchestra in three days was presented at Carnegie Hall last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in an all-Brahms programme, consisting of the Academic Festival Overture, Concerto No. 2 in B-Flat Major for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 83, and Symphony No. 4 in E-Minor. Artur Schnabel was the soloist.

An all-Brahms programme, especially one including the long, four-movement B-Major Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, is something of a full sized quota for those who "take their music" symphonically. In addition, last night there were many in the hall who had heard the Brahms Second Symphony played by the Philharmonic Society only the night before.

MORE—IF NEEDED.

For those who feel that they have been deprived of their due in Brahms, it is worth noting that the Boston Orchestra will play Brahms' First Symphony and the D minor piano Concerto tomorrow afternoon, and that the Philharmonic will play the Second Symphony again on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

It was apparent last night that Messrs. Brahms and Schnabel have had the pleasure of meeting before and of forming a close and sympathetic friendship. The soloist displayed an understanding and knowledge of the concerto that made his task seem easy. To the eye he was haughtily indifferent to the technical pitfal's of the piece, but to the ear he was their dominating master.

SOLOIST WINS APPLAUSE.

Seriously concerned with nothing except the music in hand, Schnabel gave a performance devoid of any touch of show or keyboard eccentricity, with the result that his hearers had little to do except listen attentively to the music.

He was interrupted at the end of each movement by long and enthusiastic applause.

His suave and admirable interpretation of the andante movement was the high point in a performance that resulted in something of a triumph. In very plain words, the man "knows his Brahms."

Mr. Koussevitzky put forth his utmost in an excellent reading of the Symphony. He was rewarded with a great amount of sincere applause. In fact, there were several outbursts of approval, but the conductor refused to acknowledge them until the Symphony was ended.

K. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES A BRAHMS CONCERT

Conductor's Interpretation of B-Flat Piano Concerto Makes a Deep Impression.

SCHNABEL MASTERFUL AID

Other Compositions Are Superbly Presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The significance and vitality of the music of Brahms, and the height from which it towers above most of the music of his period and ours, was impressively emphasized last night in Carnegie Hall. At that time and place the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, assisted by the pianist, Arthur Schnabel, gave a concert devoted to Brahms compositions. They were superbly presented and the response of the audience said more than many words concerning the power and the import of the music.

The performance which made the greatest impression, at the same time that it aroused curiously opposed opinions and estimates in the audience, was the interpretation by Messrs. Koussevitzky and Schnabel of the B-flat piano concerto. By and large this was the greatest performance of that work that the writer has heard—the greatest in its grasp of a score which towers mountain-high, in the justness of its proportions and the richness and salience of its detail, and, above all, in the vision and imagination which informed the whole achievement. The performance was singularly unified. The masterly playing of Mr. Schnabel showed him not only as a consummate musician and technician of his instrument, but as one who conceived the whole work from the symphonic standpoint and with the keenest appreciation and the most detailed knowledge of the orchestral score.

It was not only a pianist and interpreter of symphonic intent who sat before us but a colorist who matched every tint of Brahms's orchestration with one of his own; or, better say, a musician who realized with unexampled felicity the harmoniousness of Brahms' palette, and made his instrument take its place, with infallible inuition for the right nuance in the color scheme. In view of the result it is easy to believe that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky had labored with special care and mutual enthusiasm to achieve the best possible coherence and balance of all the elements of a work which is less a piano concerto in the accepted sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky's exposition of the score and the manner in which he supplemented, as it were, every thought and wish of the solist, was a lesson from a master of interpretation.

Under these circumstances the concerto loomed greater than ever. As a matter of fact, it dwarfs nearly every other work of its kind today. The breadth and poetry of its exposition made the listene more than ever aware of its closeness of this music to Beethoven—its flowering, indeed, from the spirit and the architecture of the "Emperor" concerto. But the B flat concerto is the grander work of the two. When Beethoven had reached the limits of the set and confined form of the concerto he created a symphony. Brahms enriches the symphony itself, or at least the resources of the orchestra, by the addition of a very important part for the solo instrument, and these two agents, supplementing each, do indeed evoke a vision of the rarest serenity and power and storm-like grandeur.

There they tower—the great mountains, the storm-kings, now concealed by the cloud-wrack, now burnished by the glory of sun and sky. Not even the music of Beethoven was deeper rooted in nature than this concerto-symphony. It has also the more personal and romantic element in the passion and stress of the second movement. The score embodies all of what is best and most distinguished in Brahms at the climax of his creative power, and there is no need to enumerate these qualities again. The point here is that last night such things were especially realized by the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

With Artur Schnabel as Soloist, Koussevitzky Adjourns His Hub Brahms Festival to Gotham

FOR the concluding pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony's forty-fourth season in New York, Serge Koussevitzky brought with him from the Hub a considerable part of his recent Brahms Festival. His Thursday subscribers found spread before them the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Second Piano Concerto in B flat major and the Fourth Symphony in E minor, with Artur Schnabel as the soloist of the Concerto. Saturday afternoon the symphony will be changed to the First in C minor and the soloist will play Concerto No. 1 in D minor, but the Overture will remain. As the symphony of Toscanini's Philharmonic concert on Wednesday night was the Brahms Second, the Brahmins may be conceded something like a holy week of their own.

Mr. Schnabel's prestige among the musicians of Central Europe, both as a virtuoso and a teacher, long since gave him rank with the most redoubtable pianists of the day. Eight years or so ago he visited this country and was a recitalist in New York. If his legion of European admirers had reason at that time to feel that he had not been fully appreciated on this side, they could have found no cause for disappointment in the demonstration accorded their favorite in Carnegie Hall last night when he had completed his task. The soloist was applauded long and very heartily, and found it necessary to return to the platform for many bows.

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical evaluations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little of harshness, chill and practicality. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the Overture and the Symphony, there was what seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that smote the ear aggressively throughout—"energico e passionato," according to the letter of the passacaglia finale of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK EVE. WORLD

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

AS AN aftermath of the recent Brahms celebration at the metropolis on the Charles, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night gave the first of two programs devoted to works by that master scheduled for its visit here this week. The initial bill consisted of the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Fourth Symphony and the "Piano Concerto in B flat Major."

For the keyboard display piece, Artur Schnable, the celebrated Brahms specialist, assumed the duties of soloist. The German virtuoso, who came to this country to participate in the festivities honoring the Hamburg master at the Hub, was destined to create a furore by his playing yesterday. The sheer technical bravura and massive scope of his performance seemed to engender the idea that this was a significant and epoch-making piece of work on his part.

Brahms, as a matter of fact, and nowhere more than in this very composition, can not be satisfactorily dealt with from the purely cerebral point of view. It is the perfect balance of form and content, of intellectual and emotional aspects, that gives his works their special quality. And yet, only the formal side of the composer's inventive genius came to light in Mr. Schnabel's reading. If his rendering was clean-cut, glib and correct, it possessed no suspicion of poetic depth and left the heart and soul of the masterpiece in utter darkness. With the exception of one or two passages, such as the closing measures of the development and the coda of the first movement, there was almost no inner life in the chill, pedantic exhibition of pianism, which was not only unsympathetic and mechanical, but marred by a dry, steely tone that issued from under the artist's powerful fingers as though impelled by so many triphammers. Unfortunately, to boot, the piano and the orchestra were not in tune with each other. But this was a matter for which the soloist could not be held responsible.

Mr. Koussevitzky in his accompaniment of the concerto and throughout the overture and symphony, appeared to be emulating Mr. Schnabel's example of attacking Brahms solely with brain and brawn. There was little mellowness in the instruments as they waded through the introduction of the jovial concoction based on college songs, which the composer wrote for the students of Breslau University after that institution of learning had conferred a Doctor's degree upon him. The great crescendo at the close of the introductory section was but the first intimation of the strident blasts of sound which were to prevail during the evening whenever a fortissimo mark put in an appearance. There was no humor in the "Fox Song" episode forming the central part of the overture and only the second subject, built up on the "Landesvater" tune, got under the skin of the work. The same coarse kind of instrumental emanations that blemished this selection were constantly in evidence in the symphony, which was, all in all, but a sodden, conventionalized and impersonal affair as the visiting conductor conceived it.

Hartford Courant
Apr 11th 1930

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

a lot of other excellent music impends; of which it seemingly behooves me to speak shortly if not at full length now.

+ + +

But a pause of just a moment may not be out of order in thinking how well the orchestra looked Wednesday evening in the new arrangement of stage levels at the Bushnell Memorial. Some conductors prefer to have ther men seated on a level stage but Dr. Koussevitzky was glad to use the various platforms that brought his players up in a sort of ampitheatre formation with the double basses and the percussion on the highest level and brasses, woodwind and strings coming downstage in the order named—the first violins, violas and a few of the seconds and 'cellos being at the regular stage level. Certainly the effect as a stage picture was greatly enhanced in this arrangement—which is similar to that obtained in Carnegie Hall, and Symphony Hall, Boston.

♣ ♣ ♣

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
APR 11 1930

Boston Symphony Plays Brahms

Arthur Schnabel Is Pianist for 'Academic Festival' in Last Concert for Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Over in Boston they have been in the throes of a Brahms festival. Therefore Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw no reason why we should not have our share of it when the Brahmins came to New York for their final concerts of this season. Last night in Carnegie Hall they presented us with the "Academic Festival" overture (presumably included in the Boston scheme to honor fair Harvard), the B flat concerto for piano and orchestra and the fourth symphony. The pianist was Arthur Schnabel, who was brought from Europe especially for the festival.

His share in the evening's total was noteworthy. He was always known here as an interpreter of intellectual grasp and a pianist who excelled in firmly drawn outline. He has undoubtedly grown since he last visited us. His performance of the B flat concerto last night was memorable. It had all his former merits and some added ones. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as an equal partner in the drama.

Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in all its forms, and this perhaps chills his tone, which is admirable for crystalline quality rather than for liquidity. On the other hand his delicate sense of the curve of every phrase and his fine perception of its place in the general scheme impel him to the use of nuances of ravishing gradation. Some of his crescendi and diminuendi last evening were so unerringly placed and so matchlessly executed as to lift the pages in which they occurred into an unusually beautiful and radiant glow of life. Particularly in the last movement did the pianist not only interpret Brahms but play piano as only a master can.

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. Music lovers were all very glad last night that Boston had indulged in a Brahms festival and caused such a thorough preparation of the work. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Artur Schnabel, pianist.

Brahms Program

Academic Festival Overture.
Concerto in B Flat, opus 83.
Mr. Schnabel.
Symphony No. 4, in E. Minor.

Having recently celebrated Brahms copiously in their home town, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra extended their enthusiasm for the great German composer sufficiently to take in their final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts. The first of these occurred last night; the last will take place Saturday afternoon. Last night's celebration took account of the master's Academic Festival Overture, the B flat piano concerto and the Fourth Symphony. Next Saturday we shall be privileged to bow before the Academic Overture again, the piano concerto in D minor and the First Symphony. Mr. Arthur Schnabel, the eminent pianist who was the star of yesterday's concert, will also play at the matinee.

Mr. Schnabel has been absent from our shores for the last eight years, I believe, an interval which he has utilized in acquiring great renown in Mittel-Europa. He was greeted last night with unusual warmth, and after he had done with the concerto he was recalled many times to bow his acknowledgments to the Boston subscribers. Unfortunately his performance ran up against a snag at the very outset—the orchestra and the piano appeared to be slightly out of tune with each other. That, however, could not be remedied at the moment, and Mr. Schnabel addressed himself to the Brahms with his reputed skill and authority.

The impression left on this reviewer was of one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised to art. Mr. Schnabel played every note of the music with unheard-of precision. Equally precise was the pianist's rhythm and his presentation of the themes and their developments. Employing a rather unyielding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a surgeon engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the expression of the lyrical element he gave one the feeling that he was inwardly chafing at the necessity, so grudging was he of the softer qualities of the work—the poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, one which placed the concerto in an entirely new light.

For his part Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt more lovingly on the poetic Brahms in the accompaniment to the concerto as he did in the Academic Overture and the fourth symphony. Between the soloist and the conductor the large audience of Brahms lovers which assembled last night was able to piece together a fair likeness of the last of the great symphonists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Schnabel Triumphs as Soloist with Bostonians

The third concert by a major symphony orchestra in three days was presented at Carnegie Hall last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in an all-Brahms programme, consisting of the Academic Festival Overture, Concerto No. 2 in B-Flat Major for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 83, and Symphony No. 4 in E-Minor. Artur Schnabel was the soloist.

An all-Brahms programme, especially one including the long, four-movement B-Major Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, is something of a full sized quota for those who "take their music" symphonically. In addition, last night there were many in the hall who had heard the Brahms Second Symphony played by the Philharmonic Society only the night before.

MORE—IF NEEDED.

For those who feel that they have been deprived of their due in Brahms, it is worth noting that the Boston Orchestra will play Brahms' First Symphony and the D minor piano Concerto tomorrow afternoon, and that the Philharmonic will play the Second Symphony again on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

It was apparent last night that Messrs. Brahms and Schnabel have had the pleasure of meeting before and of forming a close and sympathetic friendship. The soloist displayed an understanding and knowledge of the concerto that made his task seem easy. To the eye he was haughtily indifferent to the technical pitfal's of the piece, but to the ear he was their dominating master.

SOLOIST WINS APPLAUSE.

Seriously concerned with nothing except the music in hand, Schnabel gave a performance devoid of any touch of show or keyboard eccentricity, with the result that his hearers had little to do except listen attentively to the music.

He was interrupted at the end of each movement by long and enthusiastic applause.

His suave and admirable interpretation of the andante movement was the high point in a performance that resulted in something of a triumph. In very plain words, the man "knows his Brahms."

Mr. Koussevitzky put forth his utmost in an excellent reading of the Symphony. He was rewarded with a great amount of sincere applause. In fact, there were several outbursts of approval, but the conductor refused to acknowledge them until the Symphony was ended.

K. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 11 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES A BRAHMS CONCERT

Conductor's Interpretation of B-Flat Piano Concerto Makes a Deep Impression.

SCHNABEL MASTERFUL AID

Other Compositions Are Superbly Presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The significance and vitality of the music of Brahms, and the height from which it towers above most of the music of his period and ours, was impressively emphasized last night in Carnegie Hall. At that time and place the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, assisted by the pianist, Arthur Schnabel, gave a concert devoted to Brahms compositions. They were superbly presented and the response of the audience said more than many words concerning the power and the import of the music.

The performance which made the greatest impression, at the same time that it aroused curiously opposed opinions and estimates in the audience, was the interpretation by Messrs. Koussevitzky and Schnabel of the B-flat piano concerto. By and large this was the greatest performance of that work that the writer has heard—the greatest in its grasp of a score which towers mountain-high, in the justness of its proportions and the richness and salience of its detail, and, above all, in the vision and imagination which informed the whole achievement. The performance was singularly unified. The masterly playing of Mr. Schnabel showed him not only as a consummate musician and technician of his instrument, but as one who conceived the whole work from the symphonic standpoint and with the keenest appreciation and the most detailed knowledge of the orchestral score.

It was not only a pianist and interpreter of symphonic intent who sat before us but a colorist who matched every tint of Brahms's orchestration with one of his own; or, better say, a musician who realized with unexampled felicity the harmoniousness of Brahms' palette, and made his instrument take its place, with infallible inuition for the right nuance in the color scheme. In view of the result it is easy to believe that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky had labored with special care and mutual enthusiasm to achieve the best possible coherence and balance of all the elements of a work which is less a piano concerto in the accepted sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky's exposition of the score and the manner in which he supplemented, as it were, every thought and wish of the solist, was a lesson from a master of interpretation.

Under these circumstances the concerto loomed greater than ever. As a matter of fact, it dwarfs nearly every other work of its kind today. The breadth and poetry of its exposition made the listene more than ever aware of its closeness of this music to Beethoven—its flowering, indeed, from the spirit and the architecture of the "Emperor" concerto. But the B flat concerto is the grander work of the two. When Beethoven had reached the limits of the set and confined form of the concerto he created a symphony. Brahms enriches the symphony itself, or at least the resources of the orchestra, by the addition of a very important part for the solo instrument, and these two agents, supplementing each, do indeed evoke a vision of the rarest serenity and power and storm-like grandeur.

There they tower—the great mountains, the storm-kings, now concealed by the cloud-wrack, now burnished by the glory of sun and sky. Not even the music of Beethoven was deeper rooted in nature than this concerto-symphony. It has also the more personal and romantic element in the passion and stress of the second movement. The score embodies all of what is best and most distinguished in Brahms at the climax of his creative power, and there is no need to enumerate these qualities again. The point here is that last night such things were especially realized by the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

With Artur Schnabel as Soloist, Koussevitzky Adjourns His Hub Brahms Festival to Gotham

FOR the concluding pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony's forty-fourth season in New York, Serge Koussevitzky brought with him from the Hub a considerable part of his recent Brahms Festival. His Thursday subscribers found spread before them the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Second Piano Concerto in B flat major and the Fourth Symphony in E minor, with Artur Schnabel as the soloist of the Concerto. Saturday afternoon the symphony will be changed to the First in C minor and the soloist will play Concerto No. 1 in D minor, but the Overture will remain. As the symphony of Toscanini's Philharmonic concert on Wednesday night was the Brahms Second, the Brahmins may be conceded something like a holy week of their own.

Mr. Schnabel's prestige among the musicians of Central Europe, both as a virtuoso and a teacher, long since gave him rank with the most redoubtable pianists of the day. Eight years or so ago he visited this country and was a recitalist in New York. If his legion of European admirers had reason at that time to feel that he had not been fully appreciated on this side, they could have found no cause for disappointment in the demonstration accorded their favorite in Carnegie Hall last night when he had completed his task. The soloist was applauded long and very heartily, and found it necessary to return to the platform for many bows.

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical evaluations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little of harshness, chill and practicality. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the Overture and the Symphony, there was what seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that smote the ear aggressively throughout—"energico e passionato," according to the letter of the passacaglia finale of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
APR 11 1930

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

AS AN aftermath of the recent Brahms celebration at the metropolis on the Charles, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night gave the first of two programs devoted to works by that master scheduled for its visit here this week. The initial bill consisted of the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Fourth Symphony and the "Piano Concerto in B flat Major."

For the keyboard display piece, Artur Schnabel, the celebrated Brahms specialist, assumed the duties of soloist. The German virtuoso, who came to this country to participate in the festivities honoring the Hamburg master at the Hub, was destined to create a furore by his playing yesterday. The sheer technical bravura and massive scope of his performance seemed to engender the idea that this was a significant and epoch-making piece of work on his part.

Brahms, as a matter of fact, and nowhere more than in this very composition, can not be satisfactorily dealt with from the purely cerebral point of view. It is the perfect balance of form and content, of intellectual and emotional aspects, that gives his works their special quality. And yet, only the formal side of the composer's inventive genius came to light in Mr. Schnabel's reading. If his rendering was clean-cut, glib and correct, it possessed no suspicion of poetic depth and left the heart and soul of the masterpiece in utter darkness. With the exception of one or two passages, such as the closing measures of the development and the coda of the first movement, there was almost no inner life in the chill, pedantic exhibition of pianism, which was not only unsympathetic and mechanical, but marred by a dry, steely tone that issued from under the artist's powerful fingers as though impelled by so many trip-hammers. Unfortunately, to boot, the piano and the orchestra were not in tune with each other. But this was a matter for which the soloist could not be held responsible.

Mr. Koussevitzky in his accompaniment of the concerto and throughout the overture and symphony, appeared to be emulating Mr. Schnabel's example of attacking Brahms solely with brain and brawn. There was little mellowness in the instruments as they waded through the introduction of the jovial concoction based on college songs, which the composer wrote for the students of Breslau University after that institution of learning had conferred a Doctor's degree upon him. The great crescendo at the close of the introductory section was but the first intimation of the strident blasts of sound which were to prevail during the evening whenever a fortissimo mark put in an appearance. There was no humor in the "Fox Song" episode forming the central part of the overture and only the second subject, built up on the "Landesvater" tune, got under the skin of the work. The same coarse kind of instrumental emanations that blemished this selection were constantly in evidence in the symphony, which was, all in all, but a sodden, conventionalized and impersonal affair as the visiting conductor conceived it.

Hartford Courant
Apr 11th 1930

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

lls in Genbresegro o of ony, ic-- op-ist-Go eel

he ws id
-
e

a lot of other excellent music impends; of which it seemingly behooves me to speak shortly if not at full length now.

\+ \+ \+

But a pause of just a moment may not be out of order in thinking now well the orchestra looked Wednesday evening in the new arrangement of stage levels at the Bushnell Memorial. Some conductors prefer to have ther men seated on a level stage but Dr. Koussevitzky was glad to use the various platforms that brought his players up in a sort of ampitheatre formation with the double basses and the percussion on the highest level and brasses, woodwind and strings coming downstage in the crder named—the first violins, violas and a few of the seconds and 'cellos being at the regular stage level. Certainly the effect as a stage picture was greatly enhanced in this arrangement—which is similar to that obtained in Carnegie Hall, and Symphony Hall, Boston.

♣ ♣ ♣

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

82

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM
APR 11

Artur Schnabel Is Applauded for Playing Brahms Concerto

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Season's Fifth Evening Concert.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Over in Boston the symphony orchestra of New England's Athenian capital recently sponsored a Brahms Festival. The orchestra is now treating New York to a diminished edition of the feast it set before the Boston Brahmins.

For the fifth and last evening concert of its Carnegie Hall series for the present season, it offered yesterday a program that comprised these works of Brahms: the "Academic Festival" overture, the second piano concerto (in B flat), and the fourth symphony (in E minor).

Tomorrow afternoon, in the same hall, it will bid farewell to New York until next autumn with a second Brahms program, made up of the "Academic Festival" overture again, the first piano concerto (in D minor), and the first symphony (in C minor).

To act as pianist of both occasions the Bostonians brought over with them that laureate pianist of the German-speaking countries, Artur Schnabel, who, by the way, had played previously in New York, some eight years ago.

If anybody had doubted that Brahms is still a name to conjure with in our city of much music, the sight of Carnegie Hall last evening was an eye-opener. An eager throng packed it to utmost capacity. And the applause provoked by each number was long and loud. For Mr. Schnabel in particular there was a tremendous ovation at the end of the concerto. And so the popular verdict ran.

Yet, ungracious as it may seem to insist on the point, dissent did, if never so little, sour the cup. There were obstinate souls who remembered in the B flat concerto the ministrations of Joseffy, Paderewski, Harold Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, and consequently were little moved by Mr. Schnabel's showing.

Modest and musicianly of mien, the pianist of the evening played the solo part in a correct, incisive, sometimes brilliant fashion, but with little that could be denominated warmth, color, or feeling, and a conspicuous absence of singing tone. His performance had a kind of dash and impetus that unquestionably could stir up enthusiasm, but it was a superficial, academic affair of cold definitions which quite failed to unlock the heart of the andante and scarcely suggested the capriciousness of the scherzo and the finale.

The orchestral performance, presided over by Mr. Koussevitzky, was, both in the concerto and elsewhere, prevailingly chilly and surprisingly rude.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 11

MUSIC

BOSTON FINALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky made its last bow of the season before a Brooklyn audience at the Academy of Music last night. The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist; Brahm's Second Symphony, and Beethoven's "Third Leonore" overture comprised the concluding program of the orchestra's Brooklyn season.

For some six years Mr. Schnabel has enjoyed the plaudits of music lovers in middle Europe, where his art has been highly appraised. Following his performance Thursday night of a Brahms concerto and his rendition last evening of the Beethoven work, this critic, at least, has come to the conclusion that the adulaton accorded him abroad was fully deserved. For seldom have we heard such a vivid, clean cut performance, with such scintillant harmony achieved between pianist and strings. The concerto proved a succession of tonal highlights, with every note, thrill and run brought into crystal-clear relief. The andante and rondo movements, in particular, proved effective.

Having heard Mr. Schnabel's performance Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, we feel that last night's concerto was given an even more successful interpretation than the Brahms piece. Certainly, music in the absolute can hardly be brought to a higher point of perfection than was the Beethoven concerto last night.

Mr. Koussevitsky evoked prolonged applause from his Brooklyn audience with the Brahms "Second." Could the last of the great symphonists have heard the work last night, there is no doubt but that he would have been highly gratified at the result. For seldom has such painstaking care gone into the rendition of a symphony or has such attention been paid to the building up of a tonal climax.

The Boston completed its Brooklyn season with as nearly a perfect concert as music lovers can hope for. As a result, the impatience one must feel in awaiting the return of Mr. Koussevitsky next year, is consequently redoubled. A. R. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
APR 13

Music

By FELIX DEYO

ARTUR SCHNABEL SOLOIST IN BROOKLYN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOR THE season's concluding Brooklyn programme of the Boston Symphony series, at the Academy of Music last night, Serge Koussevitzky made it a Beethoven and Brahms affair, including the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture, the Concerto in G (No. 4), for piano with orchestra, and the Second Symphony of Brahms. In a sense, the concert was a repercussion of Dr. Koussevitzky's recent Brahms Festival held in Boston, for the soloist was the German pianist, Artur Schnabel, especially imported for that occasion.

We begin with Herr Schnabel's participation in the Beethoven concerto, for this artist, who has appeared in America but once before when he gave a series of recitals several seasons past, commands the most respectful attention of the intelligent American concerteer. He is a transcendent pianoforte pedagogue, the teacher of many virtuosi, among them the recently acclaimed Iturbi. As solo pianist, Herr Schnabel is German to the core, and his version of Beethoven's G major concerto last night was a thoroughgoing piece of super-intellectual pianism. His best most certainly accumulated and entered into a resplendent delivery of the music's printed score. His performance was the epitome of sincerity, which partially atoned for moments of apparents lack of variety of tone color and dangerous inclination to hard touch and a viewpoint so severely classical as to limit imaginative vision. None the less, it was superb playing, such as we always would be glad to hear. The orchestra fell quite in the mood of the strictly Beethovenesque interpretation vouchsafed by Herr Schnabel, and molded its accompaniment accordingly.

In the first movement of the Brahms symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky seemed more to be marking the beats than unfolding the reposeful idyllic charm which lies in the music, like a peaceful landscape hazily unfolding its length to dreamy contemplation, accented by the fleck of sunshine and shade over its beauty. In the following three movements, however, the conductor merged more into the inner recesses of the music, bringing intensification to the veiled sadness of the adagio, intimate lyricism to the allegretto and spirited energy to the finale.

In the audience we noted several prominent artists and many new personalities of interest, who evidently had pilgrimaged from Manhattan to Brooklyn for the express purpose of hearing the evening's soloist. All of which tends to show that a master musician, in the person, does not go unheeded or unappreciated in this day of radio and mechanicalized music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 13

KOUSSEVITZKY WINS BRAHMS TRIUMPH

Artur Schnabel, Pianist, Also Receives Ovation at End of D Minor Concerto.

HIS PLAYING IS SPIRITED

One of Notable Climaxes of Season —First Symphony Played With Cumulative Power.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The predominant fact which emerges from the two remarkable concerts of Brahms music which have been given this week by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall is the immense popularity of Brahms. Both programs, of last Thursday night and of yesterday afternoon, have been what the Germans would designate as "formidable" and what we would have called, a few years ago, "heavy." Each concert commenced with the "Academic" overture. This is not "academic," but very lively. But each concert also presented one of the piano concertos, which are nothing less than great symphonies with a tremendous piano part, and, in addition, a symphony. On Thursday the symphony was the Fourth; yesterday it was the First. The symphonies came after the long and very substantial concertos. On Thursday Mr. Schnabel had a triumph with the B flat concerto. This triumph was but the half of the ovation he received when he finished the D minor concerto yesterday afternoon, when he was cheered and applauded and called back to the stage many times. At the end of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous demonstration. All this was testimony to the powers of a magnificent orchestra, conductor, and pianist, but above all it was testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms. In the past programs of Wagner or Tchaikovsky have been the sure drawing cards for an orchestral concert. It is now shown that Brahms exerts an equal attraction—although he is more difficult to interpret than either of the other two composers.

Mr. Schnabel's second performance naturally furnished a better perspective of his qualities as an artist than a single performance could have done. It also explains why some listeners, although they were evidently in the minority, took issue with his performance on Thursday evening. Their objections are probably contingent upon their reaction, consciously or otherwise, to Mr. Schnabel's frequently bearish piano style. Only occasionally does he deign to play beautifully. Otherwise, when the music is cast in a heroic or dramatic vein, Mr. Schnabel is first of all a heroic-spirited interpreter, and secondly a pianist. It may be assumed that his piano style would have been in itself more agreeable if his instrument had been better tuned and more responsive to fortissimo attacks, but we believe that in any event Mr. Schnabel's piano-playing would be prevailingly austere, commanding, stirring in the last degree by virtue of its splendid spirit, rather than playing distinguished by opalescent tints or twilight shades of beauty, or a legato of the kind Mozart described when he said that singing passages on the instrument should flow like oil. When this element of sensuous beauty is abandoned by an artist aflame with the spirit of some very masculine and powerful music—whose playing is in fact tonally harder and more ugly in quality than it need be—many listeners will logically turn against him. They demand that music should first of all have sensuous beauty. If prophetic grandeur and loftiness of expression are without this sensuous envelope they feel that the art itself has been mutilated and injured.

Perhaps they are right. Mr. Schnabel tends to be forthright rather than beautiful and to project musical ideas rather than court the ear with the lusciousness of music. And yet we do not think that Brahms, any more than Mr. Schnabel, thought of his art in purely sensuous terms, and Brahms was after all a man who loved beauty and poetry as well as power and grandeur. And Mr. Schnabel again showed that he could play beautifully when he chose, as in the slow movement yesterday. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in the memory the gigantic proclamation over roaring drums and in response to different instruments of the orchestra, of the theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that passage came —at the beginning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recapitulation, with all the power and grandeur of which piano and orchestra were capable—it conferred something to remember.

There was again a tendency to italicize and to leave no detail to chance or the imagination. On the whole, we were not quite so deeply impressed by this performance as by that of Thursday night, although the great majority in the audience obviously felt the contrary. But the fire and nobility of Mr. Schnabel's interpretation and his complete contempt for any device merely calculated to please an audience or provoke applause could hardly be gainsaid. His performances will remain one of the notable climaxes of the season that is drawing to an end. This writer is frank to say that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky, by their performances of the two concertos, have changed and have materially broadened his understanding of them.

The performance of the First Symphony was admirably proportioned and had the fine sustained line that the performance of the much more unpretentious "Academic" overture had not. Reservations concerning the overture were recorded here after the first performance. These reservations gained strength yesterday. There was the tendency which is possibly a recurrent weakness of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine the music, dress up a very simple and vigorous spirited piece with a series of nuances which make it episodic and deprive it of a measure of its movement, spontaneity and vigor. Owing to the same cause, the peroration of the overture, when it came, was not sufficiently imposing. The symphony, however, was played with a fine continuity and cumulative power.

The listener might or might not agree with certain details. The final measures of the last movement were taken at a rather sensational pace, but the whole effect was extremely noble and sustained, and the finale, with the exception just remarked upon, had a unity which few conductors ever succeed in giving it. Familiar as the symphony is, it is not easy, even for the oldest hands, to present it so powerfully and coherently. The testimony of the audience showed how deeply this performance was felt and appreciated. The orchestra, with the conductor, rose and acknowledged the applause. These two concerts have been for Mr. Koussevitzky and his men a special triumph.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 12 1930

Music of the Day

CUSHING

Its Last Brooklyn Concert, nabel as Soloist

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, at the Academy of Music last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Beethoven.Overture, "Leonora" No. 3
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in G
Brahms.....Second Symphony
Assisting artist: Arthur Schnabel, pianist.

and a quarter ago. It was an assorbin gand revealing performance, a singularly cogent and convincing restatement of Beethoven's thought, and it led one inevitably to a conclusion already half formed as the result of the experience afforded by Mr. Schnabel's playing of Brahms an evening earlier at Carnegie Hall —the conclusion that Mr. Schnabel is indeed a commanding expositor of those masterpieces which lie within the scope of classical German tradition. However limited Mr. Schnabel's talent or genius may be, however closely confined to music of a certain period and tradition—and this we have yet to learn—his authority as an interpreter of Brahms and of Beethoven is beyond question And even those who cannot share Mr. Schnabel's conception of this music, must perceive its justification in the music itself, must allow Mr. Schnabel his right to see Brahms and Beethoven as he sees them, and admit that his approach to their work is that of a pianist soundly grounded in the science and the art of music.

* * *

In pianism such as was heard at the Academy of Music last evening the listenere does not detect a spontaneous inspiration. Mr. Schabel's understanding of Beethoven has, one feels, been reached by patient analysis of his music, his understanding of the concert's content achieved trough the intellect rather than throug the institutions of the heart. He lacks imagination and does not sse beyond the score, but his mind comprehends all that is to be found therein, grasps the subtlest significace of its symbols. His playing is reasoned, literal; its logic is clear and incontrovertible. He is, in the best sense of the phrase, a pianist who "plays the notes" — plays them with flawless accuracy, with a meticulous regard for their indicated temporal, rhythmic and dynamic values, envisioning them singly and together, in the patterns to which they contribute. His grasp of music's printed page embraces its form and desing, and justly evaluates the importance of all embellishment. But Mr. Schanbel does not permit his imagination to play any role in this process: he adds nothing and subtracts nothing from the music, eschews all interpretative license. He is content to present the music of Brahms and Beethoven for what it is, and not for what is might be.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky presented no such literal reading of the Brahms D major Symphony, with which, for the second consecutive year, he concluded an annual series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet the D major Symphony is a work which Mr. Koussewitsky presents sympathetically enough, with less flagrant divigations from the composer's intentions than usually mark ris performance of classic works. His treatment of the first movement lacks subtlety, especially in its dynamic adjustments, which last evening were often too abrupt, for hehe he indulges an inclination to dramatize Brahms, though the Second Symphony offers little justification for this procedure. But of the Adagio and of the succeeding scherzo Mr. Koussewitsky gives an admirable account — especially to be remarked is his treatment of the concluding pages of the third movement, wherein the mood of the music suddenly expands tnd softens. Even Mr. Toscanini neglects to give this coda its due value, which Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra last evening so beautifully stressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Schnabel Again Soloist With Boston Symphony

All-Brahms Program Includes Pianist in D Minor Concerto

At the fifth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky again conducted an all Brahms program. Arthur Schnabel, last Thursday's soloist, once more appeared as high priest of the Brahmsians, this time lending his ministrations to an exposition of the D minor piano concerto. The Academic Festival Overture was held over from the previous program, and the First Symphony in C minor supplanted the Fourth.

The D minor concerto, written in the composers' twenty-fifth year, antedates the one in B flat by twenty-two years. The works are antipodal in conception. The only similarity is the utter disregard for mere display. There is no passage work not germane to the ideas expressed. Brahms never thought of the performer or his problems. Thus in the final rondo, he introduces violinistic arpeggios in the solo part, and lets the executant worry over the fact that he is not playing a bowed instrument. It is none the less difficult to understand how the reviewer of the Leipzig "Signalen" on the occasion of its first hearing in 1859, could find this noble piece "a three-quarter hour long strangling and burrowing," an "unfermented paste with a desert of shrieking dissonances and cacaphonies."

Mr. Schnabel, of course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the truly orchestral piano part did not sound puny when contrasted with the tuttis. The chain octav trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in an Olympian mold.

The aristocratic phrasing, the absolute faithfulness to the spirit of the composer, the undeviating fidelity of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. There are those who find his playing cool and intellectual, without the glow of imagination. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the integral masculinity of Mr. Schnabel's style. His art has none of those androgynous elements often to be found in interpretive as well as creative talents. The audience showed their appreciation of his efforts with prolonged and enthusiastic applause. J. D. B.

THE WORLD: SUN

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30. Soloist, Artur Schnabel, pianist.

Brahms Program

Academic Festival Overture.
Piano Concerto in D Minor.
Mr. Schnabel.
Symphony No. 1, in C Minor.

The Bostonians concluded their present New York season and their miniature Brahms festival with a matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday. As at last Thursday's concert Mr. Arthur Schnabel was the soloist. The eminent pianist was heard in the D minor concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky led the "Academic Festival Overture" and the C minor symphony. The audience was a large one and demonstrative.

Mr. Schnabel treated the D minor in much the fashion he had the B flat on Thursday, that is, with stark precision and a great lustiness. The driving gusto of his performance was interrupted in the "adagio" of the concerto by some excursions into the realm of piano and pianissimo, but these were small ones in an unrelenting forte and fortissimo desert. There are places in the concerto that scream defiance to some oppressive destiny, but there are also as many that do not—passages whose importance in the scheme of the work cannot be denied. The first entrance of the piano is one of these. Mr. Schnabel played this theme in sixths with a metallic tone and a rude exactitude. The exposition of the form and structure of the concerto was clear and concise and in manner, heated. For this reporter it resembled a scientific lecture by a passionate scientist. Throughout the afternoon the Boston orchestra was, tonally, on a high plane, with the exception, perhaps, of the sounds unrolled by the tympanist, which were noisy and indefinite, and acted like a "loud" piano pedal on the playing of the rest of the band. Percussions, when not expertly managed, are an intrusion among the harmonious ingredients of an orchestra and refuse to mix, like a piano manipulated with no regard to tone.

Mr. Koussevitzky cherishes an inordinate love for ritards. Yesterday it led him into slowing up the first movement of the symphony to meet the "Poco Sostenuto" that finishes the section. This he did by launching his ritard seventeen measures before the "Poco Sostenuto." The score holds no such indication, for the simple reason that Brahms prepares for the reserved pace of the finishing measures of the movement by altering the character of the pizzicato accompaniment in the cellos three bars before the "Poco Sostenuto." But even allowing for Mr. Koussevitzky's own feeling in the matter, his enormous ritard stretched the license permitted to the interpreter of a master work.

N.Y. WORLD APR 13 '30

82

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Artur Schnabel Is Applauded for Playing Brahms Concerto

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Season's Fifth Evening Concert.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Over in Boston the symphony orchestra of New England's Athenian capital recently sponsored a Brahms Festival. The orchestra is now treating New York to a diminished edition of the feast it set before the Boston Brahmins.

For the fifth and last evening concert of its Carnegie Hall series for the present season, it offered yesterday a program that comprised these works of Brahms: the "Academic Festival" overture, the second piano concerto (in B flat), and the fourth symphony (in E minor).

Tomorrow afternoon, in the same hall, it will bid farewell to New York until next autumn with a second Brahms program, made up of the "Academic Festival" overture again, the first piano concerto (in D minor), and the first symphony (in C minor).

To act as pianist of both occasions the Bostonians brought over with them that laureate pianist of the German-speaking countries, Artur Schnabel, who, by the way, had played previously in New York, some eight years ago.

If anybody had doubted that Brahms is still a name to conjure with in our city of much music, the sight of Carnegie Hall last evening was an eye-opener. An eager throng packed it to utmost capacity. And the applause provoked by each number was long and loud. For Mr. Schnabel in particular there was a tremendous ovation at the end of the concerto. And so the popular verdict ran.

Yet, ungracious as it may seem to insist on the point, dissent did, if never so little, sour the cup. There were obstinate souls who remembered in the B flat concerto the ministrations of Joseffy, Paderewski, Harold Bauer, Gabrilowitsch, and consequently were little moved by Mr. Schnabel's showing.

Modest and musicianly of mien, the pianist of the evening played the solo part in a correct, incisive, sometimes brilliant fashion, but with little that could be denominated warmth, color, or feeling, and a conspicuous absence of singing tone. His performance had a kind of dash and impetus that unquestionably could stir up enthusiasm, but it was a superficial, academic affair of cold definitions which quite failed to unlock the heart of the andante and scarcely suggested the capriciousness of the scherzo and the finale.

The orchestral performance, presided over by Mr. Koussevitzky, was, both in the concerto and elsewhere, prevailingly chilly and surprisingly rude.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTON FINALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky made its last bow of the season before a Brooklyn audience at the Academy of Music last night. The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto, with Arthur Schnabel as soloist; Brahm's Second Symphony, and Beethoven's "Third Leonore" overture comprised the concluding program of the orchestra's Brooklyn season.

For some six years Mr. Schnabel has enjoyed the plaudits of music lovers in middle Europe, where his art has been highly appraised. Following his performance Thursday night of a Brahms concerto and his rendition last evening of the Beethoven work, this critic, at least, has come to the conclusion that the adulaton accorded him abroad was fully deserved. For seldom have we heard such a vivid, clean cut performance, with such scintillant harmony achieved between pianist and strings. The concerto proved a succession of tonal highlights, with every note, thrill and run brought into crystal-clear relief. The andante and rondo movements, in particular, proved effective.

Having heard Mr. Schnabel's performance Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, we feel that last night's concerto was given an even more successful interpretation than the Brahms piece. Certainly, music in the absolute can hardly be brought to a higher point of perfection than was the Beethoven concerto last night.

Mr. Koussevitsky evoked prolonged applause from his Brooklyn audience with the Brahms "Second." Could the last of the great symphonists have heard the work last night, there is no doubt but that he would have been highly gratified at the result. For seldom has such painstaking care gone into the rendition of a symphony or has such attention been paid to the building up of a tonal climax.

The Boston completed its Brooklyn season with as nearly a perfect concert as music lovers can hope for. As a result, the impatience one must feel in awaiting the return of Mr. Koussevitsky next year, is consequently redoubled. A. R. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Music

By FELIX DEYO

ARTUR SCHNABEL SOLOIST IN BROOKLYN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOR THE season's concluding Brooklyn programme of the Boston Symphony series, at the Academy of Music last night, Serge Koussevitzky made it a Beethoven and Brahms affair, including the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture, the Concerto in G (No. 4), for piano with orchestra, and the Second Symphony of Brahms. In a sense, the concert was a repercussion of Dr. Koussevitzky's recent Brahms Festival held in Boston, for the soloist was the German pianist, Artur Schnabel, especially imported for that occasion.

We begin with Herr Schnabel's participation in the Beethoven concerto, for this artist, who has appeared in America but once before when he gave a series of recitals several seasons past, commands the most respectful attention of the intelligent American concerteer. He is a transcendent pianoforte pedagogue, the teacher of many virtuosi, among them the recently acclaimed Iturbi. As solo pianist, Herr Schnabel is German to the core, and his version of Beethoven's G major concerto last night was a thoroughgoing piece of super-intellectual pianism. His best most certainly accumulated and entered into a resplendent delivery of the music's printed score. His performance was the epitome of sincerity, which partially atoned for moments of apparents lack of variety of tone color and dangerous inclination to hard touch and a viewpoint so severely classical as to limit imaginative vision. None the less, it was superb playing, such as we always would be glad to hear. The orchestra fell quite in the mood of the strictly Beethovenesque interpretation vouchsafed by Herr Schnabel, and molded its accompaniment accordingly.

In the first movement of the Brahms symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky seemed more to be marking the beats than unfolding the reposeful idyllic charm which lies in the music, like a peaceful landscape hazily unfolding its length to dreamy contemplation, accented by the fleck of sunshine and shade over its beauty. In the following three movements, however, the conductor merged more into the inner recesses of the music, bringing intensification to the veiled sadness of the adagio, intimate lyricism to the allegretto and spirited energy to the finale.

In the audience we noted several prominent artists and many new personalities of interest, who evidently had pilgrimaged from Manhattan to Brooklyn for the express purpose of hearing the evening's soloist. All of which tends to show that a master musician, in the person, does not go unheeded or unappreciated in this day of radio and mechanicalized music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 13

WILL ACCUSE 4 BISHOPS.

Georgia Pastor Will Charge Cannon and Others With Playing Politics.

WASHINGTON, April 12 (AP).—The Rev. Rembert G. Smith, pastor of the First Methodist Church here, announced today that he expects to prefer charges at the Dallas general conference next month against four leading bishops of the Church. He said in part:

"It is my present purpose to prefer charges at the general conference of

One of Notable Climaxes of Season —First Symphony Played With Cumulative Power.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The predominant fact which emerges from the two remarkable concerts of Brahms music which have been given this week by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall is the immense popularity of Brahms. Both programs, of last Thursday night and of yesterday afternoon, have been what the Germans would designate as "formidable" and what we would have called, a few years ago, "heavy." Each concert commenced with the "Academic" overture. This is not "academic," but very lively. But each concert also presented one of the piano concertos, which are nothing less than great symphonies with a tremendous piano part, and, in addition, a symphony. On Thursday the symphony was the Fourth; yesterday it was the First. The symphonies came after the long and very substantial concertos. On Thursday Mr. Schnabel had a triumph with the B flat concerto. This triumph was but the half of the ovation he received when he finished the D minor concerto yesterday afternoon, when he was cheered and applauded and called back to the stage many times. At the end of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous demonstration. All this was testimony to the powers of a magnificent orchestra, conductor, and pianist, but above all it was testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms. In the past programs of Wagner or Tchaikovsky have been the sure drawing cards for an orchestral concert. It is now shown that Brahms exerts an equal attraction—although he is more difficult to interpret than either of the other two composers.

Mr. Schnabel's second performance naturally furnished a better perspective of his qualities as an artist than a single performance could have done. It also explains why some listeners, although they were evidently in the minority, took issue with his performance on Thursday evening. Their objections are probably contingent upon their reaction, consciously or otherwise, to Mr. Schnabel's frequently bearish piano style. Only occasionally does he deign to play beautifully. Otherwise, when the music is cast in a heroic or dramatic vein, Mr. Schnabel is first of all a heroic-spirited interpreter, and secondly a pianist. It may be assumed that his piano style would have been in itself more agreeable if his instrument had been better tuned and more responsive to fortissimo attacks, but we believe that in any event Mr. Schnabel's piano-playing would be prevailingly austere, commanding, stirring in the last degree by virtue of its splendid spirit, rather than playing distinguished by opalescent tints or twilight shades of beauty, or a legato of the kind Mozart described when he said that singing passages on the instrument should flow like oil. When this element of sensuous beauty is abandoned by an artist aflame with the spirit of some very masculine and powerful music—whose playing is in fact tonally harder and more ugly in quality than it need be—many listeners will logically turn against him. They demand that music should first of all have sensuous beauty. If prophetic grandeur and loftiness of expression are without this sensuous envelope they feel that the art itself has been mutilated and injured.

Perhaps they are right. Mr. Schnabel tends to be forthright rather than beautiful and to project musical ideas rather than court the ear with the lusciousness of music. And yet we do not think that Brahms, any more than Mr. Schnabel, thought of his art in purely sensuous terms, and Brahms was after all a man who loved beauty and poetry as well as power and grandeur. And Mr. Schnabel again showed that he could play beautifully when he chose, as in the slow movement yesterday. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in the memory the gigantic proclamation over roaring drums and in response to different instruments of the orchestra, of the theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that passage came —at the bgeinning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recapitulation, with all the power and grandeur of which piano and orchestra were capable—it conferred something to remember.

There was again a tendency to italicize and to leave no detail to chance or the imagination. On the whole, we were not quite so deeply impressed by this performance as by that of Thursday night, although the great majority in the audience obviously felt the contrary. But the fire and nobility of Mr. Schnabel's interpretation and his complete contempt for any device merely calculated to please an audience or provoke applause could hardly be gainsaid. His performances will remain one of the notable climaxes of the season that is drawing to an end. This writer is frank to say that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky, by their performances of the two concertos, have changed and have materially broadened his understanding of them.

The performance of the First Symphony was admirably proportioned and had the fine sustained line that the performance of the much more unpretentious "Academic" overture had not. Reservations concerning the overture were recorded here after the first performance. These reservations gained strength yesterday. There was the tendency which is possibly a recurrent weakness of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine the music, dress up a very simple and vigorous spirited piece with a series of nuances which make it episodic and deprive it of a measure of its movement, spontaneity and vigor. Owing to the same cause, the peroration of the overture, when it came, was not sufficiently imposing. The symphony, however, was played with a fine continuity and cumulative power.

The listener might or might not

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 12

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Gives Its Last Brooklyn Concert, With Arthur Schnabel as Soloist

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, at the Academy of Music last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Beethoven.Overture, "Leonora" No. 3
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in G
Brahms.....Second Symphony
Assisting artist: Arthur Schnabel, pianist.

Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, Arthur Schnabel played the fourth of Beethoven's piano concertos—that in G major, which Ludwig wrote in Vienna nearly a century and a quarter ago. It was an absorbin gand revealing performance, a singularly cogent and convincing restatement of Beethoven's thought, and it led one inevitably to a conclusion already half formed as the result of the experience afforded by Mr. Schnabel's playing of Brahms an evening earlier at Carnegie Hall —the conclusion that Mr. Schnabel is indeed a commanding expositor of those masterpieces which lie within the scope of classical German tradition. However limited Mr. Schnabel's talent or genius may be, however closely confined to music of a certain period and tradition—and this we have yet to learn—his authority as an interpreter of Brahms and of Beethoven is beyond question And even those who cannot share Mr. Schnabel's conception of this music, must perceive its justification in the music itself, must allow Mr. Schnabel his right to see Brahms and Beethoven as he sees them, and admit that his approach to their work is that of a pianist soundly grounded in the science and the art of music.

* * *

In pianism such as was heard at the Academy of Music last evening the listenere does not detect a spontaneous inspiration. Mr. Schabel's understanding of Beethoven has, one feels, been reached by patient analysis of his music, his understanding of the concert's content achieved trough the intellect rather than throug the institutions of the heart. He lacks imagination and does not sse beyond the score, but his mind comprehends all that is to be found therein, grasps the subtlest significace of its symbols. His playing is reasoned, literal; its logic is clear and incontrovertible. He is, in the best sense of the phrase, a pianist who "plays the notes" — plays them with flawless accuracy, with a meticulous regard for their indicated temporal, rhythmic and dynamic values, envisioning them singly and together, in the patterns to which they contribute. His grasp of music's printed page embraces its form and desing, and justly evaluates the importance of all embellishment. But Mr. Schanbel does not permit his imagination to play any role in this process: he adds nothing and subtracts nothing from the music, eschews all interpretative license. He is content to present the music of Brahms and Beethoven for what it is, and not for what is might be.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky presented no such literal reading of the Brahms D major Symphony, with which, for the second consecutive year, he concluded an annual series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet the D major Symphony is a work which Mr. Koussewitsky presents sympathetically enough, with less flagrant divigations from the composer's intentions than usually mark ris performance of classic works. His treatment of the first movement lacks subtlety, especially in its dynamic adjustments, which last evening were often too abrupt, for hehe he indulges an inclination to dramatize Brahms, though the Second Symphony offers little justification for this procedure. But of the Adagio and of the succeeding scherzo Mr. Koussewitsky gives an admirable account — especially to be remarked is his treatment of the concluding pages of the third movement, wherein the mood of the music suddenly expands tnd softens. Even Mr. Toscanini neglects to give this coda its due value, which Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra last evening so beautifully stressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Schnabel Again Soloist With Boston Symphony

All-Brahms Program Includes Pianist in D Minor Concerto

At the fifth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky again conducted an all Brahms program. Arthur Schnabel, last Thursday's soloist, once more appeared as high priest of the Brahmsians, this time lending his ministrations to an exposition of the D minor piano concerto. The Academic Festival Overture was held over from the previous program, and the First Symphony in C minor supplanted the Fourth.

The D minor concerto, written in the composers' twenty-fifth year, antedates the one in B flat by twenty-two years. The works are antipodal in conception. The only similarity is the utter disregard for mere display. There is no passage work not germane to the ideas expressed. Brahms never thought of the performer or his problems. Thus in the final rondo, he introduces violinistic arpeggios in the solo part, and lets the executant worry over the fact that he is not playing a bowed instrument. It is none the less difficult to understand how the reviewer of the Leipzig "Signalen" on the occasion of its first hearing in 1859, could find this noble piece "a three-quarter hour long strangling and burrowing," an "unfermented paste with a desert of shrieking dissonances and cacaphonies."

Mr. Schnabel, of course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the truly orchestral piano part did not sound puny when contrasted with the tuttis. The chain octav trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in an Olympian mold.

The aristocratic phrasing, the absolute faithfulness to the spirit of the composer, the undeviating fidelity of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. There are those who find his playing cool and intellectual, without the glow of imagination. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the integral masculinity of Mr. Schnabel's style. His art has none of those androgynous elements often to be found in interpretive as well as creative talents. The audience showed their appreciation of his efforts with prolonged and enthusiastic applause. J. D. B.

THE WORLD: SUN

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitsky conducting; Carnegie Hall, 2:30; soloist, Artur Schnabel, pianist.

Brahms Program
Academic Festival Overture.
Piano Concerto in D Minor.
Mr. Schnabel.
Symphony No. 1, in C Minor.

The Bostonians concluded their present New York season and their miniature Brahms festival with a matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday. As at last Thursday's concert Mr. Arthur Schnabel was the soloist. The eminent pianist was heard in the D minor concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky led the "Academic Festival Overture" and the C minor symphony. The audience was a large one and demonstrative.

Mr. Schnabel treated the D minor in much the fashion he had the B flat on Thursday, that is, with stark precision and a great lustiness. The driving gusto of his performance was interrupted in the 'adagio' of the concerto by some excursions into the realm of piano and pianissimo, but these were small oases in an intolerable waste of fortissimo desert. There are places in the concerto that scream defiance to some oppressive destiny, but there are also as many that do not—passages whose importance in the scheme of the work cannot be denied. The first entrance of the piano is one of these. Mr. Schnabel played this theme in sixths with a metallic tone and a rude exactitude. The exposition of the form and structure of the concerto was clear and concise and in manner, heated. For this reporter it resembled a scientific lecture by a passionate scientist.

Throughout the afternoon the Boston orchestra was, tonally, on a high plane, with the exception, perhaps, of the sounds unrolled by the tympanist, which were noisy and indefinite, and acted like a "loud" piano pedal on the playing of the rest of the band. Percussions, when not expertly managed, are an intrusion among the harmonious ingredients of an orchestra and refuse to mix, like a piano manipulated with no regard to tone.

Mr. Koussevitzky cherishes an inordinate love for ritards. Yesterday it led him into slowing up the first movement of the symphony to meet the "Poco Sostenuto" that finishes the section. This he did by launching his ritard seventeen measures before the "Poco Sostenuto." But even allowing for Mr. Koussevitzky's own feeling in the matter, his enormous ritard stretched the license permitted to the interpreter of a master work.

N.Y. WORLD APR 13 '30

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

From Boston To New York Exceptionally

Dr. Koussevitzky Continues The Brahms Festival To Loud Plaudits

June 2 Apr 14

At the final concerts in New York for the season the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were applauded by the audiences and praised by the reviewers beyond current custom or recent precedent. The concerts befell in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon last; were indeed a renewal, or a continuance, of the Brahms Festival lately ended in Boston. On Thursday the program essembled his "Academic Overture," his Piano-Concerto in B-flat, his Symphony in E Minor. On Saturday it again contained the "Academic Overture"; added to it, the Concerto in B minor and the Symphony in C minor. On both occasions Mr. Schnabel was the pianist. Another column records the praise, and also the dispraise, that his playing provoked. For the moment orchestra and conductor are the matter in hand. Writing in The Tribune, Mr. Gilman gave them adroit and amusing introduction.

"It may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable 'Green Pastures' that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. 'Dey ain't,' reports the custard-maker, 'a drap in de jug.' Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by a miracle. 'Let it be some firmament!' he commands. 'An' when I say let it be some firmament, I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!'

"Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, 'Let it be some Brahms!' Apparently he added the warning, 'Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms!' . . . And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

"Apparently Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical custard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

Consequently

"But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and such luscious soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel the imported pianist who has made intellectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

"In New York we are not being quite so lavishly provided by Mr. Koussevitzky with Brahmsian firmament. Yet the Lawd of the Bostonian heaven is doing very well by us. [Last] Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall he set before his people if not a whole mess of Brahms, certainly much more than a little bitty dab. He gave us one of the greatest of the symphonies, an overture, and the most persuasive, if not the weightiest of the piano-concertos, with Mr. Schnabel as the pianistic Gabriel, sounding his clarion through Johannes's keyboard evocation of a vernal earth.

"That everyone was happy there can be little doubt. Brahms is proper Festival material, with or without an anniversary pretext. He has the fullness and variety of content, the volume, the power, the greatness of style, the imaginative reach and depth, to justify and reward an unqualified disclosure of his works. A first-rate genius, a Maker (as the mystically daring Emerson might have called him), he is fecund and inexhaustible. Thursday we had him in two of his major phases: the Brahms who in the Concerto in B-flat is chiefly the poet of southern amplitudes and fervors, radiant, expansive, sensitive and magical, and the austerer Brahms of the Symphony in E minor, the Northern Brahms, bardic, magisterial, and prevailingly dark hued."

Having passed the Concerto in review, Mr. Gilman ventured this final reflection:

"After this, the Fourth Symphony, for all its blend of Gothic magnificence and bardic speech, was an experience necessarily less revealing. The evening was Mr. Schnabel's, and the Brahms that he conveyed to us. For this our thanks, however, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who ordained this beneficent enrichment of our Brahmsian skies. If there were any who murmured, like the Paradisaical witnesses in 'The Green Pastures,' 'Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament,' their voices were not audible."

The Conductor's Share

The Times was like-minded as to Concerto and Symphony, saying: "It was not only a pianist and interpreter of symphonic intent who sat before us but a colorist who matched every tint of Brahms's orchestration with one of his own; or, better say, a musician who realized with unexampled felicity the harmoniousness of Brahms's palette, and made his instrument take its place, with infallible intuition for the right shading in the color scheme. In view of the result it is easy to believe that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky had labored with special care and mutual zeal to achieve the best possible coherence and balance of all the elements of a work which is less a piano-concerto in the accepted sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky's exposition of the score and the manner in which he suplemented, as it were, every thought and wish of the soloist was a lesson, from a master of interpretation."

And again: "The orchestral pieces were taken from the best Brahms—the 'Academic' Overture, which is youth itself and the wine of life, and the Fourth Symphony. Perhaps the reading of the Overture, played with balance and clarity by the magnificent orchestra, was a trifle deliberate and over-attentive to detail. Or, again, one might not agree with every tempo, nuance, crescendo and decrescendo of the symphony as the conductor contrived them; but on the whole these were great readings of works none the less great because they are familiar. Mr. Koussevitzky, who came here heralded as a virtuoso conductor not to be esteemed a reader of the classics, proved in this as in so many other concerts his innate understanding of the works of classic masters and his constantly ripening grip of his medium. [The Times

Climax

Once more, of the matinée on Saturday: "On Thursday Mr. Schnabel had a triumph with the Concerto in B-flat. This triumph was but the half of the ovation he received when he finished the Concerto in D minor Saturday afternoon, when he was cheered and applauded and called back to the stage many times. At the end of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous demonstration. All this was testimony to the powers of a magnificent orchestra, conductor, and pianist, but above all it was testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms.

"The performance of the First Symphony was admirably proportioned and had the fine sustained line that the performance of the much more unpretentious 'Academic' Overture had not. Reservations concerning the Overture were recorded here after the first performance. These reservations gained strength under repetition. There was the tendency which is possibly a recurrent weakness of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine the music, dress up a simple and vigorous-spirited piece with a series of nuances which make it episodic and deprive it of a measure of its movement, spontaneity and vigor. Owing to the same cause, the peroration of the Overture, when it came, was not sufficiently imposing. The symphony, however, was played with a fine continuity and cumulative power . . . Familiar as the music is, it is no easy, even for the oldest hands, to present it so powerfully and coherently. The testimony of the audience showed how deeply this performance was felt and appreciated. These two concerts have been for Mr. Koussevitzky and his men a specific triumph."

Amusements

Schnabel's Brahms In New York Ears

Continued from Preceding Page

puny when contrasted with the tuttis. The chain octave trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in an Olympian mold. The aristocratic phrasing, the absolute faithfulness to the spirit of the composer, the undeviating fidelity of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. There are those who find his playing cool and intellectual, without the glow of imagination. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the integral masculinity of Mr. Schnabel's style. His art has none of those androgynous elements often to be found in interpretive as well as creative talents. [The Tribune

Mr. Schnabel again showed [on Saturday] that he could play beautifully when he chose, as in the slow movement of the D-Minor Concerto. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in the memory the gigantic proclamation over roaring drums and in response to different instruments of the orchestra of the theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that passage came—at the beginning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recapitulation, with all the power and grandeur of which piano and orchestra were capable—it conferred something to remember. But the fire and nobility of Mr. Schnabel's interpretation and his complete contempt for any device merely calculated to please an audience or provoke applause could hardly be gainsaid. His performances will remain one of the notable climaxes of the season that is drawing to an end. [The Times

Schnabel's Brahms In New York Ears

Praise and Also Question for His Playing Through The Concertos

Apr. 14 Sun

ELSEWHERE these columns report the warmth of public and press toward the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky at their final concerts, for the season, in New York. At both, Mr. Schnabel was the "assisting artist," playing the piano-part in each of Brahms's Concertos. Newcomer in his present note and powers, making inevitably large and deep impression, he shared with the conductor the laurels of the evening and the matinée. He encountered as well questioning and dissenting voices. He himself and his playing of Brahms are so fresh in Bostonian memory that both praise and blame deserve quotation.

Light and Leading

Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Concerto in B-flat was memorable. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as an equal partner in the drama.

Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in all its forms, and this perhaps chills his tone, which is admirable for crystalline quality rather than for liquidity. On the other hand his delicate sense of the curve of every phrase and his fine perception of its place in the general scheme impel him to the use of nuances of ravishing gradation. Some of his crescendi and diminuendi were so unerringly placed and sa matchlessly executed as to lift the pages in which they occurred into an unusually beautiful and radiant glow of life. Particularly in the last movement did the pianist not only interpret Brahms but play the piano as only a master can.

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also. [The Sun

Mr. Schnabel . . . has pre-eminently that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or overawed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant. Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty. Always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

The Concerto in B-flat gave Mr. Schnabel occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. This abidingly wonderful music he helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach." [The Tribune

Doubt and Dissent

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical valuations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little harshness, chill and practically. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the [Academic] Overture and the [Fourth] Symphony, there was which seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that smote the ear aggressively throughout—"energico e passionato," according to the letter of the passacaglia finale of the Fourth Symphony.

The impresison left on this reviewer was one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised to art. Mr. Schnabel played every note of the music with unheard-of precision. Equally precise was the pianist's rhythm and his presentation of the themes and their developments. Employing a rather unyielding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a surgeon engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the expression of the lyrical element he gave one the feeling that he was inwardly chafing at the necessity, so grudging was he of the softer qualities of the work—the poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, one which placed the concerto in an entirely new light. [The World

The Ayes Again

In the Concerto in D minor, Mr. Schnabel, of course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the truly orchestral piano-part did not sound

Continued on Following Page

In the World of Musi

New York and Boston Orchestras Play Two Symph Brahms in Masterly Fashion

N.Y. POST April 14/30

TWO great symphonies of Brahms were played by two chestras under two great conductors on Saturday, before audiences in Carnegie Hall. The two concerts were a triump Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, and Philharmonic-Symphony, led by Arturo Toscanini, and they we for the audiences.

They were far more than a treat. That word is too mild slight. They were memorable events. They were experiences to They were revelations in the art of music. Two interpret Teutonic composer, the one Russian, the other Italian, brought refreshment to thousands of men and women, quickened the standing and stirred their hearts to a new appreciation of raptures and yearnings.

The Boston orchestra played the First Symphony. It was a powerful performance. The sonorous measures had majesty and in others the strings sang divinely and the finale was brilliant. The New York orchestra played the Second Symphony. This performance contained subtleties without number. When the orchestra was subdued to that mysterious, haunting song in the second movement the tone was like golden sunshine.

Mr. Toscanini has been charged with giving an Italian character to Brahms. Surely that is not it. Without trying to prove that Mr. Tosconini is really an Irishman may it not be suggested that the veiled wonder and enchantment in his music are not unlike the shaken images of the heart's desire that may be found in the mysticism of Celtic literature?

On Saturday night Mr. Toscanini appeared a little annoyed because an adoring audience applauded with such gusto his incomparable performance of Mendelssohn's Nocturne and Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." He should not be annoyed. It may be a slight thing to him, but it is a most exquisite bit of magic. We are glad to see that this number is on the orchestra's programs for London, Florence, Prague, Vienna and Dresden, in the forthcoming tour.

Artur Schnabel was again the soloist with the Boston orchestra on Saturday. This time it was the D minor Concerto of Brahms. This also was massive, even architectural, in manner.

HENRY BECKETT

Boston Symphony Ends Seas

Koussevitsky Continues Brahms Fest Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its series of York concerts Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. western postlude to Boston's Brahms festival as cont The "Academic Festival" overture was repeated and Artur Schnabel and the orchestra played the certo. It is not accurate to call this a piano co the work in D minor, performed on Thursday actually a symphony with piano obbligato.

It was delivered to a large audience in the fullness of its power. Again it was made plain that the pianist and Mr. Koussevitzky had studied the composition with loving care. In the grandeur of its outline and in the nice adjustment of every detail it was a noble interpretation.

Years ago some writers about music vexed themselves with the question, "Which of the two Brahms piano concertos is the greater?" Why settle such a question at all? For the artist the matter should long ago have been determined by the famous declaration of Franz Rummel. This writer foolishly asked him which of Beethoven's piano concertos he preferred. He answered quickly, "The one I am playing." That was a perfect reply. The interpretative artist lives in the work he is interpreting and during that time it is for him the greatest work.

The D minor concerto slips down a little in its last movement. The other two are too bold, so crushing in their challenge that the finale sounds tame. When Brahms was in an aggressive mood, the roar of the lion shook the jungle. And yet there was a time when many of us thought that Brahms indulged in too much sculptured stateliness. When Franz Kneisel gave the first New York performance of the violin concerto at a Boston Symphony concert on December 17, 1889, introducing his own cadenza, less was said about the work than some of us say now whenever it is repeated. We live and learn. We have lived to learn that Mr. Schnabel knows his Brahms. He is not a colonist, but a strong engraver, and he thinks in large terms. We hope he will come again. The concert concluded with the transcendant first symphony.

NEW YORK SUN
April 14, 1930

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC -:- -:- -:- By

LOOKING BACKWARD AND TODAY

When Georges Longy joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October, 1898, as first oboist, his associate was Mr. Sautet, who had been soloist oboist for some years, for whom Mr. Arthur Foote had written some pleasing pieces. Mr. Gericke was the conductor. The concert masters were Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler; J. Akeroyd was the leader of the second violins; L. Svecinski of the violas; Alwin Schroeder of the violoncellos; S. Elkind of the double basses. The flutes were Messrs. A. Maquarre, Brooke and Fox; the clarinets, Messrs. Selmer and Metzger. F. Mueller played the English horn; F. H. Guenzel the double bassoon. The Litke brothers played the bassoons; Mr. Hackebarth was first horn; Mr. Kloepfel, the first trumpet; C. Hampe the first trombone. H. Schuecker was the harpist, A. Rettberg the kettle drummer.

The first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Antoine L. De Ribas, who, born at Madrid in 1814, was a celebrated virtuoso, having made his first appearance in London in 1837; in New York in 1839. His associate at the oboe desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881, was Paul Fischer. De Ribas died in 1907. His daughter married Mr. John C. Mullaly, excellent violinist and conductor.

Mr. Longy's musical activity was great: orchestral player, leader of a chamber music club of wind instruments that bore his name, conductor of orchestras, teacher and director of a school. Yet he never seemed hurried or nervous in public or in private—unlike Willy Hess, once concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was always informing those whom he met that he was "so tired." The first members of the Longy club founded in 1900) were Messrs. Andre Maquarre, Longy, Selmer, Hackebarth, Hugo Litke, Heinrich Gebhard. The list of works performed at the club's concerts is long and varied. Music by Loeffler, d'Indy, Caplet, Lazzari, Wailly, Pierne, Widor, Hure, G. Faure, Woollett, Hahn, Lacroix, Mouquet, Wolf-Ferrari, Falconi—these were only a few of the contemporary composers in this field, and the older composers were liberally represented.

And as a leader of the orchestra generously supported by the late Mrs. Richard H. Hall, he introduced works hitherto unknown, as Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," music by Loeffler, Bruneau, Enesco, d'Indy, Rabaud, Moussorgsky, Balakirev, Augusta Holmes, Widor, Georges, Chausson, Hue, G. Faure, Bourgault-Ducoudray.

He was a great artist; for the oboe what Pourtaut—who went down with La Bourgogne—was for the clarinet. There was this difference: Longy was first of all and always devoted to music; Pourtaut, unrivalled clarinetist that he was, wished to devote himself wholly to painting, for which he had a decided talent; and he used to regret that fate obliged him to play the clarinet, if only because, as he once said to us: "A man looks so like a fool, blowing it."

When Henri Brod, first oboist of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and of the Grand Opera, died, Cherubini's only remark as the director of the conservatory when he was informed of the death, was: "Small tone." No one, not even a cool and dry Cherubini of today, could say this of Georges Longy.

Many musical instruments are associated with curious proverbs and popular sayings. There is little anecodatage about the oboe—hautbois. In furniture one finds the highboy and the lowboy. What is the lowboy in music; the bassoon or double bassoon? In the 16th century there was a family of oboes, a soprano, haut-contre, tailles and basses. It appears that the word "hautbois" was originally a generic term for different kinds of wooden instruments employed to play the soprano or upper parts. There was a hautbois de Foret, an earlier form of clarinet. It was said in 1862 that members of German military bands were called Hautboisten, no matter what was the instrument they played; for there were many years in all European countries in which oboes had an important part in a military band.

There was a French saying—perhaps it is still heard—That "to play the oboe was to be hanged." And so Justice was said to play that instrument, because Justice raises the gallows—The highwood on which the guilty are suspended. The hanged man also "danced the dance of bishops," because he gave the benediction with his feet to the lookers-on; while the hangman's rope was called the chanterelle, the E string of the violin.

The Symphony season is drawing to a close. The American composer cannot say that he has been wholly ignored. (This charge has been made against Mr. Toscanini in New York.) The native or adopted Americans who have been represented this season are Bloch Fairchild, Samuel Gardner, Gruenberg (twice), Josten, Loeffler, Piston, Wetzler, and Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta is announced for performance this week. Works by Bax, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier (with orchestra) have been played for the first time anywhere, possibly Martelli's Assyrian Bas Reliefs should be included; while nearly twenty works have been played for the first time in Boston. No doubt there are still some highly respectable souls who are wounded to the quick when they see a work by an unknown—unknown to them—composer announced, and if they go to the concert, unprovided with ear-cups and gas masks, it is chiefly to confirm their suspicions.

The late Georges Longy, solo oboist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, October, 1898—May, 1925.

his way, let him go ahead always. Criticism follows its trade. It judge and it should judge according to the established rules.

"The artist, on the contrary, should look to the future and clearly see new worlds in the chaos, and if on the new path he sees a small light in the distance, let him not be frightened by the darkness around him, but go ahead, and if sometimes he stumbles and falls, let him get up and go ahead always. It is fine sometimes, even for a chief of a school to fall."

Apropos of "Apollon Musagetes" which was performed here at a symphony concert last week, Mr. Benjamin Collins Woodbury sends us his "Musagetes" ("with apology to Shakespeare's thirty-eighth sonnet") from his "Portsmouth and Other Poems," published in Boston in 1923:

"Who, jesting, would another Muse invoke,
Or desecrate the mantle of the Nine
Except in silly badinage and joke—
Or do alone men speak the truth in wine?
Doth not fair Clio her exploits relate,
Euterpe with her music's heavenly fire,
With comedy, gay Thalia satiate?
Doth not Polymnia thee with hymns inspire,
Terpsichore with choral dance and song,
Melpomene with tragedy consp[illegible]e
Stars[illegible] [illegible] with celestial throng,
Erato's verses or the sacred lyre,
Caliope, vain man, thy fancies please?—
I give you god of all—Musagetes."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

ENTY-EIGHT PAGES
TWO SECTIONS

Death of G. Longy
The Noted Oboist

Through Many Years Figure At Symphony Hall and In Boston Music

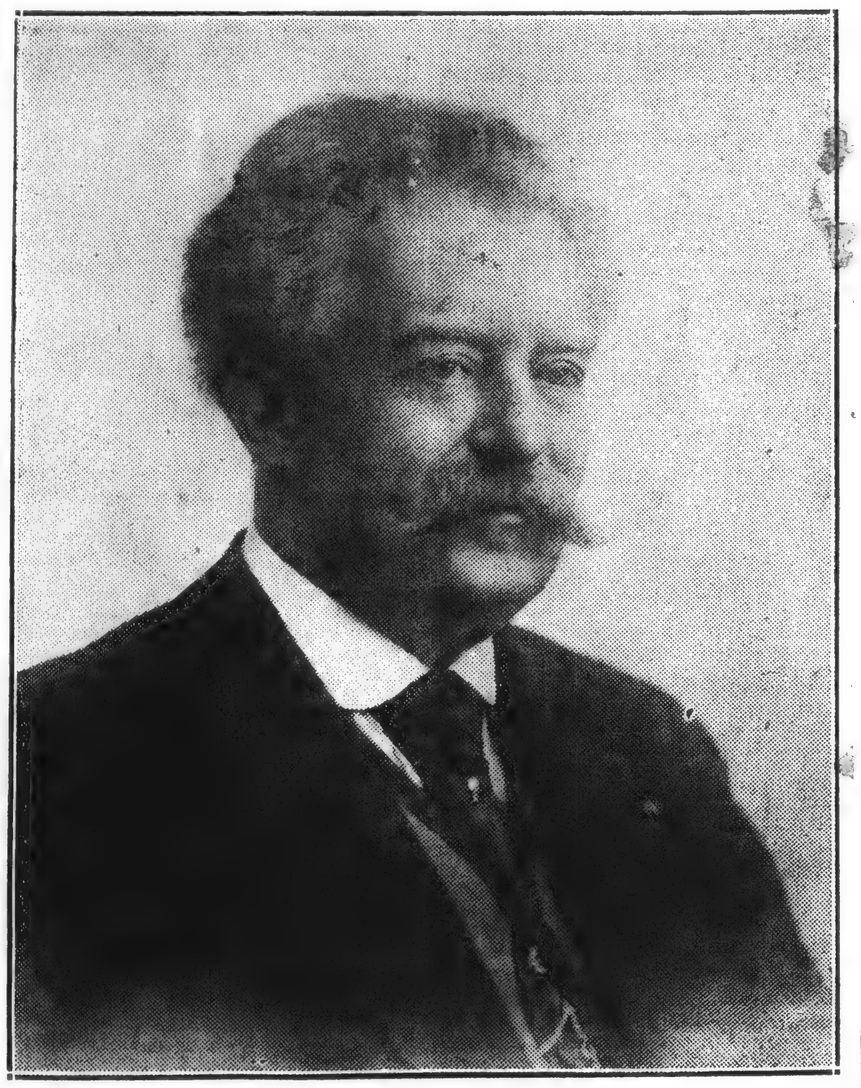
Trans Apr. 14

Word came today to Boston of the death at his farm near Abbeville in Normandy of Georges Longy, first oboe of the Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1925, one of the distinguished virtuosi of his time with that instrument. In a letter to Clément Lenom, now a teacher at the Conservatory, and Mr. Longy's former colleague in the wind-choir at Symphony Hall, Mme. Longy, the widow, reports her husband's death from a sudden seizure as he was walking with his little grandson about the farm. The letter does not fix the date of Mr. Longy's death but is itself dated March 30.

During the conductorship of Fiedler Mr. Longy came to Symphony Hall from

Continued on Page Seven

In His Prime



Georges Longy

First Oboe of the Symphony Orchestra, 1909-1925

Death of G. Longy
The Noted Oboist

Continued from Page One

the Opéra-Comique at Paris with no small reputation to herald him. Once established in Boston, he busied himself variously. He assembled the Longy Club from his colleagues in the orchestra to give chamber concerts of music for wind choir, under subsidy from Mr. Higginson. For a while he maintained a series of concerts to test new music. Through many years he was head of a flourishing music-school. In his prime he was indeed a considerable figure in the musical life of Boston. He resigned from the orchestra at his own wish and before any discoverable decay in his powers. His daughter, Mme Renée Longy-Miquelle, is now settled in Philadelphia as pianist and teacher.

BE—TUESDAY, APRIL 15

GEORGES LONGY DEAD IN FRANCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Oboist Many Years

Distinguished Musician Considered Master of His Instrument

Globe

Word was received yesterday in Boston of the death at his farm near Abbeville, in Normandy, of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy, better known as Georges Longy, who played first oboe in the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1925, one of the most distinguished virtuosos of his time with that instrument.

GEORGES LONGY

In a letter to Clement Lenom, now a teacher at the Conservatory and Mrs Longy's former colleague in the wind-choir at Symphony Hall, Mme Longy reported her husband's death from a sudden shock as he was walking about the farm with his little grandson. The letter does not fix the date of Mr Longy's death, but is itself dated March 30.

Georges Longy was only five years old in his native Abbeville, on the Somme, when his obvious musical talent caused his father to let him try the violin. At the College d'Abbeville, where he received his general educatin, his talents soon led him to specialize in music. To the violin he added the piano. Then one day he heard the oboe played by a capable musician and his mind was made up.

At 14 he was ready for the Paris Conservatory, where he studied harmony under Taudou and began the advanced studies of the oboe under the famous oboist, Georges Gillet. Three years later, in 1885, he won second prize in the annual competition. The next year he easily captured first prize.

His professional musical life began in 1886, when he joined the famous Lamoureaux Orchestra, and from then on his rise was rapid. One after another, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere and the Opera Comique claimed his talent. In 1888 he went to the Colonne as soloist, while still a member of the Opera Comique.

It was as a player in both of these that an accident found him and brought him to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost its first oboist. Maj Henry L. Higginson, sponsor of the orchestra, wired Paris for the best oboist available to fill the gap. Longy was admittedly the best in Paris and he was induced to come to Boston.

Once in Boston, he busied himself variously. He assembled the Longy Club from his colleagues in the orchestra to give chamber concerts of music for wind-choir, under a subsidy from Maj Higginson. For a while he maintained a series of concerts to test new music. For many years he was the head of a flourishing music school. He resigned from the orchestra at his own wish in his very prime.

His daughter, Mme Renee Longy-Miquelle of Philadelphia is a pianist and teacher. Mr Longy had attained the reputation of being the supreme master of the oboe in America.

WILLIAM S LYNCH

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

GEORGES LONGY DEAD.

Former First Oboe of Boston Symphony Stricken in France.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 14.—Word came today from France of the sudden death at his farm near Abbeville, Normandy, of Georges Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1925, and one of the distinguished virtuosi of his time with that instrument.

During the conductorship of Fielder Mr. Longy came to Symphony Hall with the Opéra Comique in Paris with no small reputation to herald him. Once established he assembled the Longy Club from his colleagues in the orchestra to give chamber concerts under subsidy from the late Thomas Higginson. For a while he maintained a series of concerts to test new music. Through many years he was head of a flourishing music school. He resigned from the orchestra before any discoverable waning of his powers. His daughter, Mme. Renée Longy-Miquelle, is a pianist and teacher in Philadelphia.

Mr. Longy was born in Abbeville in 1868. In 1866 he won first prize at the Paris Conservatory and joined the Lamoureux Orchestra. Two years later he was solo oboe of the Colonne Orchestra at the Opera Comique. In 1898 he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two years later he founded his own music school and the Longy Club, which devoted itself to works for wood-wind instruments.

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 16 1930

With the surge and sweep of Ravel's "Bolero," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky still crashing in my ears, I can't begin this column without a word about last week's great concert. I am simply bursting with pride in the achievement of the orchestra, the very star of which I remember and which used to delight me in the far away days when the insolent grace of Timothee Adamowski was potent in Boston, and when that slim wisp of fire, Bernhard Listemann, a violinist with a streak of absolute genius, was a leading figure in the world of music. Of course the delight in any music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be all intermingled with the impact of Dr. Koussevitsky's personality, his magnetic, dynamic appeal, his sheer inspired greatness as a conductor. With the little finger of his magic left hand he sweeps his entire orchestra within the arc of a single gesture, his hands plead, encourage, sustain, control, dominate. When I first watched Dr. Koussevitsky conducting his orchestra, sitting close, as I like to be placed, in my beloved front lower box, which brought me within the actual range of the conductor's baton, he semed to me to embody the priesthood of music, differing not only in degree, but in kind, from all the other conductors known to me, having a different approach to his musicians, seeming to radiate an enveloping kindliness. It is amazing to me that any audience can maintain its self control when the "Bolero" is played by the Boston Symphony. Of course, aside from the technical perfection of the playing, the appeal of the "Bolero" is frankly animal, purely sensuous, more than that, purely sensual, but such as it is, I wish it might be my fortune to listen to it, played as I heard it last night, fifty-two times in the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Mystery About Seats Before Doors Open and Later.

By Alfred Breslaw.

On the evening of April 10, at Carnegie Hall, the public was advised by a sign conspicuously displayed on the steps leading to the lobby that all standing room admissions had been sold out for the concert of the Boston Symphony. This would suggest that seats could not be obtained.

Those greatly desirous of hearing the concert were left to the conscienceless speculators, who were charging 75 cents and $1 above ticket prices.

When the doors were opened, however, standing room and reserved seats were put on sale by the box office.

An investigation would perhaps reveal some much needed light upon a rather hazy situation.

3,951 Gouverneur Ave., Bronx.

P. S.—Time would not permit a longer list of names and addresses than enclosed herewith.

We the undersigned hereby protest against the outrageous discrimination in the matter of ticket distribution for the Boston Symphony concert of April 10:—

Alfred Breslaw, 3,951 Gouverneur Ave., Bronx.
S. L. Bremer, 271 Goldsmith Ave., Newark, N. J.
Louis Clark, 580 W. 170th St.
Mabel Asrus, 1,825 Harrison Ave.
Sara Borden, 2,700 Bronx Park E.
Sam Kass, 1,500 St. John's Pl., Brooklyn.
J. Shliom, 35 W. 16th St.
Mark Shwartz, 1,541 Madison Ave.
M. Vosk, 1,826 Bryant Ave.
J. Skladman, 585 Union Ave.
Felix Schumann, 498 Seventh Ave.
Samuel Baker, 105 W. 112th St.
Max Schulman, 483 E. 96th St., Brooklyn.
Joseph Simonofsky, 483 E. 96th St., Brooklyn.
Louis Weber, 1,916 Eaby Ave., Bronx.
M. Temple, Hotel Manger.
Carl L. Newman, 228 W. 11th St.
Dr. J. Hirsch, 12 Perry St.
Philip Ferguson, 1,771 Madison Ave.
Reuben Dietz, 335 New Lots Ave., Brooklyn.
Julius Rimkat, 1,268 Grant Ave.
Robert Venus, 17-19 E. 107th St.
M. Veinus, 1,524 Saratoga Pl.
A. Powell, 90 Pinehurst Ave.
Mary Grenoble, 111 Bedford St.
A. F. Gagne, 140 E. 46th St.
John B. Gartner, 144 W. 94th St.
Kate Trita, 112 E. 98th St.

Dr. Koussevitzky Balancing Moods

Trans Apr. 18

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its eighth concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater. The program comprised just three numbers—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Stravinsky's ba[llet] Prelude [to] ner's ope[ra] pondered upon the works. thought t[he] example o[f] ing. To [a] hoven, St[ravinsky] to be mer[ely]

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed his mind—for the better. At the Symphony Concerts of next week he will produce Mr. Dukelsky's long expected and lately finished Second Symphony. Furthermore: he will mark the fiftieth anniversary of Mr. Chadwick's début in Boston as composer by a revival of his Sinfonietta of 1906. Skriabin's "Divine Poem" will round the whole—and to Skriabin, by sheer force of devotion, Dr. Koussevitzky can almost persuade an audience.

What could the three possibly have in common, or how coud they even be right foil for each other? The names of the composers raise the question; the actual works give the answer. Beethoven of the Pastoral Symphony is Beethoven almost unique. It is Beethoven objective. The symphony moves along placidly—yes, placidly in spite of the thunder storm. One fairly feels the golden sunlight—[fie]lds perhaps of a yellowish green, [pea]sants, the twittering birds, the [pip]e shepherd, the religious song, [the] incidents against the background [of] peaceful landscape. There is no [str]ing, no self-revelation, no struggle cosmic problems. The mind is [lul]led the contemplation of this landscape upon which it sees these funny [bir]ds now dancing, now caught and [sho]wn in the rain, then piously giving [thanks] that it was no worse; this landscape upon which it hears the equally funny birds; the mind is lulled by the drowsy murmuring brook. For once Beethoven does not harrow the emotions; for once he soothes and quiets and heals. And the conductor gives him his free and gentle way.

One is still purring in the warm sunlight which this music spreads about one. Unless one's day has brought a very particular ax to grind, one is content. One would not, at least not yet, give up this somnolent mood. If only one could bask in the yellow sunshine a monment longer, dream out the dream of those sun-flooded fields. Nine pieces out of ten, indeed ninety-nine out of a hundred, would break in upon the reverie, would shatter the illusion. Dr. Koussevitzy found the hundredth piece which continues just enough of the essence of the mood not to disturb the dreamer, changes it just enough to interest him afresh. Rustic plains now become Olympian fields, funny peasants turn into gods and muses. But the gods (like Beethoven writing his pastoral) are having their day off. Not Olympian dignities and grandeurs are heaped about one. Stravinsky, writing about and for them, is not wracking his brain trying to fathom the unfathomable. The gods and muses are engaged in the pleasures of the dance, and the accommodating and versatile Stravinsky is writing suitable measures for their very human steps. Again the music is objective. Again it moves about in the outskirts of human emotion. Again it reaches the heart only by giving frank pleasure to the senses. After all, why try to "judge" Stravinsky writing in an unaccustomed style, by comparing "Apollo" with earlier works. "Apollo" is a thing in itself, in its way perfect, giving exquisitely its own kind of pleasure—pleasure thrice trebled coming right after that other work of a composer on a holiday from himself, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

But the hearer also would want his "thrill." Sunshine in the meadows of Austria or on the fields adjoining the mountains of the gods could hardly satisfy forever. Was there to be no searching of the heart this evening? Could such searching be subtly joined to the objectivities that had gone before? Along with the many pieces which could not accomplish this end was also at least one which would accomplish it. The hearer was exactly in the proper mellowed mood in which to listen receptively to the murmurings which so slowly and so insinuatingly grew in the heart of Tristan, in the heart of Isolde. It is by no means a far cry from the Epicurean languors of Olympian Dance to the "Slowly and languishingly" of the beginnings of the "Tristan" prelude. It is Wagner then who leads one on and on, deeper and yet more deeply into the recesses and the passions of one's heart. And there comes the thrill which is more than a thrill, which is the sum-total of the heights and the depths of that passion. And by paths well-nigh insensible the evening has gone a long way from the purling brook in the golden landscapes to the searing passion of two of the world's most ardent lovers.

One can only add that performance was superb in the restraint and the evenness of the flat emotional levels of Beethoven, in maintaining the finely chiselled and perfectly polished surfaces of Stravinsky, in the slowly accumulating forces that mounted and mounted, with Wagner, in the all-engulfing final release. Yes, a perfect program, perfectly given.

A. H. M.

The Screen

Trans Apr. 17

More Around Than About "Broadway"

From the Reticent Composer Short-Breathed Interview On His New Piece

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts for the present week-end Dr. Koussevitzky has placed as novelty Samuel Gardner's tone-poem, "Broadway." The performances here will be the first anywhere. The composer is in Boston to conduct this "world-première" He was born in Russia thirty-seven years ago; was brought to this country very young; received his entire education in America. Even in childhood he profited by excellent teachers. His own instrument is the violin. After some preliminary study, begun at the age of seven, he was taken, a ten-year-old, to Felix Winternitz, in Boston, and worked under him for five years. Then he went to New York, to continue his studies with Franz Kneisel through five years more. During the same period he studied theoretical subjects and composition with Dr. Percy Goetschius. Thereafter he went on living and working in New York. Asked for biographical matter, he modestly replied: "Oh, I teach and I give concerts, and I compose and conduct, what more is there to say?"

Other sources fill some of the gaps. . . . In 1918 Mr. Gardner's String Quartet in D minor won the Pulitzer Prize of $1500 awarded by Columbia University. His symphonic poem, "The New Russia," won the Loeb Prize, and has been played by leading American orchestras. He has also written a violin-concerto. As violinist, he has played concertos with various orchestras; was for a time a member of the Letz Quartet. For daily occupation he is now a teacher at the Institute of Musical Art in New York.

About "Broadway," and in an honest reticence, Mr. Gardner was chary of particulars. It was written in 1924 and it is scored for a very large orchestra—three flutes and piccolo; two oboes and English horn; an E-flat clarinet, an A-clarinet, a bass-clarinet; two bassoons and double-bassoon; six horns; three alto saxophones; five trumpets; three trombones and tuba; the usual strings; a battery of percussion to vie with that of Respighi's "Roman Festivals"; two harps and celesta; an organ to point the climax; finally and most unusually, a banjo.

Mr. Gardner affirmed that there was no program other than that indicated by the title. "Anyone who has spent all his life on or near Broadway, will know the program without being told. And for anyone who does not know Broadway a detailed program would be meaningless." The Interviewer was turning the leaves of the huge score as he listened to Mr. Gardner defending his reluctance to explain or comment. As he thus passed the new work in casual review, a sonorous beginning caught his eye, followed by a slight, refreshingly scored waltz section. This developed its climax, then gave way to another tune—"popular," if you will—which went a similar way. Eventually a fox-trot found place. "This seems to be a series of episodes, Mr. Gardner?" "Yes, it is a series of dramatic episodes born of the various phases of life one encounters on Broadway. But those episodes would be hard to name or describe. They are emotion as it is felt. And the emotion is in the music. 'Broadway,' just 'Broadway,' is all the programmatic indication that it is really possible to give."

From glances at the score and from further casual conversation with the composer the Interviewer gathered that Mr. Gardner takes his Broadway seriously. For him, it seems to be synonymous with a rather large cross section of life. "There is jazz, of course," but jazz in this "Broadway" is the merest incident, the Interviewer judged from the manner of the composer. There is flirtation and love. There are the bright lights together with grinding routine. And there were hints of deep tragedy, a crushing hurt somehow connected with Broadway. "When I need an organ to point my climax, something has hit me pretty hard," Mr. Gardner commented. And then back into his shell. "But it is not for us youngsters to talk of what is in our music before we have heard it." And almost shyly: "If I tell a lot of things that are in this piece, and then no one hears or feels those things, people will be justified in laughing at me. Let the music tell it if it can. . . . When I took a piece to Mr. Goetschius as a student, and was all aflame with enthusiasm to tell him about it, he always put his finger over his lips. 'Let me hear what you have written, not what you have to say.' I never learned a better lesson from him."

Another chance remark may be cited: "Why should we youngsters try to talk so much about life" (it was the moment in which the Interviewer gathered that "Broadway" cut rather deeply), "when we are too young to have really lived? When we are old men, if we have discovered that we have something to say, if we have lived interestingly and deeply, then we may be entitled to philosophize about life." Mr. Gardner's very reticences give clues to his work.

The conversation drifted into general lines, about Stravinsky, about the classics. "I thing 'Le Sacre' a very great work. 'Apollon Musagète' I do not know. I have never made it a point to know too much of other people's music. The composer who wants to know intimately all the work of all the great men is very much in danger of falling more or less into the style of previous composers. I have preferred to try to work out my own style without too much study of others." But after a moment, "There is just one man from whom I can't cut loose, and that is Brahms." Then musingly, "Brahms and Bach, they are my two loves. . . . I am going to give a recital of all Bach some time next year."

The Interviewer had returned the score, was standing, prepared to leave. Mr. Gardner's last words were as characteristic as any: "You have looked over the score. Don't say too much. I am not a publicity hound."

A. H. M.

Obiter Dicta

Picked Up Here and There in Recent Talk with Schnabel

WAGNER exploited the great nineteenth-century invention of nervousness. Nervousness was unknown before the nineteenth century. Wagner's music was made possible by this great invention. And as nervousness is something altogether inferior to spirituality, Wagner's music, in comparison with Beethoven's, is cheap. The last of the really great musicians was Schubert.

A MAN knows when he is working in the region of art. A jazz composer, such as Irving Berlin, knows perfectly well that he is not an artist. His ability may be greater than that of some genuine artists, but he knows he is not employing it in the region of art.

MUSIC is the one original contribution that Europe has made to the mind of the world. Painting, sculpture, literature, all existed before. So did science. But music, what we understand by music, is a new thing. It has opened up a world that was never known before. It is very important.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOURNAL & TIMES
MONTGOMERY, ALA.
APR 18 1930

A HOPEFUL SIGN

Among the more interesting items in the news of lesser importance is the great hit made by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra in certain compositions of Brahms in a performance at Carnegie hall, New York city, which the New York Times reviewer describes as among the great climaxes of the season, and in summing up, declares the tumultuous demonstration of the audience, above all, a "testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms." Has the music pendulum at last started back from the jungles? Patient lovers of good music, who have endured the assault on their finer senses and the lowering of standards brought about by the jazz invasion, will hope that it has, and that its swing will restore musical sanity to the masses.

THIS REPUBLICAN OUTLOOK

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Music lovers in Boston and elsewhere will hear with regret of the death at his home in France of Georges Longy, who was first oboe in the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1909 to 1925, and was one of the most distinguished orchestral musicians in the country. While in Boston he formed the Longy club of players on wind instruments which won a high reputation by its concerts of chamber music. He is survived by Mme Longy and by a daughter, Renee Longy-Miquelle, a pianist and teacher, now resident in Philadelphia.

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 16 1930

With the surge and sweep of Ravel's "Bolero," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky still crashing in my ears, I can't begin this column without a word about last week's great concert. I am still bursting with pride in the achievement of the orchestra, the very start of which I remember and which used to delight me in the far away days when the insolent grace of Timothee Adamowski was potent in Boston, and when that slim wisp of fire, Bernhard Listemann, a violinist with a streak of absolute genius, was a leading figure in the world of music. Of course the delight in any music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be all intermingled with the impact of Dr. Koussevitsky's personality, his magnetic, dynamic appeal, his sheer inspired greatness as a conductor. With the little finger of his magic left hand he sweeps his entire orchestra within the arc of a single gesture, his hands plead, encourage, sustain, control, dominate. When I first watched Dr. Koussevitsky conducting his orchestra, sitting close, as I like to be placed, in my beloved front lower box, which brought me within the actual range of the conductor's baton, he semed to me to embody the priesthood of music, differing not only in degree, but in kind, from all the other conductors known to me, having a different approach to his musicians, seeming to radiate an enveloping kindliness. It is amazing to me that any audience can maintain its self control when the "Bolero" is played by the Boston Symphony. Of course, aside from the technical perfection of the playing, the appeal of the "Bolero" is frankly animal, purely sensuous, more than that, purely sensual, but such as it is. I wish it might be my fortune to listen to it, played as I heard it last night, fifty-two times in the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

Mystery About Seats Before Doors Open and Later.

By Alfred Breslaw.

On the evening of April 10, at Carnegie Hall, the public was advised by a sign conspicuously displayed on the steps leading to the lobby that all standing room admissions had been sold out for the concert of the Boston Symphony. This would suggest that seats could not be obtained.

Those greatly desirous of hearing the concert were left to the conscienceless speculators, who were charging 75 cents and $1 above ticket prices.

When the doors were opened, however, standing room and reserved seats were put on sale by the box office.

An investigation would perhaps reveal some much needed light upon a rather hazy situation.

3,951 Gouverneur Ave., Bronx.

P. S.—Time would not permit a longer list of names and addresses than enclosed herewith.

We the undersigned hereby protest against the outrageous discrimination in the matter of ticket distribution for the Boston Symphony concert of April 10:—

Alfred Breslaw, 3,951 Gouverneur Ave., Bronx.
S. L. Bremer, 271 Goldsmith Ave., Newark, N. J.
Louis Clark, 580 W. 170th St.
Mabel Asrus, 1,825 Harrison Ave.
Sara Borden, 2,700 Bronx Park E.
Sam Kass, 1,500 St. John's Pl., Brooklyn.
J. Shliom, 35 W. 16th St.
Mark Shwartz, 1,541 Madison Ave.
M. Vosk, 1,826 Bryant Ave.
J. Skladman, 585 Union Ave.
Felix Schumann, 498 Seventh Ave.
Samuel Baker, 105 W. 112th St.
Max Schulman, 483 E. 96th St., Brooklyn.
Joseph Simonofsky, 483 E. 96th St., Brooklyn.
Louis Weber, 1,916 Eaby Ave., Bronx.
M. Temple, Hotel Manger.
Carl L. Newman, 228 W. 11th St.
Dr. J. Hirsch, 12 Perry St.
Philip Ferguson, 1,771 Madison Ave.
Reuben Dietz, 335 New Lots Ave., Brooklyn.
Julius Rimkat, 1,268 Grant Ave.
Robert Venus, 17-19 E. 107th St.
M. Veinus, 1,524 Saratoga Pl.
A. Powell, 90 Pinehurst Ave.
Mary Grenoble, 111 Bedford St.
A. F. Gagne, 140 E. 46th St.
John B. Gartner, 144 W. 94th St.
Kate Trita, 112 E. 98th St.

Dr. Koussevitzky Balancing Moods

Hrans Apr. 18

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its eighth concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater. The program comprised just three numbers—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon Musagète," the Prelude and "Love-Death" out of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." One pondered chiefly, as one sat listening, upon the happy juxtaposition of the three works. Again and again came the thought that here was a particularly fine example of the high art of program making. To be sure, the mere names, Beethoven, Stravinsky, Wagner, might seem to be merely snatched out of a grab-bag. What could the three possibly have in common, or how coud they even be right foil for each other? The names of the composers raise the question; the actual works give the answer. Beethoven of the Pastoral Symphony is Beethoven almost unique. It is Beethoven objective. The symphony moves along placidly—yes, placidly in spite of the thunder storm. One fairly feels the golden sunlight—upon fields perhaps of a yellowish green. The peasants, the twittering birds, the storm, the shepherd, the religious song, are but incidents against the background of this peaceful landscape. There is no soul-painting, no self-revelation, no struggle with cosmic problems. The mind is at rest in the contemplation of this landscape upon which it sees these funny peasants, now dancing, now caught and drenched in the rain, then piously giving thanks that it was no worse; this landscape upon which it hears the equally funny birds; the mind is lulled by the drowsy murmuring brook. For once Beethoven does not harrow the emotions; for once he soothes and quiets and heals. And the conductor gives him his free and gentle way.

One is still purring in the warm sunlight which this music spreads about one. Unless one's day has brought a very particular ax to grind, one is content. One would not, at least not yet, give up this somnolent mood. If only one could bask in the yellow sunshine a monment longer, dream out the dream of those sun-flooded fields. Nine pieces out of ten, indeed ninety-nine out of a hundred, would break in upon the reverie, would shatter the illusion. Dr. Koussevitzy found the hundredth piece which continues just enough of the essence of the mood not to disturb the dreamer, changes it just enough to interest him afresh. Rustic plains now become Olympian fields, funny peasants turn into gods and muses. But the gods (like Beethoven writing his pastoral) are having their day off. Not Olympian dignities and grandeurs are heaped about one. Stravinsky, writing about and for them, is not wracking his brain trying to fathom the unfathomable. The gods and muses are engaged in the pleasures of the dance, and the accommodating and versatile Stravinsky is writing suitable measures for their very human steps. Again the music is objective. Again it moves about in the outskirts of human emotion. Again it reaches the heart only by giving frank pleasure to the senses. After all, why try to "judge" Stravinsky writing in an unaccustomed style, by comparing "Apollo" with earlier works. "Apollo" is a thing in itself, in its way perfect, giving exquisitely its own kind of pleasure—pleasure thrice trebled coming right after that other work of a composer on a holiday from himself, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

But the hearer also would want his "thrill." Sunshine in the meadows of Austria or on the fields adjoining the mountains of the gods could hardly satisfy forever. Was there to be no searching of the heart this evening? Could such searching be subtly joined to the objectivities that had gone before? Along with the many pieces which could not accomplish this end was also at least one which would accomplish it. The hearer was exactly in the proper mellowed mood in which to listen receptively to the murmurings which so slowly and so insinuatingly grew in the heart of Tristan, in the heart of Isolde. It is by no means a far cry from the Epicurean languors of Olympian Dance to the "Slowly and languishingly" of the beginnings of the "Tristan" prelude. It is Wagner then who leads one on and on, deeper and yet more deeply into the recesses and the passions of one's heart. And there comes the thrill which is more than a thrill, which is the sum-total of the heights and the depths of that passion. And by paths well-nigh insensible the evening has gone a long way from the purling brook in the golden landscapes to the searing passion of two of the world's most ardent lovers.

One can only add that performance was superb in the restraint and the evenness of the flat emotional levels of Beethoven, in maintaining the finely chiselled and perfectly polished surfaces of Stravinsky, in the slowly accumulating forces that mounted and mounted, with Wagner, in the all-engulfing final release. Yes, a perfect program, perfectly given.

A. H. M.

cooking at this season, are 18 cents a pound; McIntosh reds 75 cents a doz
Delicious 85 cents a dozen. Bananas, yellow 75 cents a dozen. Bananas, wineaps cents a dozen, red 75 cents a doz (Grapefruit 15-25 cents each. Calif oranges 75 cents to $1.20 a dozen. Flor 50 cents a dozen. Lemons 50 cents dozen. Red Grapes 35 cents a pou white Grapes 50 cents a pound; impor hothouse Grapes $1.50 a pound. Pe
$1.50 a dozen; anjou pears, $1

...reen

More Around Than About "Broadway"

From the Reticent Composer Short-Breathed Interview On His New Piece

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts for the present week-end Dr. Koussevitzky has placed as novelty Samuel Gardner's tone-poem, "Broadway." The performances here will be the first anywhere. The composer is in Boston to conduct this "world-première" He was born in Russia thirty-seven years ago; was brought to this country very young; received his entire education in America. Even in childhood he profited by excellent teachers. His own instrument is the violin. After some preliminary study, begun at the age of seven, he was taken, a ten-year-old, to Felix Winternitz, in Boston, and worked under him for five years. Then he went to New York, to continue his studies with Franz Kneisel through five years more. During the same period he studied theoretical subjects and composition with Dr. Percy Goetschius. Thereafter he went on living and working in New York. Asked for biographical matter, he modestly replied: "Oh, I teach and I give concerts, and I compose and conduct, what more is there to say?"

Other sources fill some of the gaps. . . . In 1918 Mr. Gardner's String Quartet in D minor won the Pulitzer Prize of $1500 awarded by Columbia University. His symphonic poem, "The New Russia," won the Loeb Prize, and has been played by leading American orchestras. He has also written a violin-concerto. As violinist, he has played concertos with various orchestras; was for a time a member of the Letz Quartet. For daily occupation he is now a teacher at the Institute of Musical Art in New York.

About "Broadway," and in an honest reticence, Mr. Gardner was chary of particulars. It was written in 1924 and it is scored for a very large orchestra—three flutes and piccolo; two oboes and English horn; an E-flat clarinet, an A-clarinet, a bass-clarinet; two bassoons and double-bassoon; six horns; three alto saxophones; five trumpets; three trombones and tuba; the usual strings; a battery of percussion to vie with that of Respighi's "Roman Festivals"; two harps and celesta; an organ to point the climax; finally and most unusually, a banjo.

Mr. Gardner affirmed that there was no program other than that indicated by the title. "Anyone who has spent all his life on or near Broadway, will know the program without being told. And for anyone who does not know Broadway a detailed program would be meaningless." The Interviewer was turning the leaves of the huge score as he listened to Mr. Gardner defending his reluctance to explain or comment. As he thus passed the new work in casual review, a sonorous beginning caught his eye, followed by a slight, refreshingly scored waltz section. This developed its climax, then gave way to another tune—"popular,' if you will—which went a similar way. Eventually a fox-trot found place. "This seems to be a series of episodes, Mr. Gardner?" "Yes, it is a series of dramatic episodes born of the various phases of life one encounters on Broadway. But those episodes would be hard to name or describe. They are emotion as it is felt. And the emotion is in the music. 'Broadway,' just 'Broadway,' is all the programmatic indication that it is really possible to give."

From glances at the score and from further casual conversation with the composer the Interviewer gathered that Mr. Gardner takes his Broadway seriously. For him, it seems to be synonymous with a rather large cross section of life. "There is jazz, of course," but jazz in this "Broadway" is the merest incident, the Interviewer judged from the manner of the composer. There is flirtation and love. There are the bright lights together with grinding routine. And there were hints of deep tragedy, a crushing hurt somehow connected with Broadway. "When I need an organ to point my climax, something has hit me pretty hard," Mr. Gardner commented. And then back into his shell. "But it is not for us youngsters to talk of what is in our music before we have heard it." And almost shyly: "If I tell a lot of things that are in this piece, and then no one hears or feels those things, people will be justified in laughing at me. Let the music tell it if it can. . . . When I took a piece to Mr. Goetschius as a student, and was all aflame with enthusiasm to tell him about it, he always put his finger over his lips, 'Let me hear what you have written, not what you have to say.' I never learned a better lesson from him."

Another chance remark may be cited: "Why should we youngsters try to talk so much about life" (it was the moment in which the Interviewer gathered that "Broadway" cut rather deeply), "when we are too young to have really lived? When we are old men, if we have discovered that we have something to say, if we have lived interestingly and deeply, then we may be entitled to philosophize about life." Mr. Gardner's very reticences give clues to his work.

The conversation drifted into general lines, about Stravinsky, about the classics. "I thing 'Le Sacre' a very great work. 'Apollon Musagète' I do not know. I have never made it a point to know too much of other people's music. The composer who wants to know intimately all the work of all the great men is very much in danger of falling more or less into the style of previous composers. I have preferred to try to work out my own style without too much study of others." But after a moment, "There is just one man from whom I can't cut loose, and that is Brahms." Then musingly, "Brahms and Bach, they are my two loves. . . . I am going to give a recital of all Bach some time next year."

The Interviewer had returned the score, was standing, prepared to leave. Mr. Gardner's last words were as characteristic as any: "You have looked over the score. Don't say too much. I am not a publicity hound."

A. H. M.

Obiter Dicta

Picked Up Here and There in Recent Talk with Schnabel

WAGNER exploited the great nineteenth-century invention of nervousness. Nervousness was unknown before the nineteenth century. Wagner's music was made possible by this great invention. And as nervousness is something altogether inferior to spirituality, Wagner's music, in comparison with Beethoven's, is cheap. The last of the really great musicians was Schubert.

A MAN knows when he is working in the region of art. A jazz composer, such as Irving Berlin, knows perfectly well that he is not an artist. His ability may be greater than that of some genuine artists, but he knows he is not employing it in the region of art.

MUSIC is the one original contribution that Europe has made to the mind of the world. Painting, sculpture, literature, all existed before. So did science. But music, what we understand by music, is a new thing. It has opened up a world that was never known before. It is very important.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOURNAL & TIMES
MONTGOMERY, ALA.
APR 18 1930

A HOPEFUL SIGN

Among the more interesting items in the news of lesser importance is the great hit made by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra in certain compositions of Brahms in a performance at Carnegie hall, New York city, which the New York Times reviewer describes as among the great climaxes of the season, and in summing up, declares the tumultuous demonstration of the audience, above all, a "testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms." Has the music pendulum at last started back from the jungles? Patient lovers of good music, who have endured the assault on their finer senses and the lowering of standards brought about by the jazz invasion, will hope that it has, and that its swing will restore musical sanity to the masses.

THIS REPUBLICAN OUTLOOK

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Music lovers in Boston and elsewhere will hear with regret of the death at his home in France of Georges Longy, who was first oboe in the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1909 to 1925, and was one of the most distinguished orchestral musicians in the country. While in Boston he formed the Longy club of players on wind instruments which won a high reputation by its concerts of chamber music. He is survived by Mme Longy and by a daughter, Renee Longy-Miquelle, a pianist and teacher, now resident in Philadelphia.

Herald

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1930

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses"; Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" (first performance, conducted by the composer); Saint-Saens's Symphony C minor, No. 3 op. 78 (with organ).

"Broadway" was composed in 1924. There is no sub-title to the work; no argument; no explanatory note about the character of the music. Mr. Gardner, a sensible and modest man, wrote to us that he does not like to talk about his music before it is performed. "My piece is not built on my program, but comes out of the emotions; emotions are purely personal affairs and are not good to discuss publicly. Then, again, a piece can mean a different thing to each individual. I would always say, let's hear it first."

In this instance "Broadway" may picture the street, express the spirit of its life, or even the spirit of New York (Harlem included and indeed, prominent). It is not the street that William Horace Lingard had in mind when he sang "Walking Down Broadway"; not the Broadway in the shadows of which N. P. Willis met the outcast woman that inspired his sentimental verses; not the Broadway on which Vance Thompson walked with the ghost of Edgar Allan Poe; nor Walt Whitman's Broadway of the Pageant: the poem suggested by the envoys from Niphon: "Courteous, the swart-cheek'd two-sworded envoys, Leaning back in their open barouches, bare-headed, impassive";
in whose honor "million-footed Manhattan serpent descends to her pavements." The Broadway of the roaring forties, the Great White Way so graphically described by Paul Morand, the spectacular, crashing, stimulating, distracting street, this seems to be the source of Mr. Gardner's inspiration, or he may look on Broadway as the symbol of America's jazz decade.

His music is panoramic, with a constant return to the most vivid of the pictures; yet it cannot be called wholly exterior music, for it has personal intensity. There is at times a flamboyancy about it indispensable to the subject; one might say there is also the expression of the civic boastfulness, the craze for amusement, the turning of night into day, the contempt for quiet methods of business; the apotheosis of materialism. There is at times thematically and harmonically welcome strains of sensuousness, and just before the final reckless outburst—which in spite of its fury is the least effective portion of the work, for there has been a too long succession of climaxes without satisfactory relief — there are strangely fascinating measures, as though the revelling were at an end; the street now peaceful, thoughtful, brooding. With these measures the symphonic poem—the musical panorama—what you will—should have closed. The final and commonplace dinr destroyed what would have been a poetic, haunting ending.

It is a pleasure to note that Mr. Gardner's jazz is not sandpapered and polished. Jazz does not allow sophistication. It should suggest the Congo; not the Conservatory. The work would gain by condensation; there is too little of the element of surprise; too few strongly contrasting sections; yet the composer might answer, if they were present, the music would not be Broadway, the mad street of the tumultuous city.

In recent years the amazing Stravinsky has attempted, not with great success, to go back to Bach; more fortunate in his return to Handel as in "Oedipus," still later favoring Tchaikovsky; and in "Apollo" having in mind the French ballets of the 18th century. It is not necessary to say that this music of "Apollo" would make a deeper impression if it accompanied the mimes and dancers. Stravinsky did not wish to make a "deep" impression. If he had wished it, he would have been false to the tradition he would follow. Furthermore, seeing a performance of dancers, one often forgets to hear the music. The sections are all interesting; some of the pages have genuine beauty in an uncommon form.

Of course the sonority of Saint-Saens's Finale, with the vociferous brass instruments, the frenzied strings, the wood-wind doing its utmost to have its say—all working in the "Hooray-boys" spirit excited thunderous applause; but there were many features of the performance before the Finale that deserved warm, if less demonstrative appreciation. The orchestra and the organ were in just proportion, which is not always the case; there were niceties in detail that would have satisfied even the not too easily pleased composer. He probably would have suggested that the long cantilena for the violins with organ accompaniment should have been taken at a little quicker pace. The long milodic line otherwise narrowly escapes sagging.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Dukelsky, Symphony No. 2, D flat major (first performance). Chadwick, Sinfonietta in D major. Scriabin, Symphony No. 3 "The Divine Poem."

LIGHTER MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Gardner's "Broadway" Played for First Time

Post Apr 19

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the Symphony Concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening Dr. Koussevitzky prepared what he is unofficially said to have described as an Easter programme, in which the festive, rather than the more solemn, aspects of the season were suggested. The cynic might have called it a programme of music for the unmusical.

But, in any event, the audience of yesterday, in which were to be seen many unfamiliar faces, from first to last enjoyed it greatly.

ONE FIRST PERFORMANCE

There are but three pieces on this list of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," for string orchestra; Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," in its first performance anywhere and conducted by the composer; and Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, for orchestra with organ.

When Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete'" was first played here in the autumn of 1928 the music intrigued by reason of its utter unlikeness to any then known product of its author. But it hardly gains on renewed acquaintance. Its blandness, its innocuous melodiousness, suggestive in turn of the formal pomps of Lully, the saccharinities of Bellini, the graces of Chaminade and the showy brilliance of Delibes, become when the music is heard for a third time a trifle wearisome.

Gardner's "Broadway"

Although Mr. Gardner's "Broadway" has no published programme its purport and message seem definite enough. Quite obviously this young Russian-born but thoroughly Americanized composer would depict in this, the first of his orchestral pieces to be heard in Boston, not only the glitter and lure of the bright lights, the hurly-burly of Times square and the music of the American people at play; he would also hint at the undercurrent of sadness, of nostalgia even the tragedy that may underlie the feverish gaiety of a modern metropolis.

The scheme, if a bit unsubtle, is not without its potentialities for effective musical treatment, but Mr. Gardner, it would seem, has not as yet the musical resourcefulness to bring it to wholly successful and convincing fruition. The note of sadness; the hinto of tragedy, he does achieve in measure. But his jazz, which by right should have been either super-jazz or jazz fantastically parodied, proved for the most part to be merely ordinary jazz, no better and no worse than most of that which comes over the radio or enlivens our lighter lyric theatres and dance halls. And there is too much of it. Mr. Gardner has written for the most part a sort of jazz fantasia for full orchestra. Yet it is easy to believe that he had in mind something more distinctive.

The Organ Symphony

With searching analysis Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has called Saint-Saens "a baffling, and even a pathetic, figure, in view of the absence of that conviction in utterance which produces a true classicist, and in the incommensurability of his rare technical resources and their expressive result." And nowhere does he appear in this light so clearly as in this symphony of yesterday. But for all its cold precision, its hollow artificiality, this symphony is still effective, in the conventional sense, through most of its course.

The not-too-exacting listener will still enjoy the suave, quasi-religious Adagio, still respond to the ad captandum close with its shrilling trumpets, its cumulative sonorities of orchestra and organ.

NEW TONE POEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Gardner's "Broadway"

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony and Stravinsky's "Apollo" on Program

Globe Apr 19

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was a tone poem by Samuel Gardner, entitled "Broadway," which the composer conducted brilliantly. It won and deserved applause markedly more cordial than is given to most new music by Boston Symphony subscribers. Dr Koussevitzky conducted Stravinsky's "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," first performed here in 1928, and Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony.

Mr Gardner, born in Russia in 1893, was brought as a child of six to Providence. He studied violin and composition in Boston and in New York, where he now resides. Well known as a concert violinist, he has also written several prize winning compositions.

"Broadway," composed in 1924, and, according to the program book, performed yesterday for the first time, is not, according to Mr Gardner, "built on any program." "My piece," he writes, "comes out of the emotions; emotions are purely personal affairs, and are not good to discuss publicly. Then again, a piece can mean a different thing to each individual." The title is the only clue vouchsafed as to what Mr Gardner had in mind. But many listeners no doubt amused themselves by choosing subtitles to characterize the various episodes.

One wondered why so striking and individual a piece as "Broadway" should have had to wait six years for its first performance. Was it, as some American musicians would allege, because the conductors of our leading orchestras are less kindly disposed to the work of American composers than they are to the compositions of Europeans?

Or was it merely because Mr Gardner demanded an unusually large orchestra, including, for instance, five trumpets, three alto saxophones, banjo, and a great array of percussion instruments?

Or was it because neither the composer nor anyone else was prepared to meet the considerable expense of copying the parts of a work still in manuscript? Some benefactor ought to provide a fund which should save American composers from paying for this costly copying out of their own pockets.

Mr Gardner in "Broadway" uses the rhythms and the tone color of American popular music with notable success. He comes as near as anyone has yet done to solving the problem of writing symphonic jazz. His score avoids the excessive polyphony of Carpenter and Copland, wisely shuns the overrefinement of Ravel and Stravinsky, and seldom lapses into the banality of the ordinary jazz piece.

Mr Gardner has kept the rhythmic vitality and not a little of the brilliant sonorities that fascinate so many serious musicans when they lsten to well-played jazz. Of all the countless attempts at "hghbrow jazz" made in the past decade only Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue," and the unjustly neglected "Clowns" of Charles Martin Loeffler, written for Leo Reisman, seem comparable in merit to "Broadway."

"Broadway" is not slavishly imitative of jazz. In its most effective episode, for instance, the organ is the chief, almost the only instrument used. Mr Gardner has assimilated the musical idiom of the present century; and blended its component elements; of which, even in America, jazz is only one, into a personal and authoritative style. He had something deeply felt and vividly imagined to say, and he has said it with a good deal of eloquence. The only real fault with "Broadway" is that it is too long, and too episodic. If the piece were condensed, the remarkably impressive final climax would gain in power.

There is no need to comment at length on Saint-Saens' grandiose symphony, theatrical music in the bad sense of the term, and yesterday played overemphatically. Stravinsky's "Apollo" still seemed relatively sterile, compared to his "Oedipus," or to the piano concerto, the works most like it in style. But one noticed at a second hearing more than before how very subtly it is written, despite its apparent simplicity.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 19 1930

87

Gardner's 'Broadway' Given On Hub Symphony Program

Providence Man's Tone Poem Wins Applause in First Performance

SAMUEL GARDNER.

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program at Symphony Hall, Boston, was a tone poem by Samuel Gardner, entitled "Broadway," which the composer conducted brilliantly. It won and deserved applause margedly more cordial than is given to most new music by Boston Symphony subscribers. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Stravinsky's "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," first performed here in 1923, and Caint-Saens's Organ Symphony.

Mr. Gardner, born in Russia in 1893, was brought as a child of six to Providence. He studied violin and composition in Boston and in New York, where he now resides. Well known as a concert violinist, he has also written several prize winning compositions.

The following story of the performance appeared today in the Boston Globe, written by P. R., the newspaper's musical critic.

"Broadway," composed in 1924, and, according to the program book, performed yesterday for the first time, is not, according to Mr. Gardner, "bpilt on any program." "My piece," he writes, "comes out of the emotions; emotions are purely personal affairs, and are not good to discuss publicly. Then again, a piece can mean a different thing to each individual." The title is the only clue vouchsafed as to what Mr. Gardner had in mind. But many listeners no doubt amused themselves by choosing subtitles to characterize the various episodes.

One wondered why so striking and individual a piece as "Broadway" should have had to wait six years for its first performance. Was it, as some American musicians would allege, because the conductors of our leading orchestras are less kindly disposed to the work of American composers than they are to the compositions of Europeans?

Or was it merely because Mr. Gardner demanded an unusually large orchestra, including, for instance, five trumpets, three alto saxophones, banjo and a great array of percussion instruments?

Or was it because neither the composer nor anyone else was prepared to meet the considerable expense of copying the parts of a work still in manuscript? Some benefactor ought to provide a fund which should save American composers from paying for this costly copying out of their own pockets.

Mr. Gardner in "Broadway" uses the rhythms and the tone color of American popular music with notable success. He comes as near as anyone has yet to solving the problem of writing symphonic jaz. His score avoids the excessive polyphony of Carpenter and Copland, wisely shuns the over-refinement of Ravel and Stravinsky, and seldom lapses into the banality of the ordinary jazz piece.

Mr. Gardner has kept the rhythmic vitality and not a little of the brilliant sonorities that fascinate so many serious musicians when they listen to well-played jazz. Of all the countless attempts at "highbrow jazz" made in the past decade only Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue," and the unjustly neglected "Clowns" of Charles Martin Loeffler, written for Leo Reisman, seem comparable in merit to "Broadway."

"Broadway" is not slavishly imitative of jazz. In its most effective episode, for instance, the organ is the chief, almost the only instrument used. Mr. Gardner has assimilated the musical idiom of the present century; and blended its component elements; of which, even in America, jazz is only one, into a personal and authoritative style. He had something deeply felt and vividly imagined to say, and he has said it with a good deal of eloquence. The only real fault, with "Broadway" is that it is too long, and too episodic. If the piece were condensed, the remarkably impressive final climax would gain in power.

There is no need to comment at length on Saint-Saens' grandiose symphony, theatrical music in the bad sense of the term, and yesterday played overemphatically. Stravinsky's "Apollo" still seemed relatively sterile, compared to his "Oedipus," or to the piano concerto, the works most like it in style. But one noticed at a second hearing more than before how very subtly it is written, despite its apparent simplicity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Gardner's "Broadway" Played

BOSTON, April 18.—Samuel Gardner conducted the first public performance of his score "Broadway" at this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Ochestra in Symphony Hall. The composer introduces saxophones and other jazz instruments in his score, which is of symphonic proportions, and was greeted with prolonged applause. Mr. Gardner, who is a native of Russia and lives in New York, is well known as a composer and violinist.

GARDNER LEADS OWN WORK.

New York Violinist Offers "Broadway" With Boston Orchestra.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 18.—Samuel Gardner, New York violinist and member of the faculty of the Musical Art Institute, conducted the first public performance of his own orchestral score, "Broadway," this afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work employs saxophones and jazz instruments in symphonic manner and proportion. The reception was warm.

Mr. Gardner was born in Russia and studied violin under Felix Winternitz of Boston and Franz Kneisel of New York. A few years ago he played his own violin concerto with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Willem Mengelberg. Of his shorter compositions, his violin solo, "In the Canebrake," is perhaps best known.

88

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR

An Imported Pianist

Importing a pianist for two appearances is a thing an orchestra rarely does. Therefore, when the Boston Symphony appeared last week in New York with Arthur Schnabel presented to play two piano concertos on the all-Brahms programs we wondered at Manager William Brennan's sudden extravagance.

After these performances, in which Conductor Koussevitzky displayed so much tenseness and staccato that one's nerves were left quivering, it was quite apparent that Schnabel fitted into the scheme of things in an eminent degree. For it would be difficult to imagine a more aggressive and physically brilliant playing of the Brahms B flat and the Brahms D minor concertos. Suavity and beauty of tone one never expects from Schnabel, and the absence of these qualities was consequently not disappointing.

But the minority listeners who did not feel compensated in Schnabel's accomplishments—among whom I was one—were made to feel out of place by the enthusiasm of the majority auditors who applauded the stocky, business looking Schnabel until their palms must have ached.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

NEW HAVENERS REMEMBER IT, TOO

(E. N. C. In Hartford Courant.)

With the surge and sweep of Ravel's "Bolero," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky, still crashing in my ears, I can't began this column without a word about last week's great concert. I am so bursting with pride in the achievement of the orchestra, the very start of which I remember and which used to delight me in the far away days when the insolent grace of Timothee Adamowski was potent in Boston, and when that slim wisp of fire, Bernhard Listemann, a violinist with a streak of absolute genius, was a leading figure in the world of music. Of course the delight in any music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be all intermingled with the impact of Dr. Koussevitsky's personality, his magnetic, dynamic appeal, his sheer inspired greatness as a conductor. With the little finger of his magic left hand he sweeps his entire orchestra within the arc of a single gesture, his hands plead, encourage, sustain, control, dominate. When I first watched Dr. Koussevitsky conducting his orchestra, sitting close, as I like to be placed, in my beloved front lower box, which brought me within the actual range of the conductor's baton, he seemed to me to embody the priesthood of music, differing not only in degree, but in kind, from all the other conductors known to me, having a different approach to his musicians, seeming to radiate an enveloping kindliness. It is amazing to me that any audience can maintain its self control when the "Bolero" is played by the Boston Symphony. Of course, aside from the technical perfection of the playing, the appeal of the "Bolero" is frankly animal, purely sensuous, more than that, purely sensual, but such as it is, I wish it might be my fortune to listen to it, played as I heard it last night, fifty-two times in the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LEADER

Expert Bans Evils in Piano Recital

NEW YORK—Experiments in the form of the piano concerto have been made by a number of modern composers. The discrepancy between the tone of the stringed instruments of the orchestra and the percussion of the piano has always seemed irreconcilable, but several composers of the post-Tschaikowsky era have attempted to bring them together.

Among the suggested cures, the elimination of the famed cadenza has been tried. This form of piano solioquy, thrown intto he center of an otherwise integrated piece of music, has always caused a break. Beethoven has been guilty along with the others. The alternating playing of orchestra and piano, the one silent while the other plays has also been removed. The predominance of one over the other has been toned down.

Yet after all these remedies, we could not help feeling astonished when we heard Arthur Schnabel play the Brahms second concerto with the Boston symphony last week. Here was a concerto that sounded as none other and as never before. We had heard several performances of it but never one in which the two elements were so well combined, and the result was a piano concerto with all the evils removed and a startling piece of music revealed.

With the years Brahms has come more and more to be recognized as the towering musical figure of the latter part of the last century. From an earlier conception of him as a dry-as-dust composer he is now recognized as possessing those peculiar qualities of humility and greatness that make genius. His concertos and symphonies contain more than an average of importance and food for study and thought.

This second cencerto fills every requirement of the ideal concerto. And in the same light we felt that evening that Mr. Schnabel and the Boston possess every qualification to give it its best interpretation. Together they made a memorable performance. Mr. Schnabel is not a sentimental pianist. He delineates his measures rather accurately and his effects are intentional. But Brahms is not a sentimental composer in spite of the effort of many conductors to make him one, and here is a pianist brave enough not to put a throb in every measure.

He has been criticized for it, but we feel, without justification. He reserves his poetry for the proper places, and it seems twice as poetic by contrast. We do not see, for example, that the first movement of this concerto calls for anything but an intelligent massing of detail and ideas. Brahms is a brainy composer, and his ideas require just the clarification that Schnabel gives them. This does not mean that his phrasing or intonation are hard. Quite the contrary, we felt them to be beautifully turned, with the purposeful art of the Greek sculptor.

All-Russian Program.

In such fitting fashion did the Boston symphony end its New York season. There was no curtain speech by Koussevitsky other than the eloquent closing notes of the Fourth Brahms symphony, which closed this all-Brahms program. And the echoing applause that greeted the concert gave no indication of boredom on the part of

THURSDAY, APRIL 24, 1930

MUSIC

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

Herald

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin were the conductors. The program was as follows: Beethoven, First Movement of the Fifth Symphony. Haydn, Finale of Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call); Ravel, "Beauty and Beast" from "Mother Goose." Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel." Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries." Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks, giving the necessary information about the pieces in a clear and interesting manner. His telling the story of "Beauty and the Beast" with the accompanying amusing pictures on the screen aided greatly in the children's enjoyment of Ravel's charming music. There were pictures for the other compositions. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the music by Strauss and Wagner; Mr. Burgin the other numbers.

As the children were entering Symphony hall, other children were skipping the rope near the door. One might have asked whether those entering envied those in joyful exercise; or whether the rope-skippers wished that they, too, could enter. Children do not invariably appreciate what are loosely described as educational advantages. Too much stress, by the way, is put on music as an educational force. Possibly some of the contemporaneous compositions being purely cerebral, or reminding one of the Pythagorean theory of music, might be called educational—at least its admirers hope that the general public will be educated up to this advanced art, but the music played yesterday appealed to the emotions and the fancy. And so the children, not unduly impressed by the name of Beethoven, did not sit reverentially as in a concert of prayer, but honestly enjoyed what they heard with their ears. They also enjoyed the skill of the soloists in Haydn's Variations and Mr. Piller's double bassoon voicing the amorous pleading of the Beast. They would have gladly joined with Till in his merry pranks; they mourned his fate when he was brought to judgment by stern men without a sense of humor; and at the end the children rode gaily with the Valkyries. Truly a real entertainment. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Dr Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin Conduct

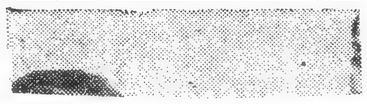
Globe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its final pair for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall to a large and enthusiastic audience, in which pupils of high school age were the most numerous group. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducted the first three numbers, the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the finale from Haydn's symphony, "With the Horn Call," and "Beauty and the Beast," from Ravel's "Mother Goose." In the last named selection the solo for contrabassoon was played by Boaz Piller.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." There were brief remarks and stereopticon slides by Alfred H. Meyer. This program will be repeated today at 4 p m.

What the youthful audience seemed to enjoy most was Ravel's whimsical conversation between Beauty and the Beast, in which the Beast is represented by the contrabassoon, an instrument almost irresistibly comic. Mr Meyer chose slides by an admirable French illustrator for the familiar fairy tale. His remarks were, as throughout the program, informative without being dull or pedantic.

One wondered whether so lengthy and heavy a tone poem as "Till Eulenspiegel" must seem to unpracticed ears was well placed on the program. The Beethoven and Haydn symphonic movements had already sufficiently taxed the audience to enjoy elaborate pieces. Would not a waltz by Johann Strauss have been preferable at this point? Otherwise, program and performance seemed well suited to the aim of these concerts, which is to interest young people in the best orchestral music.



Hans Gram 25

Music in the Museum

Verses from Elizabeth Borton Suggested by a Recent Concert

A RUSH of music from the distant orchestra
Flowing through the crowded galleries,
Even to the little room
Where Javanese goddesses
Stand serenely, curving flower-like hands,
The jewels in the ears
Of a tiny Ball dancer
Tremble in the stream of sound;
And all enveloped in the dark tides
Of Isolt's ravaged passion,
Budda sits, undisturbed,
With half-closed eyes,
Faintly smiling.

SDAY, APRIL 24, 1930 Post

YOUNG PEOPLE HEAR CONCERT

Show Pleasure at Strauss and Wagner Numbers

The Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, to be repeated today without change in the programme at the same hour, 4 o'clock. As at the pair of similar concerts earlier this season, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, shared the conducting, and as on other recent occasions of this sort Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks illustrated with stereopticon slides. The audience was of good size, although the hall was not completely filled.

To Mr. Burgin fell the task of leading the orchestra through the first movement of Beethoven's First Symphony, the final movement of a Symphony in G major by Haydn, and the dialogues of Beauty and the Beast from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, while Dr. Koussevitzky led the performances of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

Whether it was the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky or the appeal of the music itself, the pieces by Strauss and Wagner seemed yesterday to please the youthful audience more than did the other numbers. Mr. Meyer's lantern slides were judiciously, often felicitously selected, and his comments were both apt and illuminating, entertaining as well as instructive. The youngsters were particularly intrigued by the lantern-slide which showed a collection of the ear-trumpets used by Beethoven through the years of his deafness.

Valenski, New Captain of Harvard Freshmen

At a meeting of the members of the Harvard freshman baseball squad yesterday afternoon, James T. Valenski was selected to lead the first year Cantabrigians in the remainder of their games. Valenski hails from Suffield, Conn., and prepared [illegible]

reen

Hans Gram 25

Restored Pops?

A Hint from Arthur Fiedler's First Program

THOSE who would have the Pop Concerts "what they used to be" may take heart and find pleasure in the list of pieces announced by Mr. Fiedler for the "opening night" of Wednesday, May 7. It contains nearly all the old ingredients—introductory march; operatic overture and operatic fantasia; dance-tunes; fragment from Wagner; potpourri from a musical play of the better sort; amiable trifles; the "sensation," not too heavy, from the ended symphonic season. Once more, seemingly, the light-minded and the musically loafing are to have their way with The Pops, as indeed they should. Here is the program:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes....R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine-Journey from "Götterdämmerung".....Wagner
Tambourin Chinois.....Kreisler
Bolero.....Ravel
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
Whispering Flowers.....Bion American Fantasy.....Herbert

88

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 20 1930

An Imported Pianist

Importing a pianist for two appearances is a thing an orchestra rarely does. Therefore, when the Boston Symphony appeared last week in New York with Arthur Schnabel presented to play two piano concertos on the all-Brahms programs we wondered at Manager William Brennan's sudden extravagance.

After these performances, in which Conductor Koussevitzky displayed so much tenseness and staccato that one's nerves were left quivering, it was quite apparent that Schnabel fitted into the scheme of things in an eminent degree. For it would be difficult to imagine a more aggressive and physically brilliant playing of the Brahms B flat and the Brahms D minor concertos. Suavity and beauty of tone one never expects from Schnabel, and the absence of these qualities was consequently not disappointing.

But the minority listeners who did not feel compensated in Schnabel's accomplishments—among whom I was one—were made to feel out of place by the enthusiasm of the majority auditors who applauded the stocky, business looking Schnabel until their palms must have ached.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

NEW HAVENERS REMEMBER IT, TOO

(E. N. C. In Hartford Courant.)

With the surge and sweep of Ravel's "Bolero," as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky, still crashing in my ears, I can't began this column without a word about last week's great concert. I am so bursting with pride in the achievement of the orchestra, the very start of which I remember and which used to delight me in the far away days when the insolent grace of Timothee Adamowski was potent in Boston, and when that slim wisp of fire, Bernhard Listemann, a violinist with a streak of absolute genius, was a leading figure in the world of music. Of course the delight in any music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be all intermingled with the impact of Dr. Koussevitsky's personality, his magnetic, dynamic appeal, his sheer inspired greatness as a conductor. With the little finger of his magic left hand he sweeps his entire orchestra within the arc of a single gesture, his hands plead, encourage, sustain, control, dominate. When I first watched Dr. Koussevitsky conducting his orchestra, sitting close, as I like to be placed, in my beloved front lower box, which brought me within the actual range of the conductor's baton, he seemed to me to embody the priesthood of music, differing not only in degree, but in kind, from all the other conductors known to me, having a different approach to his musicians, seeming to radiate an enveloping kindliness. It is amazing to me that any audience can maintain its self control when the "Bolero" is played by the Boston Symphony. Of course, aside from the technical perfection of the playing, the appeal of the "Bolero" is frankly animal, purely sensuous, more than that, purely sensual, but such as it is, I wish it might be my fortune to listen to it, played as I heard it last night, fifty-two times in the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LEADER
APR 22 1930

Expert Bans Evils in Piano Recital

NEW YORK—Experiments in the form of the piano concerto have been made by a number of modern composers. The discrepancy between the tone of the stringed instruments of the orchestra and the percussion of the piano has always seemed irreconcilable, but several composers of the post-Tschaikowsky era have attempted to bring them together.

Among the suggested cures, the elimination of the famed cadenza has been tried. This form of piano solioquy, thrown intto he center of an otherwise integrated piece of music, has always caused a break. Beethoven has been guilty along with the others. The alternating playing of orchestra and piano, the one silent while the other plays has also been removed. The predominance of one over the other has been toned down.

Yet after all these remedies, we could not help feeling astonished when we heard Arthur Schnabel play the Brahms second concerto with the Boston symphony last week. Here was a concerto that sounded as none other and as never before. We had heard several performances of it but never one in which the two elements were so well combined, and the result was a piano concerto with all the evils removed and a startling piece of music revealed.

With the years Brahms has come more and more to be recognized as the towering musical figure of the latter part of the last century. From an earlier conception of him as a dry-as-dust composer he is now recognized as possessing those peculiar qualities of humility and greatness that make genius. His concertos and symphonies contain more than an average of importance and food for study and thought.

This second cencerto fills every requirement of the ideal concerto. And in the same light we felt that evening that Mr. Schnabel and the Boston possess every qualification to give it its best interpretation. Together they made a memorable performance. Mr. Schnabel is not a sentimental pianist. He delineates his measures rather accurately and his effects are intentional. But Brahms is not a sentimental composer in spite of the effort of many conductors to make him one, and here is a pianist brave enough not to put a throb in every measure.

He has been criticized for it, but we feel, without justification. He reserves his poetry for the proper places, and it seems twice as poetic by contrast. We do not see, for example, that the first movement of this concerto calls for anything but an intelligent massing of detail and ideas. Brahms is a brainy composer, and his ideas require just the clarification that Schnabel gives them. This does not mean that his phrasing or intonation are hard. Quite the contrary, we felt them to be beautifully turned, with the purposeful art of the Greek sculptor.

All-Russian Program.

In such fitting fashion did the Boston symphony end its New York season. There was no curtain speech by Koussevitsky other than the eloquent closing notes of the Fourth Brahms symphony, which closed this all-Brahms program. And the echoing applause that greeted the concert gave no indication of boredom on the part of

THURSDAY, APRIL 24, 1930

MUSIC

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin were the conductors. The program was as follows: Beethoven, First Movement of the Fifth Symphony. Haydn, Finale of Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call); Ravel, "Beauty and Beast" from "Mother Goose." Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel." Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries." Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks, giving the necessary information about the pieces in a clear and interesting manner. His telling the story of "Beauty and the Beast" with the accompanying amusing pictures on the screen aided greatly in the children's enjoyment of Ravel's charming music. There were pictures for the other compositions. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the music by Strauss and Wagner; Mr. Burgin the other numbers.

As the children were entering Symphony hall, other children were skipping the rope near the door. One might have asked whether those entering envied those in joyful exercise; or whether the rope-skippers wished that they, too, could enter. Children do not invariably appreciate what are loosely described as educational advantages. Too much stress, by the way, is put on music as an educational force. Possibly some of the contemporaneous compositions being purely cerebral, or reminding one of the Pythagorean theory of music, might be called educational—at least its admirers hope that the general public will be educated up to this advanced art, but the music played yesterday appealed to the emotions and the fancy. And so the children, not unduly impressed by the name of Beethoven, did not sit reverentially as in a concert of prayer, but honestly enjoyed what they heard with their ears. They also enjoyed the skill of the soloists in Haydn's Variations and Mr. Piller's double bassoon voicing the amorous pleading of the Beast. They would have gladly joined with Till in his merry pranks; they mourned his fate when he was brought to judgment by stern men without a sense of humor; and at the end the children rode gaily with the Valkyries. Truly a real entertainment. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Dr Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin Conduct

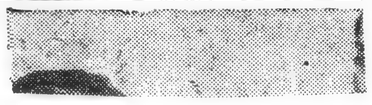
Globe Apr 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its final pair for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall to a large and enthusiastic audience, in which pupils of high school age were the most numerous group. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducted the first three numbers, the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the finale from Haydn's symphony, "With the Horn Call," and "Beauty and the Beast," from Ravel's "Mother Goose." In the last named selection the solo for contrabassoon was played by Boaz Piller.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." There were brief remarks and stereopticon slides by Alfred H. Meyer. This program will be repeated today at 4 p m.

What the youthful audience seemed to enjoy most was Ravel's whimsical conversation between Beauty and the Beast, in which the Beast is represented by the contrabassoon, an instrument almost irresistibly comic. Mr Meyer chose slides by an admirable French illustrator for the familiar fairy tale. His remarks were, as throughout the program, informative without being dull or pedantic.

One wondered whether so lengthy and heavy a tone poem as "Till Eulenspiegel" must seem to unpracticed ears was well placed on the program. The Beethoven and Haydn symphonic movements had already sufficiently taxed the audience to enjoy elaborate pieces. Would not a waltz by Johann Strauss have been preferable at this point? Otherwise, program and performance seemed well suited to the aim of these concerts, which is to interest young people in the best orchestral music.



Journal Apr 25

Music in the Museum

Verses from Elizabeth Borton Suggested by a Recent Concert

A RUSH of music from the distant orchestra
Flowing through the crowded galleries,
Even to the little room
Where Javanese goddesses
Stand serenely, curving flower-like hands.
The jewels in the ears
Of a tiny Bali dancer
Tremble in the stream of sound;
And all enveloped in the dark tides
Budda sits, undisturbed,
With half-closed eyes,
Faintly smiling.

SDAY, APRIL 24, 1930 Post

YOUNG PEOPLE HEAR CONCERT

Show Pleasure at Strauss and Wagner Numbers

The Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, to be repeated today without change in the programme at the same hour, 4 o'clock. As at the pair of similar concerts earlier this season, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, shared the conducting, and as on other recent occasions of this sort Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks illustrated with stereopticon slides. The audience was of good size, although the hall was not completely filled.

To Mr. Burgin fell the task of leading the orchestra through the first movement of Beethoven's First Symphony, the final movement of a Symphony in G major by Haydn, and the dialogues of Beauty and the Beast from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, while Dr. Koussevitzky led the performances of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

Whether it was the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky or the appeal of the music itself, the pieces by Strauss and Wagner seemed yesterday to please the youthful audience more than did the other numbers. Mr. Meyer's lantern slides were judiciously, often felicitously selected, and his comments were both apt and illuminating, entertaining as well as instructive. The youngsters were particularly intrigued by the lantern-slide which showed a collection of the ear-trumpets used by Beethoven through the years of his deafness.

Valenski, New Captain of Harvard Freshmen

At a meeting of the members of the Harvard freshman baseball squad yesterday afternoon, James T. Valenski was selected to lead the first year Cantabrigians in the remainder of their games. Valenski hails from Suffield Conn., and prep[illegible]

reen

Journ. Apr. 25

Restored Pops?

A Hint from Arthur Fiedler's First Program

THOSE who would have the Pop Concerts "what they used to be" may take heart and find pleasure in the list of pieces announced by Mr. Fiedler for the "opening night" of Wednesday, May 7. It contains nearly all the old ingredients—introductory march; operatic overture and operatic fantasia; dance-tunes; fragment from Wagner; potpourri from a musical play of the better sort; amiable trifles; the "sensation," not too heavy, from the ended symphonic season. On more, seemingly, the light-mind and the musically loafing are have their way with The P as indeed they should. He the program:

Pomp and Circumstance.....
Overture to "Mignon".....
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes....R.
Fantasia, "Aida".....
Siegfried's Rhine-Journey fro
"Götterdämmerung".....
Tambourin Chinois .....
Bolero .....
Selection, "New Moon".....
Whispering Flowers .....
American Fantasy .....

N
Vice
& T

Stravinsky, Saint-Saens, New American

Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" For Notable Piece at Symphony Hall

SUCH philosophers as frequent the Symphony Concerts might have observed last Saturday—unless, like many a subscriber, they were on week-end in the country—the working of the law of compensation. . . . The first number on the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," played as concert-piece for string orchestra. Since it is plotless and nearly actionless, it loses little by transfer from theater to concert-hall. The listener is not distracted by the sight of a painted tree, hollow and far-spreading, whence Apollo is born; nor may he observe the god mounting toward the summit of Olympus in a chariot likewise of paint upon canvas. Without too much regret he may even forego dissolving views of Apollo and the three attendant Muses engaged in variations (as the old vocabulary of the dance named them) sometimes a trifle overtaxing by reason of crossed rhythms. If he thus fails to see "Apollo" as mythological ballet — they were once written for the court at Versailles—he may listen the more closely to a music in which Stravinsky is again trying all the styles that occur to him as suitable for his purpose.

Back to Lully in some of the rhythms, since it was Lully who bestowed the mythological ballet upon his august master, Louis XIV. Back to Bach once more —as it seems in the solo-measures for violin that begin Scene Two. Back to Bellini (as some say) in the smoothness and sweetness of many a melody. Back certainly to Delibes in the phrasing and the accent of the dances. Perish the thought that any sudden jet of rhythm or any swift breaking of the line should disturb unruffled flow. Here and now a Stravinsky who of purpose discards every choir but the strings; out of them searches no new and strange sonorities; prefers, for the most part, to use them as painters paint in monochrome, escaping monotony by subtle shadings or adroitly graduated volume. Here and now also a Stravinsky who somehow fuses this singular pastiche into coherence and unified impression. Every one's ears are interested and charmed, especially when Dr. Koussevitzky and the strings are in as good form as they were on Saturday. The connoisseurs are amused as they single out this, that, and the other in the skein, marvelling the while at the Stravinskian ingenuities and assimilations. The lay listener hears a Stravinsky poles away from the composer of "Petruschka," "Le Sacre" and "Noces," a Stravinsky who woos his ear and pleases his fancy.

At the other end of the program, the so-called Organ Symphony of Saint-Saëns. In the repertory of no other orchestra in America is it so firmly embedded. Hardly oftener, nowadays, in Paris itself do the bourgeoisie of the Colonne and the Lamoureux Concerts hear it. . (And at that bourgeoisie the young Saint-Saëns liked to gird.) Dr. Muck, who fancied the Symphony and who, in the composer's opinion, played it more eloquently than any French conductor, was its foster-father at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux was no ungracious uncle; while Dr. Koussevitzky has been sufficiently assiduous guardian. If in these days Saint-Saëns must be taken down from the shelf on which the new musical generation has unanimously deposited him, better this Organ Symphony than the threadbare symphonic poems or the all too-neat concertos. Saint-Saëns was no mean craftsman — in fact he knew too much — and there are still interesting sonorities to echo out of thin-bodied or over-laden pages. And in the eighties to be grandiose and rhetorical, Lisztian-fashion, was no symphonic sin. Nor for most—witness the applause on both Friday and Saturday—is it such nowadays. And once more Dr. Koussevitzky persuades himself of the music before him. Early or late in the season, there shall be no routine.

With "the good, the true and the beautiful" thus distributed, there was room between for Mr. Samuel Gardner's long-promised "Broadway." The piece caught the conductor's eye when he sat as judge in the competition for American composers out of which Mr. Bloch won the prize. Last season he kept "Broadway" in mind; this season, almost at the end, found place for it. Mr. Toscanini may cleave to his Italians; Mr. Stokowski sort out his Russians; but for Dr. Koussevitzky, there are Americans, even young Americans, also deserving opportunity. This time, and reasonably, he entrusted performance to the composer. The orchestra worked for Mr. Gardner as well as applauded him. Seemingly, he made "Broadway" sound as he had imagined, felt and written. The audience of neither Friday nor Saturday heard it unimpressed. There was the ring of interest, pleasure and excitement in the recalls.

Possibly—to light first upon shortcomings—Mr. Gardner, being full of his matter, has overwritten it. Broadway may indeed be a street—mid-town and northward—of tumultuous jazz. But hardly, for the purposes of musical composition, of jazz and tumult so persistent and pervasive. Agreed that it is as rich-flavored, high-rhythmed, symphonic jazz as one may hear in a year of concert-going. Yet too much gives the piece a vehement monotony beyond even the prevalence of that quality along Broadway. Furthermore: Mr. Gardner scores this jazz for a super-orchestra—wood-winds in threes or fours, six horns, three saxophones, banjo, a variegated and busy percussion corner. Symphonic jazz must surely be sonorous; but it must also be sufficiently open for the hearer to catch the "quips and quirks and wanton wiles" with which separate instruments and separate choirs savor and diversify it. Oftener than need be Mr. Gardner's writing is so full-mouthed and in such turmoil that for the quickest ear (unless it be the composer-conductor's) there are no details, no arabesques—only large, onrushing sonorities.

Yet in contrasts, as it seemed to one and another hearer, lay the emotional and the imaginative virtue of Mr. Gardner's musical design. Throughout "Broadway" he would set up a background, infuse an atmosphere, of jazz. Therewith he characters street and scene. Within this atmosphere, against this background, he would also suggest, even enact—so far as tones may do that office—an individual fate. There are waltz-like measures, half-sensuous, playful, intoxicating, as of one who savors and enjoys a new-found environment. There are measures, again, as of one who draws from it restless stimulus and will to do. There are measures, finally, of something stilled and spent and crushed—maybe of the spirit that had toyed with this flaunting world, believed itself kindled and master, only to be drained, stripped and tossed aside. And again, in the last measures of all, the jazz-like tumult swells and clangs—iterum iterumque, as it was in the beginning, so also at the end. . . .

Continued on Following Page

Symphony

Continued from Preceding Page

One speculation is as good as another. There is no program, Mr. Gardner avers; nor would he sketch any emotional scheme. But emotional content there is, unmistakable if undefined. Mr. Gardner can manipulate tonal masses effectively and spiritedly. He knows the resources of an orchestra; plies them vigorously. He is alive to vivid rhythms; fertile in harmonic device. Sufficient for his purpose are the motivs whence his music springs. Better than most he writes symphonic jazz, and makes it not too symphonic. Above most young Americans he drives "Broadway" forward with unflagging creative will. Readily enough all this meets the ear—background, surface, method and means to Mr. Gardner's half-audible, half-implied tragedy. Call it man and his environment. Out of that conflict the romantic composers made symphonies and tone-poems and music-dramas. Out of it, in his turn, Mr. Gardner writes a jazzy piece. To every time—and every setting — its own musical speech for an unending struggle. No doubt Mr. Gardner is right. There is no need of explanation.

H. T. P.

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players

New Dukelsky For Symphony Hall Hearing

His Second Symphony for First Times, with Chadwick in Anniversary Days

ON the twenty-third program of the season Dr. Koussevitzky places its last novelty, Vladimir Dukelsky's second Symphony, in D-flat. Mr. Dukelsky is no stranger to these concerts. Excerpts from his ballet, "Zephyr and Flore," as well as his first symphony have been played under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The key D-flat is an unusual one for a symphony. Memory does not recall another. Asked yesterday morning whether the key had any special significance, Dr. Dukelsky replied: "The key of D-flat has always fascinated me. I chose it because of the special color it has when played by orchestral instruments. Prokofiev's concerto in the same key first gave me the idea of a symphony in this key." The symphony, which is in manuscript, bears the date 1928. Yesterday at a rehearsal was the first time its young composer had ever heard it in other than his imagination—or his four-hand piano version. For this, if you please, is a world-première.

Mr. Dukelsky, with protesting upraised hands and horror in his eye, affirms the complete absence of any program. Which makes him neither more nor less than a child of his own day. Programs are decidedly not in the mode at present. The three movements of the Symphony in D-flat follow the orthodox symphonic plan: the first Allegro moderato is a sonata-form; it is followed by a minuet no more than two minutes in length which, ending somewhat tenuously, is also introduction for the finale, a lively Spanish Zapateado.

Mr. Dukelsky, the heavens be praised, is not afraid to write a melody. There is scarcely a single theme in the three movements which is not frankly and wholesomely melodic. Withal, there is a lightness and a buoyancy in its rhythms which this or that devotee or the good old has-been may consider lacking in the dignity suitable to so lofty a form as the symphony. Again, in his rhythm, Mr. Dukelsky is a child of his day. Harmonies of course draw upon all the resources which the last few decades have brought into existence.

After two introductory measures oboes sing the principal theme. This is developed and repeated extensively. With a slowing down of the tempo comes the second theme, warmly from the strings, quasi-religious in character. The exposition of themes ends quietly in D major. The working-out section follows immediately and begins by introducing a new theme, which serves as the subject of a fugue. But this new theme is used chiefly as a counterpoint to the main theme of the movement, which soon enters—as an episode in the fugue. The recapitulation is perfectly normal and regular. The second theme, however, has a new harmonic background and is somewhat abbreviated. The coda is of syncopated rhythmical design.

The short minuet, whose theme is also melodic, moves more slowly and in more melancholy mood than the minuet of classical symphonies. There is no trio. The chief theme of the finale is in the rhythm and the manner of the Spanish Dance for which it is named—the Zapateado. An English horn introduces the chief contrasting melodic idea. Through several rhythmic variants the chief theme moves. At least twice one hears the lyric, contrasting theme. There is a sonorous, hymn-like ending.

"Novelty" of 1904

Fittingly, since these are anniversary days for Mr. Chadwick, a work of his comes to hearing at these concerts. For "novel" old piece, his Sinfonietta in D, from 1904, has place on this program. Fittingly it may receive a few paragraphs here. Fittingly (for the third and last time), the reviewers who heard it in 1904 when Mr. Chadwick conducted it, and those who heard it in 1910 from Mr. Fiedler, may be called upon for descriptive phrases. Be it said first that the sinfonietta takes only about twenty minutes for performance, that it is cast into four short movements—Risolutamente, Canzonetta, Scherzino, Finale.

From the reviewers of 1904 and 1910, we learn then, that this sinfonietta is "masculine music—robust, elastic, a music of high spirits," that Mr. Chadwick "dared to write as man for man." From other hands we learn that it is "purling, babbling music, light and transparent. The prevailing character of the music, with its lively, snappy motives, is a little Scotch and more plain, home-brewed American." (And this in pre-Volsteadian days!!) One reads about the "free untrammeled vein" of the chief theme of the first movement, of "a subordinate theme that is one of the most charmingly Oriental bits imaginable," of another subordinate theme that "smacks of the soil" that (one presumes from its near-Negroid character) is "post-Dvorakian." Knowing Mr. Chadwick, one is sure that he must have appreciated "post Dvorakian."

One learns also that the song of the Canzonetta by the repetition and insistence upon its rhythms develops into a formidable march. But no reviewer called more than passing attention to the beautiful horn call, to be played very softly, at the end of this movement, a solo viola all the while sustaining a high harmonic above it. One finds still further that the piquantly rhythmed scherzo has a "pastoral trio," that the finale is "frankly tuneful, well rhythmed, full of vitality."—One looks upon the score and finds these several items of the reviewers graven upon its pages. In conclusion one may quote, "In the Sinfonietta, his latest work, Mr. Chadwick has probably reached his high water mark." And the Sinfonietta is by no means an early work: at least three symphonies and the Symphonic Sketches, as well as many things of smaller proportions, had been written.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Old Hands, Young Audience

ANY THING may happen, not only once in a blue moon but toward the end of a concert-season. . . . The First Movement of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor was the opening number, yesterday afternoon, of the Symphony Orchestra's concert for young people. Mr. Burgin was conductor and the routined adults, scattered among the youngsters, expected no more than a capable performance, "in repertory," that might give juvenile ears some notion of Beethoven as composer of power. Instead, Mr. Burgin put by the caution usually besetting him when he takes the conductor's stand. For once he let himself go, slashing out the "Fate Motiv," driving it hard at each return, whipping up the rhythms, launching the strings in masses of sound, keeping the whole progress in ferment, struggle and tumult until it clouds into the end. These vigors, sonority upon sonority, held the young audience fast to a music that might easily have gone over its head. It also were caught into Beethoven's power and splendor though—thank heaven!—it had no reviewer's words for either. And if Mr. Burgin can be bold when he conducts for children, he should not damp his courage when grown-ups sit behind him. The gap between the ages is not so wide as all that.

Recently in New York Mr. Toscanini set "The Ride of The Valkyrs" on a Philharmonic program, with audience and reviewers in transport over his renewal of a hackneyed piece. The feat is not impossible elsewhere. In fact, there was audible reason to believe that Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished it at the end of yesterday's concert. Agree to his fast pace, which is at least arguable when there is no stage to be considered, and Wagner's music sounded again as from the fires of his imagination — the hurtling rhythms, the clangorous phrases, the din of "the host of the heroes." Beyond the means of the theater, the skies were cloven and Wotan's daughters drove home to Valhalla warrior-laden. Fresh came the simplicity, heated to power, of the musical means, the driving strings, the clamant brass, the superbity of the whole illusion. Recall the Prelude to "Tristan," as Dr. Koussevitzky now plays it; add this Valkyrs' Ride and he also may pluck a Wagnerian laurel.

The rest, with one exception, was the order of the day at these concerts for young people and children of far tenderer years. (Yesterday, these infants of Euterpe filled many a row). Mr. Meyer informed and amused us all when he retold the tale of Beauty and The Beast à la Française and illustrated it with colored slides out of Dulac. Or aga when he took us over a round of T Eulenspiegel's jokes as a German illu trator had pictured them. The youn sters had an ear as well for Ravel' Beast in the bassoon and Beauty in th clarinet. Nor were they to be blame when Strauss's tonal humor, which altogether adult, baffled them. Mo gave it up, as not few of their senio

Continued on Following Page

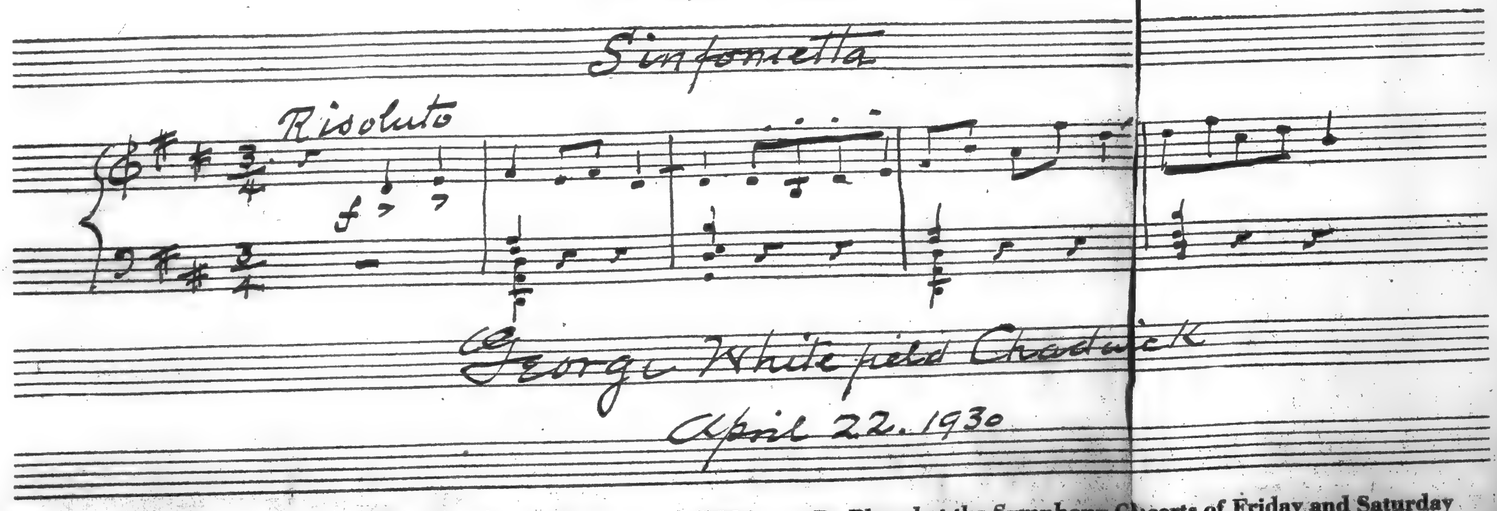
Amusements

Symphonic Stance

Vladimir Dukelsky

Whose New Symphony Will Be Produced at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday

The Hand Still Firm



Autographed Measures from Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta (1904), to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday to Mark the Fiftieth Anniversary of His First Appearance in Boston as Composer and Conductor

Amusements Amusements

90

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. 338). Chadwick, Sinfonietta in D major. Dukeysky, Symphony, E flat major, No. 2 (first performance). Strauss, tone poem, "Don Juan."

Mr. Chadwick's overture to "Rip Van Winkle" was performed at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in December, 1879, at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in May, 1880. His name first appeared on a program of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 13, 1883 (overture "Thalia"). It was eminently meet and proper that his jubilee should have been celebrated yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose programs he has often enriched. The Sinfonietta, chosen for this occasion, was composed in 1904; the music is still fresh and pleasing by its firm structure, its melodic interest, its harmonic and orchestral expression, and above all by a musical enthusiasm that is kept within artistic bounds. This was no perfunctory work; the music was in the composer and it had to come out. Nor is the Sinfonietta too evidently of any school. There is individuality, which was rare among American composers at the time the Sinfonietta was written. And here, as in an earlier and famous Scherzo and in the earlier Symphonic Sketches there is more than the suggestion of the American spirit finding its voice in music. Perhaps today the first and second movements are the ones that command the most attention; the former by the thematic material—note the charming quasi oriental melody—and its development—Mr. Chadwick writing for orchestra has been especially happy in his use of the symphonic form; the second by the constant beauty of the musical thought, the melancholy that is poetic sentiment, and by the beautiful close with its exquisite orchestral invention.

Mr. Chadwick at the end of the Sinfonietta was most heartily applauded. One might borrow from newspaper jargon and say "he received an ovation," but this would do him an injustice, for among the ancient Romans an ovation was a lesser triumph, when the victorious general entered the city on horseback or on foot, not in a chariot, was crowned with myrtle, not with laurel, and only a sheep was sacrificed in his honor. Surely Mr. Chadwick for his musical activity during the 50 honorable years deserves the laurel.

Mr. Dukelsky, who was at the concert, is not a stranger here. Mr. Koussevitzky had already introduced a ballet-suite and a first symphony. Mr. Dukelsky has not yeached his 30th year—fortunate man! He has told in an amusing manner the story of his musical life from the time he was a boy; told the story in so ingenuous, modest, humorous way, that it should disarm one from severe, much less captious, criticism of his music. He undoubtedly has talent, which how seems to staid hearers with preconceived, or traditional ideals, wild and irregular. This symphony is a more mature work than his first, yet it is often yeasty. While the reproach of being a poseur, or of striving to make the bourgeois sit up and take notice, cannot justly be brought against him, the impression is made that the thematic treatment and the instrumentation are often experimental; that he too anxiously shuns what to him is the obvious that it might be said of him by his friends in defence, he hears music in his own way, not as even many of his colleagues hear it; that rhythm and curious orchestral effects, sudden and disconcerting contrasts, are more significant, more important to him, than even the orthodoxy of such widely differing geniuses as Strauss and Debussy.

At present Mr. Dukelsky belongs to the extreme radical wing, but there is a vigor, an intensity at times in this symphony that makes one forget the lack of emotional beauty as that beauty has long been and is now in certain quarters recognized. After all, music, as Mozart said, should "klingen." And what a delightful performance of Mozart's symphony was that of yesterday! As delightful as the performance of "Don Juan" was dramatically, superbly eloquent. Seldom is a conductor so sensitive and skilled as Dr. Koussevitzky in the interpretation of works by both composers, Strauss and Mozart. Seldom is an orchestra found that can so aid in the interpretation.

"Don Juan" and Till Eulenspiegel" are the two of Strauss's orchestral works that bid fair to live. When he wrote "Don Juan" musical blood was hot in his veins. He might say of his Sinfonia Domestica and his Alpine Symphony, as Lenau's Don Juan: "The fire of my blood has now burned out Exhausted is the fuel."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts, the last of the season's, is announced as follows: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Hill, "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole, Brahms, Symphony C Minor, No. 1.

Symphony Concert

Age Honored, Youth Heard, Heights Won

Symphony Concert Full-Laden, Chadwick and Dukelsky, Mozart to Strauss

THE Symphony Concert, Friday afternoon, deserved its name. Thrice over it exhibited the symphonic form. (The end of the season draws near. Promised performances, anniversaries, unfulfilled purposes, what not, press upon conductors till program-making becomes less work of art than of necessity.) Fortunately, in two of the chosen instances, that form was shortened. Mr. Dukelsky's new Symphony contained no slow movement as such. Instead, in the Finale stood episodic slow measures; while the middle Minuet was by no means gay. In turn, Mozart's old Symphony—in C major (No. 34), last heard at Symphony Hall from Sir T. Beecham—omitted any Minuet gay or grave. Finally, Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta, though it arrayed all four of the orthodox divisions, kept each as short as the title suggested

There was other offset to surfeit. For the first time within recollection two composers graced with their presence a single matinée. From the balcony the youthful Dukelsky descended to the stage to take two or three recalls after the performance of his Symphony. Twice the venerable Chadwick rose from his seat to acknowlege still heartier plaudits. . . . Finally, conductor and orchestra outdid themselves in musics so wide apart as the slow division of Mozart's Symphony (Salzburg, 1780) and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan" (Munich, 1888). The performance of the latter—and the piece itself is still thrilling stuff—would have whipped any stranger audience into tumults of applause. Our complacent matinée company merely patted its hands long enough to bring back Dr. Koussevitzky; then streamed through the doors. With sound reason the conductor seemed more disposed to return thanks to the players, still hot with their prowess, than to the retreating audience. If the history-book once written about the Symphony Concerts is extended to the approaching jubilee, it should contain an edifying chapter on the customs of their public.

By exception. Mr. Chadwick was honored in the program-book with four lines of bold, black type. They noted the fact that fifty years ago—come May 6—he made his first appearance in Boston as composer and conductor. To mark the anniversary Dr. Koussevitzky was reviving the Sinfonietta. It will be further marked by a concert of Mr. Chadwick's music at the Conservatory and by a dinner in his honor. The Sinfonietta itself was written in 1904; last heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1910. To most, therefore, it came new, strange and, as the event proved, surprising. For in these latter years—since there must be a devil's advocate at festal occasions—Mr. Chadwick's just quality and worth have been eclipsed. In his last productive days he chose to work in the symphonic poem—a form that neither quickened his imagination nor freed his hand. Most publics have short memories. The musical generation that sat before "Aphrodite," "Tam o' Shanter" and "The Angel of Death" tended to forget the composer of the "Melpomene" and the "Adonais" overtures, of the Second and the Third Symphonies, the Symphonic Sketches—the Chadwickian masterpiece—and the Sinfonietta. The maker of symphonic poems out of thought and will, care and pains, over-effaced the free-handed craftsman, the warm inventor, the quick and fertile spirit, the humorsome American, that an earlier time had applauded.

Hence the surprise, yesterday, of the Sinfonietta. It is short, especially in the last two movements—and pithy brevity is one of the modernistic virtues. It is written in high spirits; while to most of us Mr. Chadwick has long been a sage. As there were kings before Agamemnon, so there were composers of transparent scores before these current years of orchestral grace. One such is this Sinfonietta; dated 1904, Boston and New England; while Ravel himself might envy the fancy and felicity of the distant horns against the sustaining viola at the end of the slow movement. The beginning springs away—all elasticity and high spirits; a quasi-oriental motiv adds charm to vigor. There is no sense of the working of the musical ideas, so fertile is their course, so apt the instrumental vesture.

Rhythm—to believe some of our young lions—might almost be a twentieth-century invention. Yet, "'way back" in 1904, Mr. Chadwick evolves a broad and tingling march, as though for the game of it, out of the rhythms of his slow song; tosses about the rhythmic figures of his Scherzo—less lightly and brightly played than the other three movements—as to the manner born. And in the Finale—to crown the whole—enters the high-humored, robustious, honestly American Chadwick. He is flinging it off rondo-fashion; singing loud and unashamed; even dashing it here and there with sentiment—the more American he. Our composers go their several ways as Heaven, this life and the art of music have made them. Not one was, or is, so masculine as this Chadwick of his forties and fifties, before symphonic poems sapped him.

Over one of his piano-pieces Beethoven wrote "Sonata quasi una Fantasia." Not inappropriately, Mr. Dukelsky might have written over his Symphony in D-flat, heard for the first time yesterday in any concert-hall, "Sinfonia quasi una Fantasia." True, the first movement is orthodoxy itself—principal, second and third theme, fugato in the middle, reprise, coda—all that symphonic virtue may exact. Forthwith, however, Mr. Dukelsky begins to stray from the straight and narrow path. His second division is one of the shortest and least dance-like of symphonic Minuets. From a moody motiv it unfolds, short-breathed, through harmonies that turn it more melancholy. The first measures of the Finale mock it with snapping Spanish rhythms and high tonal colors. The English horn sobers and stays them. By grace of mercurial temperament, Mr. Dukelsky returns to melancholy and is songful—once and twice, as though to say to the recurring Spanish rhythm "Get thee behind me, Satan." So to a close in the full-mouthed sonorities dear to any and every young composer with a many-voiced orchestra for his playground.

By this evidence a symphony of clear individuality. Mr. Dukelsky has devised a design to please himself, filled and accomplished it. (Incidentaly the principal motiv of the first movement, returning in the Finale, holds it well together). No less, this design imposes itself upon hearers, interesting and pleasing them. For aught the listener knows, Mr. Dukelsky may "toil terribly" at his writing table; but in the concert-hall he sounds with abundant spontaneity and inciting animation. Unquestionably he has the gift of melodic invention. His motivs ripen, but not over-ripen, into songful measures. As yet this melody may not be too distinguished or bear a distinct Dukelskian trade-mark; but it is fresh, warm, ingratiating. There is music in it, and also mood. Being "twentieth century," Mr. Dukelsky is keen for rhythm; plies it variously and invigoratingly. The age for subtleties, unless a composer is over-cerebral—or a pupil of Schönberg—comes not at twenty-seven.

For harmonies and timbres Mr. Dukelsky is also "twentieth century," but with the harmonies he is more for mood and suggestion than for cerebration; while with the timbres he prefers warm clang to pale transparency. Possibly for its plangency out of a twentieth-century orchestra—piano and most of the usual window-dressing—he chose the unusual key of D-flat major—C-sharp minor in the slow episodes—for his Symphony. And he can be as changeful of feeling as the mixed blood in him and the wandering life he has led may warrant. A dignified young composer writes the first movement largely, warmly, vigorously. Melancholy streaks the fanciful intermezzo of the Minuet. In the Finale Mr. Dukelsky dances or dreams until the sonorities of the orchestra possess him. The eagerness, the glow, the zest of him commend his Symphony. Not for a while need he "settle down"—if his temperament ever permits. And if he does glance over his shoulder now and then at his admired Prokofiev, he less imitates than reacts—in his own way—to an influence.

There is one style after another in the little Symphony of Mozart that began the afternoon, as though through that summer of composition in Salzburg, he was "feeling himself out," now in one direction, again in another. For the most part, the first movement might be the suave, decorative, lightly ornate music that he "turned off" to please the Cardinal-Archbishop or such generous patrons as the bourgeois Haffners. Possibly, the performance yesterday a little over-weighted it. Yet in it are moments in which the cool Mozartean perfection, the exquisite Mozartean sensibility—a phrase shaped, a modulation made, a figure set in motion—come uppermost. The Finale, in turn, is a transparent bubble, blown, breaking, blown again, sparkling and gay.

Believably the slow movement preserves the little Symphony. For here is Mozart, pensive, melancholy, romantic (if the hearer likes) but unfailingly limpid, lucid and precise. Blend mood, matter, form and means and they coalesce into a cloudless loveliness that is the Mozartian perfection that most evades twentieth-century performance. With an infinite pains, Dr. Koussevitzky, the strings and the shadowing bassoons—the rest of the orchestra is silent—gained it. The tone was transparent; the shaping of every contour delicately clear and exact: the light flow of the music serenity itself. Yet underneath this gentle brightness as gentle a melancholy. At rehearsal Dr. Koussevitzky pursues the ideal that his imagination raises. Once and again in the concert he captures it—as yesterday in this Andante of Mozart.

In Strauss's "Don Juan," which was closing piece, what did conductor and orchestra not do? They were rich-toned and sensuous. They teemed with vitalizing energy; strode in splendor; sang passionately, deliriously; etched and colored; cut sharp and knife-like. Through a music that time and change and fashion may not dim, burned the Straussian flame. Once more Don Juan himself leaped into tonal being. This page and that, and he was full charactered and panoplied. Measures of passionate sensuousness and as passionate disillusion. The horns sounding the ceaseless quest, the quenchless desire, the interminable adventure; voluptuous tumult, voluptuous torment; at the last, the dissonance of extinction. Music more completely and potently accomplishing its end has not been written in our time. Seldom in Symphony Hall has it received such intensive and all-prevailing performance. And after that Andante of Mozart! Every conductor, every orchestra, must be as manifold as—music itself.

H. T. P.

Words to Prompt Acts

On Current Account the Symphony Orchestra Still Needs $15,000

THE program-book for the Symphony Concerts of this week contains, across two pages, this simple, clear and explicit table:

Operating Deficit estimated for year 1929-1930	$100,000
Subscriptions to date.	85,000
Balance unsubscribed.	$15,000

To the table a single sentence is appended:

That the orchestra may close the year (July 31) without a deficit, the Trustees hope that the remaining $15,000 will be subscribed promptly.

There seems no more to be said—but something to be done.

SYMPHONY HOMAGE TO CHADWICK

His "Sinfonietta" of 50 Years Ago Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two composers were present to hear their music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, one of them the other's senior by a matter of 49 years. This spring marks the 50th anniversary of George Whitfield Chadwick's American debut as composer, and Dr. Koussevitzky took cognizance of the fact in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta while finding place on the same programme for the Second Symphony of Vladimir Dukelsky.

A Symphony of Mozart in C major and Strauss' "Don Juan" respectively began and ended a generally diverting concert.

CORDIAL TO CHADWICK

Even if he were avid of adulation, which distinctly he is not, Mr. Chadwick could not have failed to be pleased by the nature of his reception yesterday at the hands of his fellow-townsmen. Time and again he was compelled to rise from his seat and bow his acknowledgment. In his turn Mr. Dukelsky was liberally applauded and recalled to the stage whither, in accordance with the present custom, he had betaken himself when the last note of his Symphony in D flat major had sounded.

It was possible to wish that, having decided to take official note of Mr. Chadwick's anniversary Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen a score more characteristic, more completely representative of that composer than this Sinfonietta, composed for a student orchestra and purposely written with a certain brevity, preciseness, and economy of musical and orchestral means and resources—for example, the four Symphonic Sketches now generally held to be his masterpiece. But this Sinfonietta, for all its unpretending nature, is in many respects typical of its author. It is buoyant, straightforward and to the point. The invention is free and flowing, the handling always secure. In it, as in much else that Mr. Chadwick has written, there is both a lyricism and a humor that are subtly yet unmistakably American.

Music of Youth

No doubt the idea never entered Dr. Koussevitzky's mind, yet, Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta aside, the concert of yesterday was given over to the music of youth. Mozart's Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were each written at the symphonically tender age of 24, and Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony was finished not long after his 25th birthday. The comparison is, of course, unfair; but the fact remains that Mozart's Symphony and "Don Juan" are the works of composers already matured, while Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony shows the 'prentice hand.

It is to Mr. Dukelsky's credit that he endeavors to write, so far as his thematic invention is concerned, simply and naturally, that he does not disdain melody. But the themes of this Symphony, like those of its predecessor already heard here, are without physiognomy. They are amiable but undistinguished, and they hardly bear the orchestral weight that they are asked to carry. Had Mr. Dukelsky moulded this same material into a Sinfonietta for chamber orchestra the result might have been happier.

LIGHT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Dukelsky's Symphony

Chadwick's Sinfonietta Marks 50th Anniversary of Debut

Globe Apr 26

Dr Koussevitzky chose a program of light music for yesterday's Symphony concert, omitting from it Skriabin's "Divine Poem," originally announced, and adding an early Mozart symphony in C major, and Strauss' "Don Juan." The other numbers were as at first planned, a new symphony by Dukelsky, and a sinfonietta by George Whitefield Cradwick, performed to mark the 50th anniversary of Mr Chadwick's Boston debut.

Mr Dukelsky, who was present to hear his new symphony, came to the stage to bow his acknowledgments of the applause. Mr Chadwick, wishing, perhaps, to minimize the demonstration to be expected from the audience, contented himself with rising and bowing in his place midway on the floor of the hall. The audience applauded him heartily, and Dr Koussevitsky and the orchestra also clapped him.

"Light" is not the adjective one would commonly choose to describe a program including two symphonies and a sinfonietta. But neither Mozart, Chadwick nor Dukelsky wrote in the music heard yesterday with the ponderous intricacy and the considerable lengths one commonly expects of symphonies old and new.

Each in his own way composed ingratiating music, easy to listen to, making no great exactions upon mind or emotions. Strauss' "Don Juan" is much more intricate and much more intensely emotional than these three pieces of symphonic character. But Strauss' tone poem, too, is light compared to his "Ein Heldenleben" or "Zarathustra."

Mr Chadwick, born at Lowell in 1854, made his first public appearance as a musician at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, May 6, 1880, when he conducted a performance of his overture, "Rip Van Winkle." At the New England Concervatory, of which Mr Chadwick has long been the director, an anniversary concert of his music is announced for May 6, 1930, with the "Rip Van Winkle" overture on the program. At the Eastman School in Rochester, N Y, the anniversary was recently commemorated by the performance of some of Mr Chadwick's music.

The Sinfonietta in D major heard yesterday was written in 1904. Hearing it yesterday, one wished younger American composers might learn from Mr Chadwick the virtues of clarity, simplicity and sincerity of style. His music is always honestly and unpretentiously American. His Americanism owes nothing to the music of the redmen, or of the Negro, or of Broadway.

He, with a unique wisdom, faces the fact that we have not yet in this country a distinctively national type of music, and contents himself with the musical idiom natural to an American of his generation, brought up on the sort of thing to be heard when he was a young man in what Whitman would have called the "churches and parlors" and subsequently well grounded in European masterpieces.

It speaks volumes for Mr Chadwick's native originality that his music, unlike that of most Americans, never recalls the work of any one composer. His style is a personal one, and in this Sinfonietta he has something agreeable to say, which he says modestly and gracefully. It is hard to see how an American composer of his generation could have done more than Mr Chadwick has accomplished in all his chief works, unless he had been a genius of the very first rank, a Bach, a Beethoven or a Wagner, able to transcend the limits that condition the work of those lesser men who belong to but never originate schools or periods of music.

Dukelsky's Symphony in the unusual key of D flat, of which yesterday's was the first public performance, has something of the spontaneity that distinguishes Mr Chadwick's music. Like most of the young men born since 1900, Dukelsky is self-consciously clever in some of his musical devices. Unlike most of them, he is quite free from pedantry and priggishness.

This little symphony is full of jolly tunes, and without needless complexities of style. It convinced one hearer that, could he but find somebody to play Gilbert to his Sullivan, Dukelsky would help give the world something now greatly to be desired and not to be had, an operette that would appeal both to the general public and to fastidious tastes.

Prokofieff and Gershwin, to whom Mr Dukelsky is obviously indebted for helpful musical influence upon his budding talent, could probably do the same. But all our young Gilberts are sad young men, disillusioned sentimentalists, like Aldous Huxley and Noel Coward. Mr Coward's one commercially successful operetta, "Bittersweet," is not lively and amusing enough to have Dukelsky music. But he could do another, and a better, perhaps.

The Mozart symphony, which Koussevitzky had conducted here before, was again badly played yesterday. His version of "Don Juan" was again eloquent and thrilling. P. R.

AUDIT OF ROAD COSTS

Boston Orchestra

Boston Adv Apr 26

Even on his last program but one of the season, the indefatigable Koussevitzky must introduce a novelty. Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert of April 25, made public for the first time anywhere the Second Symphony of Vladimir Dukelsky, that young Russian expatriate whose First Symphony and whose Suite from the ballet, "Zéphr et Flore," had previously been unfolded to us by Dr. Koussevitzky. The composer is that irresistible young man who was "discovered" by Diaghileff, who writes "musical thrillers" under an assumed name, who has appeared in vaudeville and who has let it be known that he "hates all 'modernism,' but loves being modern." A very clever and very facile young man, you see, whose cleverness and facility are manifested in his symphonic scores. In a somewhat breath-taking career he has by no means overlooked what has been done by his predecessors. Indeed, he pays them the highest compliment. This new symphony is cast in three movements, of which the second is a very brief Menuetto. It has broad melodies which lack distinction, and it depends heavily upon dance rhythms. Tchaikovsky in Tin-Pan Alley.

In honor of George Whitfield Chadwick, the director of the New England Conservatory of Music, who is celebrating this spring the fiftieth anniversary of his first public appearance as composer and conductor, this musician's "Sinfonietta" was included in the program. Composed in 1904, it sounded remarkably fresh and charming. It abounds in melodic material, and it has a captivating Scherzino for its third movement. There was much applause for the distinguished composer, who was present to bow his acknowledgements.

The concert opened with a beautifully proportioned performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34, and closed with a lambent proclamation of Strauss's "Don Juan."

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 27

A PROTEST

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I HAVE addressed the management of the Philadelphia Orchestra in part as follows:

I note on the Philadelphia Orchestra circular that "the closing rule enforced during the past season will be continued." During the Winter there have been vigorous protests both by critics and the public against this very arbitrary ruling, which amounts to persons being locked out during the first part of the concert and locked in during the second. There can be no question as to the importance of the audience not being disturbed while music is going on, but it is carrying things much too far not to admit the few late-comers (for you must acknowledge that there are very few nowadays) when there are as many as three or four compositions with intervals and much applause between them. Some of the critics even object to a symphony being interrupted between the movements for applause and for seating of often unavoidable late-comers; but granting that a symphony must be played through without interruption, the same ruling should not apply to separate compositions. The Boston Symphony concerts are attended by an audience equal to either the Philadelphia or Philharmonic-Symphony in reverent attention and devotion to the music played in a completely sold-out house, but Mr. Koussevitzky allows not only a few minutes' leeway at the beginning of a concert but stops and allows a few late-comers to be seated during the numbers. I would like to remark here that at one concert Mr. Toscanini began one-and-a-half minutes before the time, which is absolutely inexcusable. I had just set my watch by the meridian, and I know that this is an absolute fact. Also, you cannot expect everybody's watch to be within ten seconds of each other—in other words, there must be some reasonable allowance made for some slight differences in time.

I feel strongly that the American public are the most willing, the most amenable, the most attentive of any audiences that it has been my privilege to be counted among, and I hope that managers and critics will get together and formulate some more reasonable ruling than such as exists at present.

LAURA d'O. ROOSEVELT.
New York, April 23, 1920.

MUSIC

D - 5

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky is not this season repeating his experiment of last year, when he allowed the subscribers to choose a request program for the final pair of symphony concerts, following a fashion set in Philadelphia by Mr Stokowski. Instead, he now plans a program including Brahms' C minor symphony, Prof Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Weber's "Oberon" overture. For the final Monday concert tomorrow night Dr Koussevitzky's program includes three numbers from recent programs in the regular series.

The programs of the final Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony last week announce the 50th season of Boston Symphony concerts, Dr Koussevitzky, conductor, giving the first official word that he is to remain next season, as everyone has assumed he would. It is said that Dr Koussevitzky's present contract sets no definite limit to his term of service here, but the management of the orchestra has made no official announcement on that point. Nor is the salary paid him a matter of public record.

Globe Apr 27

"Normalcy" at the Pops

For the past three seasons the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall have been conducted by a musician of international eminence, Alfredo Casella, a composer, pianist and conductor of distinction. His programs included a wide variety of light music old and new, and an occasional more serious piece. He seldom conducted anything trivial or tawdry or sentimental.

This year the idealistic experiment of letting a celebrated musician choose programs to please fastidious tastes as well as the general public has been abandoned, to the deep regret of those who believe that the public has better taste than it is commonly given credit for possessing. Under the new conductor, Arthur Fiedler, whose first program is now announced, the Pops will return to what the late Warren G. Harding, denouncing Wilsonian idealism in politics, called "normalcy."

Here is Mr Fiedler's program for the opening night of the Pops, May 7. It might have been set by Mr Maquarre, the first Pops conductor the present writer recalls, or by any of his predecessors and successors, save only Mr Casella:

"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Rosenkavalier" waltzes, R. Strauss; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Gotterdammerrung," Wagner; "Tambourin Chinois," Kreisler; "Bolero," Ravil; selection, "New Moon," Romberg; "Whispering Flowers," Blon; "American Fantasy," Herbert.

Interesting the Public

Three of Mr Fiedler's 10 pieces for the opening night, to be sure, will interest the kind of audience Mr Casella was, perhaps slowly, but none the less surely attracting to the Pops. And of the new conductor's personal enthusiasm for the best music, old and new, there is, in view of his other activities hereabouts, and his musical background, no doubt. But will the people who come to hear the waltzes from Strauss' "Rosenkavalier," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," and Ravel's Bolero really enjoy listening to Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois" sandwiched between the Wagner and the Ravel?

When the orchestra plays "Whispering Flowers," they can, of course, go home, or converse with their friends while consuming Pops Punch and the excellent eatables from the Women's Industrial and Education Union. Some first-rate jazz, if the orchestra could be made to play it with the requisite gusto, and the difficulties of rescoring were overcome, would hold their interest. But "Whispering Flowers" will not.

They manage these things better, not perhaps in France, but certainly at the Stadium concerts in New York, where for weeks on end every Summer thousands of listeners come nightly to hear what are avowedly and actually symphony concerts by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

In the bad old days before prohibition the reason for being of the Pops was not wholly, and for many not primarily, the music. But, excellent as the present refreshments are in their strictly Volsteadian way, they would hardly of their own merits fill Symphony Hall nightly. Only the music can now do that. If the programs are to be made up chiefly of pieces anybody can hope to hear any night anywhere on the radio, is there not danger that people will forget that no radio performance ever sounds as well as an actual Pop concert in Symphony Hall?

Let us hope that the progress of the season will confute these doubts, so far as box office success, which is now plainly to be the final test, is concerned.

Programme for First Pops Concert Full Of Promise--- Musical Notes

Post Apr 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the announcement of the programme for the opening night of the Pops, a week from Wednesday, it becomes apparent that under Arthur Fiedler's direction these concerts are to return to the traditional ways from which Mr. Fiedler's predecessor, Mr. Casella, had in large measure diverted them. The operatic fantasia, in this opening instance "Aida," and the selection from a current light opera, in this case "New Moon," are, by token of this first programme, to be systematically restored to Pops audiences, and to the anticipatory pleasure of more than a few prospective members of those audiences. Ravel's Bolero, most striking new piece of the symphony season just ending, has a place on Mr. Fiedler's well balanced list.

* * * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Toscanini at its head, has actually departed for its much-heralded tour of European cities; a tour that is to include within a space of five weeks 23 concerts in 15 cities of nine different countries. And the party consists, according to reliable report, of 114 players, 38 wives, nine children, two dogs, and a considerable managerial staff.

* * * *

The departure has not been made without at least one protest, voiced by James P. Dunn in a letter to the New York Times, against the neglect of American composers in the programme tentatively prepared for these European concerts. An American orchestra touring Europe and playing no American music seems to that writer a sad spectacle. And in no flag-waving spirit it is to be regretted that Mr. Toscanini has found nothing to interest him in the work of our more representative American composers.

In this connection it might not be amiss to [illegible] those who deplore Dr. [illegible] music

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO CHADWICK

Amer Apr 26

By MOSES SMITH

The Romantics dominate the program for the current pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next to the last of the year. Even Mozart, who begins the program with a rarely heard C major Symphony, turns sentimental in the slow movement, violates the classical formula for the symphony by omitting the Minuet, and unburdens himself of a rough-coated finale.

This music of charm, charmingly played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, is followed by George Whitfield Chadwick's Sinfonietta in F major. The piece is played in a sort of homage to the grand old man of American music, who made his first public appearance 50 years ago. Mr. Chadwick was present at yesterday's concert to hear his interesting and engrossing work, and to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause of the audience. It is romantic music, at times robust, at times almost operatic in flavor. And it is not merely a well made score: it has genuine melodic ideas, rhythmic piquancy, masterly development.

There was another composer present to hear his work—Vladimir Dukelsky, who is about a half century younger than Mr. Chadwick. Dukelsky's Second Symphony in D-flat major was given its first performance anywhere. Mr. Koussevitzky, who fancies the youthful Russian, having previously produced a Symphony and ballet-suite of his here, lavished his fondest efforts on the new piece. The music is essentially romantic, for all of Dukelsky's protesting modernism. A superficial piquancy and sophistication does not disguise its kinship with the 19th century emotional revolt.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPOKANE, WASH.
Spokesman Review

An Imported Pianist Fills Difficult Role

Importing a pianist for two performances is a thing an orchestra rarely does. Therefore, when the Boston Symphony appeared last week in New York with Arthur Schnabel presented to play two piano concertos on the all-Brahms programs we wondered at Manager Brennan's sudden extravagance.

After these performances, in which Conductor Koussevitzky displayed so much tenseness and staccato that one's nerves were left quivering, it was quite apparent that Schnabel fitted into the scheme of things in an eminent degree. For it would be difficult to imagine a more aggressive and physically brilliant playing of the Brahms B flat and the Brahms D minor concertos. Suavity and beauty of tone one never expects from Schnabel, and the absence of these qualities was consequently not disappointing.

But the minority listeners who did not feel compensated in Schnabel's accomplishments—among whom I was one—were made to feel out of place by the enthusiasm of the majority auditors who applauded the stocky, business looking Schnabel until their palms must have ached.

POPS PROGRAM

Arthur Fiedler announces the program for the opening night of the Pops season in Symphony hall, which will begin on Wednesday, May 7. This will be the 45th season of the Pops which, with the aid of refreshments and smoking at the tables, are the most social concerts in America. A greater success than ever is anticipated under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, the new conductor. A member of the orchestra for a number of years, Mr. Fiedler has become particularly prominent recently as conductor of chamber concerts, as the organizer and conductor of the Esplanade concerts last summer, and as the leader of the Cecilia Society.

The opening program for May 7 follows:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes	R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung"	Wagner
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler
Bolero	Ravel
Selection, "New Moon"	Romberg
Whispering Flowers	Blon
American Fantasy	Herbert

SYMPHONY IN FINAL MONDAY CONCERT

Program of Stravinsky, Brahms and Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, gave in Symphony Hall last evening the sixth and last concert of this season's Monday evening series.

The program comprised works from the standard Symphony repertory; Stravinsky's Ballet, "Apollon Musagete"; the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Stravinsky's ballet music was meticulously patterned and excellently played. This deceptive and fascinating music holds a deal of cunning beneath a surface that seems to be relatively simple. The brilliance of the melody, on second examination, appears to be the glint from something as carefully and as strongly fashioned as chain armor. Of the applause that followed, Richard Burgin, concert-master, received especial acclaim for graceful and delicate playing of the solo violin part.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Tristan" excerpts was not, to one, the best in all respects that he has done here. There was eventual full emotional sweep and abundant tonal color, but the piece began rather lifelessly, without the high-powered dramatic undercurvent apparent in the opening measures. Tone became muddy in the climaxes.

The high water mark of orchestral transparency and euphony was found in the Brahms symphony. Dr Koussevitsky, at his best in this, evoked to the full the orchestral coloring and made the most of the concluding sonorities. The profusion of graceful, vital melodies that flowed from an orchestral Brahms in rare expansive mood were sung warmly and joyously.

A tabulation of the pieces played this season at the Monday evening concerts reveals the programs to have been very conservative. There were but two or three works which could be called "novelties." Honegger's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra received at the fourth Monday concert its Boston premiere. With the exception of perhaps six or seven works, little was heard at these concerts that had not been written before the turn of the century.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra received from the listeners a final expression of the utmost approval and admiration.

As the Tuesday Symphonies End

Yesterday afternoon the Tuesday Symphony series, the last to begin in the season, was the first to come to a close. They ended with a concert that included Beethoven, even as they had begun with a concert that included Beethoven. In the first concert Beethoven was coupled with Bach and Mozart. Yesterday Beethoven was joined with Brahms. It has been a series, as the Tuesday series usually is, in which almost all of the great ones have contributed of their choicest works: Bach and Handel; Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; Schubert, Schumann and Wagner (of the Romanticists, Mendelssohn and Berlioz were omitted this year); Franck, Brahms and Chaikovsky; Strauss, Debussy and Ravel. Of the more recent moderns there were none. A single novelty—Ravel's "Bolero"—stood upon the season's program.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played two symphonies and an overture. The symphonies were Beethoven's sixth, called the "Pastoral"; Brahms's fourth. The overture was Beethoven's so-called "Leonore No. 3." The program, about five minutes short of two hours, would have been long enough without the overture. But the number of late-comers amply justified the presence of an overture at the beginning. Even with the overture for first piece, there were those who did not see fit to arrive until after the first movement of the symphony. And the continuity of the "Pastoral" prefers to remain unbroken.

Dr. Koussevitzky was entirely in the vein with this music. The gentle, placid "Pastoral" went its way through smiling fields; by the side of the purling brook; through the droll peasant dances; through the storm with the sunshine just around the corner, the storm which makes its point just as surely as though it had been set loose by Straussian or Stravinskian machinery, the storm, however, which would not drive many a hardy soul indoors; and finally, through the pious thanksgivings and rejoicing of the good peasant folk. Such qualities the conductor emphasizes in this score. The deeply emotional he does not seek there; the flashingly brilliant he does not superimpose upon this music; the aggressively stirring he does not distil out of it. The answer is that such things are not inherent in the music. Wisely, Dr. Koussevitzky does not read them into it. The more difficult thing he attempts—and eminently accomplishes—of allowing this symphony to run its restrained course on levels low in color, placid in emotional content. To give it interest in these uninflated planes is not much less than marvel of interpretation. Beethoven in good humor, contemplating Nature, that is the music, that is the conductor's way with it.

To the Beethoven in whom are mingled verdant spring and drowsy summer, succeeded the Brahms of mellow, darkening autumnal qualities. The programmist in his comprehensive researches discovered that Brahms once had doubts about the value of this, his last symphony. Such doubts the world has long since resolved. To us the towering outlines, the somber yet rich glowing moods are irresistible. In a second movement the long, supple melodies blend in unbelievable perfection moods of restained exaltation with moods of high and noble resignation. A third shows energies and activities beyond those of the conventional, yes, from some points of view beyond those even Beethovian scherzos. While the last, the passacaglia, combines tremendous difficulties of construction with sustained musical and emotional progress. Thus to character the movements of the symphony is no more than to hint at the beauties of the music as heard yesterday afternoon—as Dr. Koussevitzky conceives it, brings it to his hearers. Time was when Brahms's orchestration was considered drab and colorless. Yet no one has reasonably denied that that orchestration was highly suitable to the lofty thought of Brahms. And surely from Dr. Koussevitzky, no one yesterday afternoon, would have imagined that such adjectives could ever have been applied to the Brahmsian manner of handling an orchestra.

Even though Beethoven's overture was hardly more than curtain-raiser in yesterday's scheme of things, it was thrilling and exciting experience. That it is high drama in its most concentrated form, has been a commonplace of commentators these many years. The successive moods come with compelling force; the trumpet calls from back-stage are unexpected and unusual thrill for the uninitiated not much less for all but the most hopelessly blasé. And of the blasé there are few at the Tuesday afternoon concerts.

A. H. M.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Monday Farewell

At Symphony Hall last evening, the final concert of the Monday series for this season ascended through a slowly developing climax of applause. The upward trend began with Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," continued with the Prelude and Closing-Scene from Wagner's "Tristan" and came to a consummation at the end of the Second Symphony of Brahms. It was plain that the audience desired to manifest its appreciation for the six evenings of pleasure spent largely among accepted and standard works. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled to the stage many times during the course of the concert, and after the concluding number, a lingering audience extended its expressions of approval. Those inclined to the study of psychology may have found convenient labels for the response to each number. Thus, the applause for Stravinsky's ballet music seemed inspired principally by admiration; that for the excerpt from "Tristan," by affection; and that for the Symphony of Brahms, by genuine love and enthusiasm.

The reactions to the "Apollo" music from a Monday audience no less than from a Saturday and a Tuesday audience are natural and to be expected. There are those who will not accept Stravinsky no matter what guise he appears in, and who, as far as this composer is concerned, imagine themselves as Little Red Riding Hoods before a wolf in grandmother's clothes. Then, too, even to his most enthusiastic disciples Stravinsky is not quite himself in this music. Of coure, it may be argued plausibly enough that he is never more himself than when writing like somebody else; yet in his more significant pieces, whether dealing in established or modern idioms, he has led us to expect an unmistakable indivuality. In the case of "Apollo," what individuality there is comes very close to dullness and monotony. The music is as sweet and as inoffensive as the ballet pieces of Delibes and Chaikovsky; yet in assiduously avoiding the frank melodies and clear contrasts which characterize the music of these earlier composers, he opens himself to the charge of insincerity. This apparent insincerity, however, is not so much in the avoidance of what is obvious as in the accompanying sweetness of his timbres and harmonies. The tonal effect is always pleasing, but it appears to have been made so unnaturally and deliberately. For his artifice and intellect the composer wins admiration but not genuine enthusiasm.

The Prelude and Closing-Scene from "Tristan" is familiar even to a Monday audience. Hence, it is affectionately received as an old and well-liked friend, however inappropriately the phrase may seem to apply to the music in question. Into these close-packed sonorities, Dr. Koussevitzky plunges with the all consuming fervor with which he approaches any composer from Frank to Stravinsky. There is no shading, no preparatory tenseness, no exotic surge or intoxicating quiver which escapes him. All efforts drive toward the ultimate in emotional exaltation. Orchesrtally, the performance is magnificent and perhaps beyond comparison. Whether it is overaccentuated in detail, we shall leave to those who can recall the accomplishments of Dr. Muck and other exponents of German master works.

From the enthusiasm of the audience, from the excited delight of individual disciples of Brahms and from the brightness, vigor and "aliveness" of the performance itself, one is inclined in the belief that Dr. Koussevitzky surpassed himself in the Symphony. Here were contrasts, piquancies and thematic vitalities which appeared lacking in the first two pieces. The "genial" Brahms is an apt term as far as the Second Symphony is concerned. And as for Dr. Koussevitzky, he whipped the final movement to a conclusion that was exhilarating beyond memory.

N. M. J.

== The Scr

...dents and Prospects

The Daily Telegraph of London hears that Dr. Koussevitzky has accepted for production in Boston next autumn a new Symphonic Concerto for Orchestra and Piano written by Arnold Bax of the successful Symphony last winter. Miss Harriet Cohen, whom Mrs. Coolidge is bringing to America for chamber concerts, will play the piano part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 29 1930

"BOLERO"

Mr. Duffy Praises Ravel's Much-Discussed Work

To the Editor of The Courant:—

About three weeks ago,—or, to be more exact, Wednesday evening April 9, the music-lovers of Hartford were given the thrill of our lives. We are still talking about it. Our guests of honor were the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its regular conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Departing from its custom of giving Hartford concert-goers a program of chestnuts, Dr. Koussevitzky dared to thrust upon our ears, a piece by the modern Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, its title, "Bolero." The fortunate quality of this concert was that Hartfordites were quite too polite to hiss this work. They preferred to wait until our distinguished guests had departed, and then, some of us raved about the work, and others, many of whom are incompetent to judge, ripped the entire concert up the back! The important point is that Hartford was given the most unusual symphonic program perhaps in its history.

The "Bolero" of Ravel was given its first performance in this country only last November, with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Mr. Toscanini. So far as we can judge, New Yorkers went literally wild over this work. The Boston symphony gave Bostonians their first hearing of the same in December. The same organization played the work in New Haven early in March, and it is reported that it brought New Haveners to their feet! Certainly, to those attending the performance of "Bolero" in our own city, there was no evidence of dissatisfaction. Which means that Hartford differs from New York in that they are less cold-blooded during a performance of a work. We laugh with satisfaction when we are told that New Yorkers all but ousted George Antheil three years ago for daring to make such a noise as he did with his "Ballet Mecanique." Certainly, Hartford would have barred such a thing as this; in fact, there are those who are wont to believe that no composer alive would do such rank stunts.

Yet, here comes a very mild work,—a work by a very modern composer, which is very definitely in the key of C Major. "It's the same melody all the way through," cry the critics. "The same rhythm, too," they also cry out. "One hearing is enough." There are even some who listened for flaws in the various players. They usually find them; but they fail to examine the music to which they are listening.

Now, what is the significance of "Bolero"? Well, it's the rhythm, and, certainly, Ravel has given us the rhythm of the Spanish dance. But he has done more than this; he has given us a most perfect picture, musically, of the growing nervousness of the dance and the dancer. He has not simply written a piece of music with a Spanish guitar-sounding accompaniment. Rather, he has found a typical Spanish melody, and has used it over and over again, but continually adding to its sonority by his skillful use of orchestral coloring. Setting aside the fact that the players may not be able to "double" or even "triple"—in other words, realizing that not all symphony-players are jazz-hounds,—and considering the piece itself, it can truly be said that it is one of the most electrifying works that have been composed in many a year. As for a repetition of the melody, it would be interesting to ask many a music critic here to sing the melody exactly as he heard it! Will he be able to do this? Hardly. Why? Because the rhythm of the work has so captivated him that he lost sight of the melody, any more than to realize that it continually repeats itself.

Truth is, that the melody, or we may call it the Tune, if it sounds more appropriate, has several unique features about it, which make it impossible, except in the case of rare geniuses of which there are very, very few if any, existing nowadays, of memorization. In the first place, it is rhythmically distorted. And in the next place, it is different from almost any other melody extant, in that no portion of it is repeated,—in each half of the tune. For the which reason, the composer finds it advisable to repeat each half as each half is first played. There are, indeed, phrases that sound somewhat similar, but they differ. There is no one group of measures repeated in the melody proper which would cause it to be recognizable: and the melody as it stands is entirely too long for memorizing at a first, or even a second, hearing. If we examine almost any other melody, be it a folk-song or a theme of a symphony, or even a tune from any Ravel work, we find that somewhere, within the scope of from four to sixteen measures, a portion of the melody is repeated. But, here we have a theme of approximately thirty-three bars, with not a single phrase repeated. This, then, is unique, and it is strange that the world should literally go wild over a piece whose melody is so difficult of memorization. Is it any wonder, then, that Ravel, in this stunning "Bolero," repeats his first sixteen bars of melody,—literally,—and then repeats his remaining sixteen or so bars, also literally. But, with each recurrence of each portion of the theme, there is a different orchestral coloring. Is this, then, out of place, according to the formula of all true music?

Let Hartford critics not be content with a single hearing of one work before they knock it. Even such a work as Ravel's "Bolero" needs as much hearing as does Brahms' Symphony in C Minor to fully understand and appreciate it. As the present writer has once said, "If you don't like the moderns, be sure you know why you dislike them." Let no one be guided by dissonance alone.

The moderns are as scientific in their work as were the ancients; they have more to think about. Being not concerned primarily with set classical forms, but rather with the task of presenting as realistic a picture as is possible for them to conceive of in their minds, theirs is the greater task, we may well believe. And when the realistic element can combine with beauty of artistic design, as we find in all of Ravel's works, then and then only can we say that this so called modernism is really art.

JOHN J. DUFFY.

Hartford, April 28, 1930.

FINAL MONDAY CONCERT GIVEN

Wagner, Brahms, Stravinsky Pieces on List

The 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is drawing to a close. The supplementary series of Tuesday concerts ended last week, and last evening brought the sixth and final Monday concert of the year.

The recent Brahm's Festival has served Dr. Koussevitzky well in making his subsequent programmes. The Fourth Symphony of that composer re-appeared last Tuesday; next Friday and Saturday the First Symphony will bring the regular season to a close, and the Second Symphony was the final number on last evening's programme. Ahead of this, the most genial, most lyrical, if not the most considerable of the Brahms symphonies, came the Prelude and final scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," music in which Dr. Koussevitzky has ever excelled. And in turn the Wagnerian excerpts were preceded by the music of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses."

However the critics may disagree as to the actual merit of this particular score of Stravinsky's, its bland tunefulness, its occasional brilliance, its felicitous scoring for string orchestra, win it favor with every audience that hears it, and that of last evening was no exception. The music of Brahms, and of Wagner, too, was likewise warmly applauded, as both pieces and performances well deserved.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPOKANE, WASH.
Spokesman Review

An Imported Pianist Fills Difficult Role

Importing a pianist for two performances is a thing an orchestra rarely does. Therefore, when the Boston Symphony appeared last week in New York with Arthur Schnabel presented to play two piano concertos on the all-Brahms programs we wondered at Manager Brennan's sudden extravagance.

After these performances, in which Conductor Koussevitzky displayed so much tenseness and staccato that one's nerves were left quivering, it was quite apparent that Schnabel fitted into the scheme of things in an eminent degree. For it would be difficult to imagine a more aggressive and physically brilliant playing of the Brahms B flat and the Brahms D minor concertos. Suavity and beauty of tone one never expects from Schnabel, and the absence of these qualities was consequently not disappointing.

But the minority listeners who did not feel compensated in Schnabel's accomplishments—among whom I was one—were made to feel out of place by the enthusiasm of the majority auditors who applauded the stocky, business looking Schnabel until their palms must have ached.

POPS PROGRAM

Arthur Fiedler announces the program for the opening night of the Pops season in Symphony hall, which will begin on Wednesday, May 7. This will be the 45th season of the Pops which, with the aid of refreshments and smoking at the tables, are the most sociable concerts in America. A greater success than ever is anticipated under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, the new conductor. A member of the orchestra for a number of years, Mr. Fiedler has become particularly prominent recently as conductor of chamber concerts, as the organizer and conductor of the Esplanade concerts last summer, and as the leader of the Cecilia Society.

The opening program for May 7 follows:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes	R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung"	Wagner
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler
Bolero	Ravel
Selection, "New Moon"	Romberg
Whispering Flowers	Blon
American Fantasy	Herbert

SYMPHONY IN FINAL MONDAY CONCERT

Program of Stravinsky, Brahms and Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, gave in Symphony Hall last evening the sixth and last concert of this season's Monday evening series.

The program comprised works from the standard Symphony repertory; Stravinsky's Ballet, "Apollon Musagete"; the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Stravinsky's ballet music was meticulously patterned and excellently played. This deceptive and fascinating music holds a deal of cunning beneath a surface that seems to be relatively simple. The brilliance of the melody, on second examination, appears to be the glint from something as carefully and as strongly fashioned as chain armor. Of the applause that followed, Richard Burgin, concert-master, received especial acclaim for graceful and delicate playing of the solo violin part.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Tristan" excerpts was not, to one, the best in all respects that he has done here. There was eventual full emotional sweep and abundant tonal color, but the piece began rather lifelessly, without the high-powered dramatic undercurvent apparent in the opening measures. Tone became muddy in the climaxes.

The high water mark of orchestral transparency and euphony was found in the Brahms symphony. Dr Koussevitsky, at his best in this, evoked to the full the orchestral coloring and made the most of the concluding sonorities. The profusion of graceful, vital melodies that flowed from an orchestral Brahms in rare expansive mood were sung warmly and joyously.

A tabulation of the pieces played this season at the Monday evening concerts reveals the programs to have been very conservative. There were but two or three works which could be called "novelties." Honegger's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra received at the fourth Monday concert its Boston premiere. With the exception of perhaps six or seven works, little was heard at these concerts that had not been written before the turn of the century.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra received from the listeners final expression of the utmost approval and admiration.

As the Tuesday Symphonies End

YESTERDAY afternoon the Tuesday Symphony series, the last to begin in the season, was the first to come to a close. They ended with a concert that included Beethoven, even as they had begun with a concert that included Beethoven. In the first concert Beethoven was coupled with Bach and Mozart. Yesterday Beethoven was joined with Brahms. It has been a series, as the Tuesday series usually is, in which almost all of the great ones have contributed of their choicest works: Bach and Handel; Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; Schubert, Schumann and Wagner (of the Romanticists, Mendelssohn and Berlioz were omitted this year); Franck, Brahms and Chaikovsky; Strauss, Debussy and Ravel. Of the more recent moderns there were none. A single novelty—Ravel's "Bolero"—stood upon the season's program.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played two symphonies and an overture. The symphonies were Beethoven's sixth, called the "Pastoral"; Brahms's fourth. The overture was Beethoven's so-called "Leonore No. 3." The program, about five minutes short of two hours, would have been long enough without the overture. But the number of late-comers amply justified the presence of an overture at the beginning. Even with the overture for first piece, there were those who did not see fit to arrive until after the first movement of the symphony. And the continuity of the "Pastoral" prefers to remain unbroken.

Dr. Koussevitzky was entirely in the vein with this music. The gentle, placid "Pastoral" went its way through smiling fields; by the side of the purling brook; through the droll peasant dances; through the storm with the sunshine just around the corner, the storm which makes its point just as surely as though it had been set loose by Straussian or Stravinskian machinery, the storm, however, which would not drive many a hardy soul indoors; and finally, through the pious thanksgivings and rejoicing of the good peasant folk. Such qualities the conductor emphasizes in this score. The deeply emotional he does not seek there; the flashingly brilliant he does not superimpose upon this music; the aggressively stirring he does not distil out of it. The answer is that such things are not inherent in the music. Wisely, Dr. Koussevitzky does not read them into it. The more difficult thing he attempts—and eminently accomplishes—of allowing this symphony to run its restrained course on levels low in color, placid in emotional content. To give it interest in these uninflated planes is not much less than marvel of interpretation. Beethoven in good humor, contemplating Nature, that is the music, that is the conductor's way with it.

To the Beethoven in whom are mingled verdant spring and drowsy summer, succeeded the Brahms of mellow, darkening autumnal qualities. The programmist in his comprehensive researches discovered that Brahms once had doubts about the value of this, his last symphony. Such doubts the world has long since resolved. To us the towering outlines, the somber yet rich glowing moods are irresistible. In a second movement the long, supple melodies blend in unbelievable perfection moods of restained exaltation with moods of high and noble resignation. A third shows energies and activities beyond those of the conventional, yes, from some points of view beyond those even Beethovian scherzos. While the last, the passacaglia, combines tremendous difficulties of construction with sustained musical and emotional progress. Thus to character the movements of the symphony is no more than to hint at the beauties of the music as heard yesterday afternoon—as Dr. Koussevitzky conceives it, brings it to his hearers. Time was when Brahms's orchestration was considered drab and colorless. Yet no one has reasonably denied that that orchestration was highly suitable to the lofty thought of Brahms. And surely from Dr. Koussevitzky, no one yesterday afternoon, would have imagined that such adjectives could ever have been applied to the Brahmsian manner of handling an orchestra.

Even though Beethoven's overture was hardly more than curtain-raiser in yesterday's scheme of things, it was thrilling and exciting experience. That it is high drama in its most concentrated form, has been a commonplace of commentators these many years. The successive moods come with compelling force; the trumpet calls from back-stage are unexpected and unusual thrill for the uninitiated not much less for all but the most hopelessly blasé. And of the blasé there are few at the Tuesday afternoon concerts.

A. H. M.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Monday Farewell

AT Symphony Hall last evening, the final concert of the Monday series for this season ascended through a slowly developing climax of applause. The upward trend began with Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," continued with the Prelude and Closing-Scene from Wagner's "Tristan" and came to a consummation at the end of the Second Symphony of Brahms. It was plain that the audience desired to manifest its appreciation for the six evenings of pleasure spent largely among accepted and standard works. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled to the stage many times during the course of the concert, and after the concluding number, a lingering audience extended its expressions of approval. Those inclined to the study of psychology may have found convenient labels for the response to each number. Thus, the applause for Stravinsky's ballet music seemed inspired principally by admiration; that for the excerpt from "Tristan," by affection; and that for the Symphony of Brahms, by genuine love and enthusiasm.

The reactions to the "Apollo" music from a Monday audience no less than from a Saturday and a Tuesday audience are natural and to be expected. There are those who will not accept Stravinsky no matter what guise he appears in, and who, as far as this composer is concerned, imagine themselves as Little Red Riding Hoods before a wolf in grandmother's clothes. Then, too, even to his most enthusiastic disciples Stravinsky is not quite himself in this music. Of coure, it may be argued plausibly enough that he is never more himself than when writing like somebody else; yet in his more significant pieces, whether dealing in established or modern idioms, he has led us to expect an unmistakable indivuality. In the case of "Apollo," what individuality there is comes very close to dullness and monotony. The music is as sweet and as inoffensive as the ballet pieces of Delibes and Chaikovsky; yet in assiduously avoiding the frank melodies and clear contrasts which characterize the music of these earlier composers, he opens himself to the charge of insincerity. This apparent insincerity, however, is not so much in the avoidance of what is obvious as in the accompanying sweetness of his timbres and harmonies. The tonal effect is always pleasing, but it appears to have been made so unnaturally and deliberately. For his artifice and intellect the composer wins admiration but not genuine enthusiasm.

The Prelude and Closing-Scene from "Tristan" is familiar even to a Monday audience. Hence, it is affectionately received as an old and well-liked friend, however inappropriately the phrase may seem to apply to the music in question. Into these close-packed sonorities, Dr. Koussevitzky plunges with the all consuming fervor with which he approaches any composer from Frank to Stravinsky. There is no shading, no preparatory tenseness, no exotic surge or intoxicating quiver which escapes him. All efforts drive toward the ultimate in emotional exaltation. Orchesrtally, the performance is magnificent and perhaps beyond comparison. Whether it is overaccentuated in detail, we shall leave to those who can recall the accomplishments of Dr. Muck and other exponents of German master works.

From the enthusiasm of the audience, from the excited delight of individual disciples of Brahms and from the brightness, vigor and "aliveness" of the performance itself, one is inclined in the belief that Dr. Koussevitzky surpassed himself in the Symphony. Here were contrasts, piquancies and thematic vitalities which appeared lacking in the first two pieces. The "genial" Brahms is an apt term as far as the Second Symphony is concerned. And as for Dr. Koussevitzky, he whipped the final movement to a conclusion that was exhilarating beyond memory.

N. M. J.

== The Scr

...ents and Prospects

The Daily Telegraph of London hears that Dr. Koussevitzky has accepted for production in Boston next autumn a new Symphonic Concerto for Orchestra and Piano written by Arnold Bax of the successful Symphony last winter. Miss Harriet Cohen, whom Mrs. Coolidge is bringing to America for chamber concerts, will play the piano-part.

FINAL MONDAY CONCERT GIVEN

Wagner, Brahms, Stravinsky Pieces on List

The 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is drawing to a close. The supplementary series of Tuesday concerts ended last week, and last evening brought the sixth and final Monday concert of the year.

The recent Brahm's Festival has served Dr. Koussevitzky well in making his subsequent programmes. The Fourth Symphony of that composer re-appeared last Tuesday; next Friday and Saturday the First Symphony will bring the regular season to a close, and the Second Symphony was the final number on last evening's programme. Ahead of this, the most genial, most lyrical, if not the most considerable of the Brahms symphonies, came the Prelude and final scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," music in which Dr. Koussevitzky has ever excelled. And in turn the Wagnerian excerpts were preceded by the music of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Leader of the Muses."

However the critics may disagree as to the actual merit of this particular score of Stravinsky's, its bland tunefulness, its occasional brilliance, its felicitous scoring for string orchestra, will it favor with every audience that hears it, and that of last evening was no exception. The music of Brahms, and of Wagner, too, was likewise warmly applauded, as both pieces and performances well deserved.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 29 1930

"BOLERO"

Mr. Duffy Praises Ravel's Much-Discussed Work

To the Editor of The Courant:—

About three weeks ago,—or, to be more exact, Wednesday evening April 9, the music-lovers of Hartford were given the thrill of our lives. We are still talking about it. Our guests of honor were the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its regular conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Departing from its custom of giving Hartford concert-goers a program of chestnuts, Dr. Koussevitzky dared to thrust upon our ears, a piece by the modern Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, its title, "Bolero." The fortunate quality of this concert was that Hartfordites were quite too polite to hiss this work. They preferred to wait until our distinguished guests had departed, and then, some of us raved about the work, and others, many of whom are incompetent to judge, ripped the entire concert up the back! The important point is that Hartford was given the most unusual symphonic program perhaps in its history.

The "Bolero" of Ravel was given its first performance in this country only last November, with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Mr. Toscanini. So far as we can judge, New Yorkers went literally wild over this work. The Boston symphony gave Bostonians their first hearing of the same in December. The same organization played the work in New Haven early in March, and it is reported that it brought New Haveners to their feet! Certainly, to those attending the performance of "Bolero" in our own city, there was no evidence of dissatisfaction. Which means that Hartford differs from New York in that they are less cold-blooded during a performance of a work. We laugh with satisfaction when we are told that New Yorkers all but ousted George Antheil three years ago for daring to make such a noise as he did with his "Ballet Mecanique." Certainly, Hartford would have barred such a thing as this; in fact, there are those who are wont to believe that no composer alive would do such rank stunts.

Yet, here comes a very mild work,—a work by a very modern composer, which is very definitely in the key of C Major. "It's the same melody all the way through," cry the critics. "The same rhythm, too," they also cry out. "One hearing is enough." There are even some who listened for flaws in the various players. They usually find them; but they fail to examine the music to which they are listening.

Now, what is the significance of "Bolero"? Well, it's the rhythm, and, certainly, Ravel has given us the rhythm of the Spanish dance. But he has done more than this; he has given us a most perfect picture, musically, of the growing nervousness of the dance and the dancer. He has not simply written a piece of music with a Spanish guitar-sounding accompaniment. Rather, he has found a typical Spanish melody, and has used it over and over again, but continually adding to its sonority by his skillful use of orchestral coloring. Setting aside the fact that the players may not be able to "double" or even "triple"—in other words, realizing that not all symphony-players are jazz-hounds,—and considering the piece itself, it can truly be said that it is one of the most electrifying works that have been composed in many a year. As for a repetition of the melody, it would be interesting to ask many a music critic here to sing the melody exactly as he heard it! Will he be able to do this? Hardly. Why? Because the rhythm of the work has so captivated him that he lost sight of the melody, any more than to realize that it continually repeats itself.

Truth is, that the melody, or we may call it the Tune, if it sounds more appropriate, has several unique features about it, which make it impossible, except in the case of rare geniuses of which there are very, very few if any, existing nowadays, of memorization. In the first place, it is rhythmically distorted. And in the next place, it is different from almost any other melody extant, in that no portion of it is repeated,—in each half of the tune. For the which reason, the composer finds it advisable to repeat each half as each half is first played. There are, indeed, phrases that sound somewhat similar, but they differ. There is no one group of measures repeated in the melody proper which would cause it to be recognizable: and the melody as it stands is entirely too long for memorizing at a first, or even a second, hearing. If we examine almost any other melody, be it a folk-song or a theme of a symphony, or even a tune from any Ravel work, we find that somewhere, within the scope of from four to sixteen measures, a portion of the melody is repeated. But, here we have a theme of approximately thirty-three bars, with not a single phrase repeated. This, then, is unique, and it is strange that the world should literally go wild over a piece whose melody is so difficult of memorization. Is it any wonder, then, that Ravel, in this stunning "Bolero," repeats his first sixteen bars of melody,—literally,—and then repeats his remaining sixteen or so bars, also literally. But, with each recurrence of each portion of the theme, there is a different orchestral coloring. Is this, then, out of place, according to the formula of all true music?

Let Hartford critics not be content with a single hearing of one work before they knock it. Even such a work as Ravel's "Bolero" needs as much hearing as does Brahms' Symphony in C Minor to fully understand and appreciate it. As the present writer has once said, "If you don't like the moderns, be sure you know why you dislike them." Let no one be guided by dissonance alone.

The moderns are as scientific in their work as were the ancients; they have more to think about. Being not concerned primarily with set classical forms, but rather with the task of presenting as realistic a picture as is possible for them to conceive of in their minds, theirs is the greater task, we may well believe. And when the realistic element can combine with beauty of artistic design, as we find in all of Ravel's works, then and then only can we say that this so called modernism is really art.

JOHN J. DUFFY.

Hartford, April 28, 1930.

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Player

Koussevitzky's Sixth Year at Symphony Hall

Tireless Pains, No Routine, New Courses, Few Regrets, Americans Fostered

As parsons set texts before their sermons, so shall Dr. Koussevitzky's final programs for the current series of Symphony Concerts give cue for casual, rambling retrospect. . . . Opening number on the list, a week ago, was a little Symphony of Mozart in C major. The first and the third of the three movements are bright and gallant. With them conductor and orchestra gained remarkable lightness and plasticity of motion, resiliency and transparency of tone. The intervening slow movement was played with rare felicity of pace and accent, grace of phrasing and transition, delicacy and sweetness of voice. Throughout, the lighter Mozartian quality in general, the particular quality of this Symphony in C major, ran unclouded and unalloyed. Neither was intensified because neither will bear that process; but each was preserved, clarified, animated. Throughout, again, the orchestra was adept, refined, immediately responsive, instrument. Without re-traversing the record—a tedious business—often in the course of the year, it has given proof of such merit.

Now, inspiration is a pretty, if rather weary, word, as easy to knock about in the commerce of the concert-hall as a ball in the tennis court. But inspiration does not bring these things to pass. Insistent, exacting rehearsal accomplishes them, continuing until every detail of performance is shaped and fixed in the conductor's mind, conveyed to the orchestra, there established and enlivened. In the concerts themselves, ease and surety are born of this prepared confidence. Inspiration enters only when the stimulus of public and testing occasion spurs such spontaneity. Most hearers think of Dr. Koussevitzky as the ardent, imperious master of the orchestra, firing it to his will, whipping it to his intensities, out of it, through himself, giving the composer voice and life. They forget the other Koussevitzky, tireless in the mutual work of rehearsal, ceaseless in the pursuit of perfection, discovering the means thereto, imposing them to the utmost of human limitation. Yet it is this Koussevitzky who achieves such performances as that of Mozart's little Symphony or, with Mr. Schnabel, of Brahms's full-freighted Piano-Concertos. Oftener than most, conductor and orchestra gain this adeptness. At the will of the composer into beauty it flowers. When they fall short, remember the human variability of creative or re-creative work.

—

At the other end of the program last week stood Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan." Repertory piece—said the knowing—always half-ready after thirty years of performance at Symphony Hall, convenient to fill a gap in the list. Yet when the final dissonance sounded, one and all had heard the poem with the first fires renewed, the passion of proclamation and progress fresh-heated, the power intensified, the sensuous and the charactering quality deep-bitten into listening imagination. Excitement done, admiration hesitated between the sweep, glow and pulse of the whole, the lucidity, significance and proportioning of each detail. Had the moment been the first performance of a new-found and acclaimed masterpiece, conductor and orchestra could not have been more on their mettle. Nor was this "Don Juan" a mere occasion, a tour de force springing out of nowhere, into it vanishing. In these years at Symphony Hall, it is custom to play "standard pieces" as though they were discoveries, not obligations or conveniences; to reanimate music long neglected. A new life gives the reason.

For Dr. Koussevitzky there is no routine. In his little book about acting Mr. Gillette insisted that the player must nightly create "the illusion of the first time." That is to say, his speech and action must seem the impulse and the expression of the given moment newly experienced. Dr. Koussevitzky is the perpetual embodiment of that illusion. How many times here and elsewhere has he conducted in the Symphonies of Chaikovsky, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, in miscellaneous pieces out of Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, other standard composers! The patient editor of the program-book, with a taste for statistics, might hardly count them. Yet each performance sees a new adventure for Dr. Koussevitzky, awakening and stretching his technic powers, quickening his insight, enlarging or correcting his imagination, stirring him to ampler or finer accomplishment. Even the "New World" Symphony of Dvořák, the "organ" Symphony of Saint-Saëns, the "Alpine Symphony" of Strauss, nothing daunt him.

A conductor has two imperative duties with the classics—to make them sound as fresh and vital, after years, as they did to the first audiences; to make them sound also as a new generation of listeners would hear them. (If the shade of Gericke were to revisit Symphony Hall and conduct in the First or the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, most of us might believe his version deplorably unemotional. If we listened to Weingartner in Beethoven, we should count the performance no better than mid-Victorian.) A conductor is equally bound to keep to his original conviction with the more enduring moderns—that from them proceeds new rhythm, new color, new manipulation of form and means, new outlet for musical thought and emotion. Lose that conviction and he is only following the symphonic fashion of the hour. Dr. Koussevitzky fulfills the double obligation to the classics; keeps his faith in the moderns. Hence the unabating vitality of the Symphony Concerts through the six years of his conductorship. The open mind, the tireless hand, the quenchless spirit have prevailed. There is new ripening and refining as well. Far above 1924, most sit before him, expectantly, confidently.

—

Turn now to the program for the concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. The second number is Mr. Hill's tone-poem —on a hint from Amy Lowell—"Lilacs." Not long ago, it was "new: first times" and played a little tentatively. Like all music worth the name, it required to be heard—not read; to be performed publicly to make full effect. Its interest and merit were then plain; but so are the interest and the merit of other pieces newly produced. They crowd so fast one upon another that the best-balanced conductor tends to forget the old loves for the new. An approved "novelty"; then comparative oblivion. Little by little, Dr. Koussevitzky seems to be repairing this error in American orchestral courses. He returns to Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and Mr. Walton's "Portsmouth Point." He repeats Mr. Bax's new Symphony and Sibelius's freshly heard Sixth; keeps Stravinsky's "Apollo" in the active repertory; remembers Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite"; finds room for de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." If there are to be perennial classics, there should also be repeated moderns and modernists. Dr. Koussevitzky has discovered the necessity; now sets the example.

Mr. Hill is an American composer. Above any other conductor, now practicing on this side of the Atlantic—unless it is Mr. Stock in Chicago—Dr. Koussevitzky gives them opportunity. Mr. Toscanini in New York seldom forsakes his fellow-Italians; Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia wanders from field to field. Of late new Russians have enamored him. To discovered, rising or established Europeans Dr. Koussevitzky holds out, as he should, a welcoming hand. He is as warmly disposed (as again he should be) to Americans. This season, Mr. Chadwick is honored; Mr. Hill repeated; Mr. Loeffler remembered; Mr. Gardner disclosed; Mr. Josten and Mr. Piston tested; Mr. Eichheim called; Mr. Gruenberg given double room. On the conductor's table for performance next year—it is an open secret—lie a Second Symphony from Mr. Hill, a first Symphony from Mr. Copland. In a word, Dr. Koussevitzky holds American composers to the same standards, gives them also the same consideration and opportunity, as he follows with Europeans. There is no more to be asked; no more to be done. It is the way of a just, open, wisely fostering mind.

—

At the Symphony Concerts, last week, Mr. Dukelsky's Second Symphony was produced. Again Dr. Koussevitzky as the friend of young abilities. No less to the American Gardner; the Hungarian Lazar; the Corsican Martelli. Various epitaphs are written for men when they finish their work, withdraw and die. Dr. Koussevitzky will deserve one of the choicest and rarest: friend and encourager of youth. And to no neglect of the preceding, semi-established but still ripening generation. Bax, Honegger, Prokofiev, are the proof. And the approved masters—there was the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; his Violin-Concerto; Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" and "Blessed Damozel"; the whole Brahms Festival. Upon the reviewer's desk drop the programs of this, that and the other symphony orchestra. His eye runs casually down programs in London, Paris, Berlin. Scarcely a conductor chooses his new pieces more widely and deservingly than Dr. Koussevitzky; keeps better balance between ancients and moderns, classics and modernists; with one hand condescends (no oftener than he must) to his less sophisticated and curious public; with the other cultivates his larger, finer ambitions.

So to the final grumbling without which any restrospect of a symphonic year would be incomplete. . . . Last season, Dr. Koussevitzky bravely began the restoration of Bruckner and Mahler to warrantable place in the Symphony Concerts. The public was responsive; there was reason to continue; but neither composer returned. . . . Since the days of Dr. Muck, only transcriptions by Schönberg and his early "Verklarte Nacht" have been heard at Symphony Hall. As not a few believe, it is time to hear him at least once in his present theory and practice, singular, "cerebral" and forbidding though they be. Dr. Koussevitzky announced the recent "Variations"; then put them by. Philadelphia and New York heard them from Mr. Stokowski; but neither city is Boston; . . . Once more most listened gladly to the Strauss of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," the "Domestica." But after six years of waiting why not "Don Quixote" —music in which Dr. Koussevitzky should excel? . . . At single hearing in a piano concerto, Toch seemed an engaging modernist. Is he a composer of one piece? If not, why not more of him? . . . There is Constant Lambert of "Rio Grande" which as symphonic jazz carried all before it in reluctant London. Shall we enjoy the piece next season? . . . For the orchestra, does Dr. Koussevitzky quite hear the clarinets as some hear them in a wind choir otherwise weekly pleasure? . . . But next year brings an all-absorbing fiftieth anniversary. And there you are. H. T. P.

"From the American"

Some of Our Plays May Soon Need Translation into English

THE TIME is coming nearer when American plays will be brought to London in a definitely English version, which will be at the same time a translation of the text and an adaptation of the setting. Already an American play of the racy, colloquial sort contains hundreds of words that are unknown to the English dictionary, and scores that are unknown to the cultivated American, say, of the Middle West. For the present these words pass current on the stage in their original shape, because they suggest fresh images and thus explain themselves; but they multiply so fast that they will have to be translated.

Not that the dictionary, as dictionary, will ever rule the theater. The rich blood of common speech, whether in Irish peasant huts or Broadway night clubs, will always renew the vitality of dramatic dialogue; but the American translator of English and the English translator of American will yet have their turn on the stage, and that before many years. [Ashley Dukes in "The World to Play With"

Dated Moscow—1914

Koussevitzky in Younger Years

From a Russian Postcard in The Archives of The Transcript

94

'he Guard": Gilbert's Text, Published with Illustrations by Messrs.

BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN—Largest Evening Circulation

EL TO 'ALL QUIET

M

SYMP

The Bost
Koussevitzk and last co
terday afternoon in Symphony hall; last with the exception of the repetition tonight. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnolle. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience; in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality, of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse, modern tendencies unskilfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 88 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero, Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijsh, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, 'cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Stauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahm's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazounov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

BOSTON'S MUSIC SEASON REVIEWED BY CRITIC

By MOSES SMITH

BOSTON IS ABOUT to celebrate, officially, its 300th birthday. What is its status as a capital of music? Let us take the season just passed, assuming it to be average, and we shall see. The very center of Boston's musical season is the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following the grand and now almost legendary regime of Karl Muck, the fortunes and reputation of this orchestra sank considerably. The coming of Serge Koussevitsky, six years ago, rekindled interest, beyond even that under Muck.

FOR THE FIRST TIME, both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts were sold out for the season in advance. This condition has continued. In addition, the orchestra has re-established itself, here and in the cities it visits, as one of the greatest in the world. Mr. Koussevitzky was intensely disliked here by many because of his persistence in featuring new and unheard scores on his programs. I was among those who felt that he was neglecting the classics in favor of shoddy modern musical material. I am glad to say that these six years have been an education for me. Many of the pieces that have been introduced are not worth playing a second time, and have not, in fact, been repeated. But this is inevitable; it is the penalty of an open mind. On the other hand, this catholicity has enabled us to hear and see in what way the modern musical speech is tending. It has given us an opportunity to hear some first-rate musical works, and some second-rate ones, too, that have been worth hearing.

Serge Koussevitzky

* * *

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has had faults, which his detractors have exaggerated, I regret to say. He still has some. But even his severest critics admit that in the six years he has been in Boston he has broadened as an interpreter, become riper and maturer.

There is no competitor of, or supplement to, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and there should be. The People's Symphony Orchestra occupied that position for ten years—ever more hazardously. During the last years its concerts have become only occasional. Its attempt was perhaps brave; it was undoubtedly, on the other hand, poorly managed.

The chamber orchestra has been almost nonexistent here. One or two concerts through the whole season indicated that Boston doesn't want them. Other forms of chamber music have alternately flourished and suffered. On the whole, however, I should say that we have been fortunate. There have been more worthwhile concerts of string quartets and trios than in any previous season I can recall—and here numbers are significant.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THE SPUR

OME AND GO ON T C

OFF ON A VACATION

And a well-merited one it will be for Sergei Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony

Symphony Season's End for Cambridge

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season in Cambridge. The program followed the same lines of the concerts in Symphony Hall today and tomorrow, save only that in Cambridge the symphony was Brahms's second instead of Brahms's first, as at Symphony Hall, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, and the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, which this year has several times distinguished itself at Cambridge, played at top bent. No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him: as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history.

In the midst of all this no work fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem, "Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman. "Lilacs" was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. "Lilacs" derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of last evening becomes apparent.

It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to "Oberon." The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitements of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell.

A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning could have been made than with this overture.

And after "Lilacs" had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by "Oberon," there followed the four divisions of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody,"—the mysterious prelude, "To the Night," the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant "Feria." Again at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow in Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances, the almost improvisational Malaguena, the more definitely rhythmed Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the "Feria." Again the orchestra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsodic suite rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a Brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries who he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. Last evening was but one more example of that high service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS

JUN 3 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY CELEBRATES 50TH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY NEXT YEAR

Next season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. The glorious occasion will be made thrice more glorious by the rendition of new pieces by two of our foremost living composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff for Director Sergei Koussevitzky has commissioned these masters to compose pieces especially for the great event. The selections will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra, according to W. H. Brennan, veteran manager of the Boston orchestra.

If satisfactory arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will wield his old baton for a few moments to add to the glory of the commemoration. Sir Henschel, now living in London and in Scotland, enjoys splendid health, coaches prominent musicians, and receives well merited veneration.

An unofficial report has it that the jubilee programs will include a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who again has been scoring conductorial successes in Paris this spring, has not yet made definite program decision in that regard.

94

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 24th and last concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall; last night, with the exception of the repetition tonight. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill, "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnolle. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience; in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality, of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse. Modern tendencies unskilfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 88 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero, Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijsh, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, 'cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahm's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazounov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

...ion in New England — Largest Evening Circulation

...EL TO 'ALL QUIET

BOSTON'S MUSIC SEASON REVIEWED BY CRITIC

By MOSES SMITH

BOSTON IS ABOUT to celebrate, officially, its 300th birthday. What is its status as a capital of music? Let us take the season just passed, assuming it to be average, and we shall see. The very center of Boston's musical season is the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following the grand and now almost legendary regime of Karl Muck, the fortunes and reputation of this orchestra sank considerably. The coming of Serge Koussevitsky, six years ago, rekindled interest, beyond even that under Muck.

FOR THE FIRST TIME, both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts were sold out for the season in advance. This condition has continued. In addition, the orchestra has re-established itself, here and in the cities it visits, as one of the greatest in the world. Mr. Koussevitzky was intensely disliked here by many because of his persistence in featuring new and unheard scores on his programs. I was among those who felt that he was neglecting the classics in favor of shoddy modern musical material. I am glad to say that these six years have been an education for me. Many of the pieces that have been introduced are not worth playing a second time, and ave not, in fact, been repeated. But this is inevitable; it is the penalty of an open mind. On the other hand, this catholicity has enabled us to hear and see in what way the modern musical speech is tending. It has given us an opportunity to hear some first-rate musical works, and some second-rate ones, too, that have been worth hearing.

Serge Koussevitzky

* * *

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has had faults, which his detractors have exaggerated, I regret to say. He still has some. But even his severest critics admit that in the six years he has been in Boston he has broadened as an interpreter, become riper and maturer.

There is no competitor of, or supplement to, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and there should be. The People's Symphony Orchestra occupied that position for ten years—ever more hazardously. During the last years its concerts have become only occasional. Its attempt was perhaps brave; it was undoubtedly, on the other hand, poorly managed.

The chamber orchestra has been almost nonexistent here. One or two concerts through the whole season indicated that Boston doesn't want them. Other forms of chamber music have alternately flourished and suffered. On the whole, however, I should say that we have been fortunate. There have been more worthwhile concerts of string quartets and trios than in any previous season I can recall—and here numbers are significant.

* * *

...he Guard"; Gilbert's Text, Published with Illustrations by ...

Symphony Season's End for Cambridge

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season in Cambridge. The program followed the same lines of the concerts in Symphony Hall today and tomorrow, save only that in Cambridge the symphony was Brahms's second instead of Brahms's first, as at Symphony Hall, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, and the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, which this year has several times distinguished itself at Cambridge, played at top bent. No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him: as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history.

In the midst of all this no work fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem, "Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman. "Lilacs" was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. "Lilacs" derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of last evening becomes apparent.

It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to "Oberon." The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitements of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell. A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning could have been made than with this overture.

And after "Lilacs" had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by "Oberon," there followed the four divisions of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody,"—the mysterious prelude, "To the Night," the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant "Feria." Again, at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow it, Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances, the almost improvisational Malaguena, the more definitely rhythmed Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the "Feria." Again the oerchstra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsodic suite rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a Brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries whom he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. Last evening was but one more example of that high service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THE SPUR
JUN 15 1930

...OME AND GO ON T...C

OFF ON A VACATION

And a well-merited one it will be for Sergei ... Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS
JUN 3 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY CELEBRATES 50TH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY NEXT YEAR

Next season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. The glorious occasion will be made thrice more glorious by the rendition of new pieces by two of our foremost living composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff for Director Sergei Koussevitzky has commissioned these masters to compose pieces especially for the great event. The selections will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra, according to W. H. Brennan, veteran manager of the Boston orchestra.

If satisfactory arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will wield his old baton for a few moments to add to the glory of the commemoration. Sir Henschel, now living in London and in Scotland, enjoys splendid health, coaches prominent musicians, and receives well merited veneration.

An unofficial report has it that the jubilee programs will include a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who again has been scoring conductorial successes in Paris this spring, has not yet made definite program decision in that regard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JUN 1 2 1930

MUSIC ASSOCIATION STILL NEEDS $950

Total of $9050 Reached to Support Symphony and Other Concerts.

YEAR'S PROGRAM EXTENDED

Organization Decides to Sponsor Concert by High School Orchestras Sunday

With plans for the Boston Symphony and Music Association concerts almost complete, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, announced yesterday that $950 is still needed to complete the $10,000 sponsors' subscription necessary to finance the program for next season.

Subscriptions have been coming in steadily to the Music Association office in the Gas Company building until a total of $9050 has been reached, but officers of the association have been reluctant to approve the complete program for the coming season until financial support for the best in music has been assured.

Although not included in its original plans, the Music Association committee recently decided to sponsor the coming concert by the combined high school orchestras and bands under the direction of Walter H. Butterfield. Mrs. Sharpe said yesterday that this innovation is in line with the Music Association's desire to encourage good music throughout the city.

Want to Lay Foundations

"Some day," Mrs. Sharpe said, "the Masonic temple will be completed and Providence will have an appropriate place to which we can bring the outstanding persons in the field of music and other cultural pursuits. Until that time we are forced to underwrite the Boston Symphony appearances at the Albee Theatre and expend considerable energy in bringing worthwhile attractions to Infantry Hall.

"The Music Association is confident that the public in Providence wants to hear the best in music and for that reason we are continuing with our efforts to keep the Music Association actively interested in worth-while programs. It is our hope that this year's fund for the support of the Boston Symphony and other 1930-1931 concerts will be fully subscribed so that we can lay the foundations for the brilliant music future which we are sure is in store for the people of our city. Those of us who go to the Benedict Monument to Music next Sunday afternoon will, I am sure, be agreeably pleased and perhaps surprised by the wealth of music training and ability inspired by Mr. Butterfield and his corps of teachers. The Music Association is pleased to have this opportunity to bring to public attention the excellent work that is being done by the pupils in our high schools."

Additional Subscriptions

Recent subscriptions to the Music Association Fund not previously acknowledged are as follows:

$500—John Nicholas Brown: $300—Miss Ellen D. Sharpe; $100—Mrs. Jane R. Callender; Chaminade Club (for the Boston Symphony Concerts); Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. James R. MacColl, Helen A. C. Merriman, Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, Mrs. Fred L. Smith and the Mary C. Wheeler School.

$50—Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. R. H. Ives Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones, Mr. and Mrs. A. Livingston Kelley, Mrs. William Davis Miller, Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James Richardson, Mrs. Benjamin F. Stower and Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh.

$25—Frances B. Boone, Helen G. Chase, Mrs. Robert Dresser, Arthur C. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Graves, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Annette M. Ham, Mrs. Herbert I. Hinckley, Louise C. Hoppin, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Mrs. Elizabeth Goff Wood, Mrs. E. R. Trowbridge and the Monday Morning Musical Club.

$20—Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. James Elgar, Mrs. James F. Phetteplace; $10—Mrs. Walter S. Ball, Ida F. Bridgham, Mrs. Mildred E. Brown, Mary Green Chapin, B. Lindsey Cummings, the Dilletanti Club, Emily Diman, Mrs. Edith J. Green, Mrs. Sarah M. Green, Mrs. Mary Louise Gross, Elmer S. Hosmer, Mrs. Alice M. Johnson, Alice Loraine Johnson, Evangeline Larry, MacDowell Club, Margaret S. Morriss, George F. Phillips, Albert K. Potter, Belle C. Russell, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mrs. George B. Waterhouse, Mrs. George H. Webb, L. C. B. McCullough, Mrs. Dexter B. Potter and Mrs. Archibald Silverman.

$5—Miss Janet Blinkhorn, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Edwards, Anna L. Evans, Marjorie W. Freeman, Miriam Hosmer, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Medbery, Emily S. Paddock, Mrs. Walter P. Pierce, Rev. Henry M. Saville, Carrie Schmitt, Carrie Lee Smith, Mary Caver Smith, Ruth Whipple, C. S. Wing and Ellis L. Yatman.

$2—Helen H. Hatch and Deaconess Frances Semle.

FINAL PROGRAM OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Dr Koussevitzky and Orchestra Cheered

Music by Prof Hill, Ravel, Weber and Brahms' First Symphony Played

Globe May 3

Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were greeted with exceptionally cordial applause yesterday afternoon at the beginning of the final concert of the Friday series. At the end of the concert the audience remained for some minutes, stamping its feet, and finally cheering conductor and players. The program, to be repeated tonight, included Prof E. B. Hill's "Lilacs," Weber's overtuer to "Oberon," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Brahms' First Symphony.

The 50th season of Boston Symphony concerts, Dr Koussevitzky, conductor, will begin Oct 10. This season's subscribers, if they wish to retain their seats for next year, should apply promptly, as the lengthy visiting list will probably absorb all season tickets not reengaged by the present holders.

Yesterday's program contained a list of donors to the fund being raised to meet the deficit of the present season, estimated at $100,000. Its heading read: "The trustees thank all those who by their subscriptions have made these concerts possible." The sum of $14,264.35 is still needed to meet the estimated deficit.

Every season ticket for the 24 Friedays, 24 Saturdays and six Mondays was sold this year, and almost every ticket for the six Tuesdays. The inevitably great expense of the concerts, and not any lack of public support, is responsible for the deficit.

Dr Koussevitzky, now ending his sixth season as conductor, has won a popularity with the Symphony audiences unsurpassed by that of any of his predecessors. The eloquence, the imaginative intensity of his interpretations of music of all types, the enthusiasm and, what is equally important, the hard work he has lavished on his tasks of choosing programs and players, and rehearsing the music to be performed, have notably raised the artistic level of the concerts as well as strengthening their hold on the public.

Even those who not infrequently disagree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of particular pieces of music, and object to his choice of programs, must respect him for the rare and notable qualities he brings to his task. The unusual tribute paid him by yesterday's audience was not undeserved. He has restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its old proud position of equality with the best orchestras in other American and European cities.

It is again unsurpassed in the entire world, and equalled by a mere handful of other celebrated bands.

Listening to Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" one could not but think how much finer it is than that other Spanish piece of his, the Bolero, which has lately made such a sensation with audiences the world over. This rhapsody, finely wrought out of original and ingratiating music material, and clothed in a delicate orchestral texture full of distinctive sonorotie, may lack the instantaneous popular appeal of the reiterated commonplace melody and conventional rhythm of the Bolero.

But at a 10th hearing Ravel's Bolero would prove intolerable to any sensitive listener, and the "Spanish Rhapsody" would be even more agreeable than at first hearing. Now it is the 10th, and not the first hearing of a piece of music, which establishes its claim to merit.

Dr Koussevitzky, in repeating Prof Hill's "Lilacs," paid to an American composition a compliment few such pieces have in the past received. Yet anything worth playing once at the Symphony concerts should be worth playing more than once. On the principle just stated, it is the repetitions that really test the value of a piece. One is sorry to have to add that the repetition of "Lilacs" confirmed the impression the piece made at a first hearing: that, though it is well written, it lacks the imaginative power of Amy Lowell's verses from which Mr Hill drew his inspiration.

Brilliant, if excessively noisy, performances of the familiar classics on the program, Weber's "Oberon" overture, and Brahms' C minor symphony, won hearty applause. Dr Koussevitzky is more successful with this first of Brahms' symphonies than he has been with the third and fourth. The intrinsic power of the splendid finale, in particular, was, as always, emotionally almost overwhelming.

With several details of Dr Koussevitzky's reading one disagreed, but on these enough has been written on previous occasions. The general effect was thrilling, and to the average listener that is enough.

P. R.

Post May 3

SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Hill's "Lilacs" Creates Very Favorable Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musicians and listeners who, together, braved the untimely summer heat at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon might well have considered themselves martyrs in the cause of music. But there was no outward evidence that they did. The former played, so far as spirit was concerned, as though the season were beginning, not ending, and the latter were more than usually responsive.

BRAHMS' FIRST

It has become the custom at the final Symphony concerts for orchestra and audience to rise when Dr. Koussevitzky makes his initial entrance. It is usual, too, for the audience to display a certain enthusiasm at the end, but the hand-clapping, augmented by other signs of approval, that followed the playing of Brahms' First Symphony yesterday was directly attributable to the performance itself. For the performance, in which most of the points made by the composer were underlined, and even doubly underlined, was calculated, as the phrase goes, to knock an audience cold. The purist might complain that certain extravagances in the matter of tempo and dynamics, particularly in the Finale, savored of sensationalism, But Dr. Koussevitzky hears Brahms in his own way. Beyond question, he is chiefly responsible for having made Brahms a popular composer hereabouts, and he is well entitled to play the music in accordance with his own convictions.

Weber of the Overture to "Oberon," with which the concert began, was, like Brahms, somewhat "played up" yesterday; but the performance was generally exhilarating, and often marked by tonal beauty. Better, too, Weber pointed and underscored than Weber in lifeless routine. Here, at least, was orchestral virtuosity, and there was more of it in the Rhapsodie Espagnole of Ravel, a piece that of itself is wearing thin, and needs all the aid that its interpreters can give it.

Nor were the eloquence and fervor that marked so much of the playing yesterday denied to the music of Edward Burlingame Hill, whose tone poem, "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell, first played here three years ago, came yesterday between Overture and Rhapsodie. In "Lilacs," Mr. Hill has made music that is both beautiful and expressive, that summons a rapturous quality that matches Miss Lowell's verses, and suits the vernal season which inspired them. Here is music that moves the listener, music of an emotional quality, doubly welcome in a day when most composers avoid beauty and emotional expression as they would the plague. Mr. Hill, who was present yesterday, was warmly applauded, and, after he had bowed several times, standing at his place in the hall, he was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the auditorium, there to acknowledge further plaudits.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAY 4 -

95

RECORDED MUSIC

Bach's "Mass" Now Made Available to All —Ravel's "Bolero" Done by Bostonians

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

Koussevitzky, Who Has Recorded Ravel's "Bolero."

ONE of the best signs of these days is that the record manufacturing companies are taking more careful thought as to what is going on in the world at large. The echoes from Carnegie Hall have penetrated to Camden, N. J., and thence to Boston, with the result that Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra issue a surprise Ravel's "Bolero" as an extra number between periodical catalogues. This is so much as it should be that one feels it is almost unfair to mention that it is a duplication. Koussevitzky proves himself more gramophonic than Ravel. Instead of taking four sides, he has jerked up the tempo throughout and worked the piece on to three. Where there is no large hall, no crowds and the performers are invisible, one is thankful for a little speed, particularly as the gramophone orchestra, though its proportions may have been identical, is not really the concert ensemble.

The "Bolero" was featured in New York in the same season that the uncut "Ring" is supposed to have surprised by demonstrating its drawing power, which signifies nothing. Neither is there any cause for speculation as to its popularity. Based on the simplest and most primitive passacaglia form, but that its one recurrent idea is rather long for a kanaka to have saved up, the "Bolero" might have come from the South Seas. A lonely side-drum is sneaked into the orchestra and immediately disclosed to introduce the rhythm, a solitary flute declares the melody, each solo instrument in succession takes its turn and retires into the nerve-racking accompaniment. The volume increases, the beat remains fixed. Koussevitzky has managed to get the precise result required.

On the fourth side the same orchestra plays "Gymnopedie No. 1," by a very subdued Erik Satie—if you are used to his "Le Fils des Etoiles" or "Danse maigre" (à la manière de ces messieurs). Debussy's orchestration, acknowledged on the record, has helped, and it is probably well that no attempt was made to back the "Bolero" with one of Satie's jokes. Ravel's own piece of wit has come off far better than any of them.

***

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

96 ork Times

Concert-Chronicle

may 5 Trans

Exeunt Omnes

THE matinée public, at the final Symphony Concert of the year 1929-30, manifested (as the French have it) at every opportunity. The evening public reserved its heavy firing (to write again in figures) until the end. True, the audience of Saturday hailed the entering Koussevitzky as eagerly as had that of Friday; rose more spontaneously; clapped not a whit less long and loud. Through the first half of the concert, however, it took music, performance, conductor and orchestra rather for granted. The superlative delivery of the Overture to "Oberon" kindled it to no excitement. It was interested rather than impressed with Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and Monsieur Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," though the latter piece was played with more rhythmic "edge" and vivid color than on Friday. There was reason to note that, while from many of Mr. Hill's measures sound the blooming, blowing lilacs of his poet, others are finely touched with quiet affection for this flower of New England and for the soil that bred it, because as Miss Lowell wrote, "My roots are in it." Possibly, also, Ravel's music is too little sensuous by conventional Spanish prescriptions, immediately to impress the ear. His night-piece, for example, is restless and rough-coated; whereas Debussy's, in "Iberia,"' is smooth and perfumed. So adept and subtle is Ravel's workmanship that not a detail fails to "come through." Yet they are so many and often so scintillant that the ear is dazzled rather than illuded.

The second part of the program brought Brahms's First Symphony and, after three-quarters of an hour of rapt listening, the deluge. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled time and again; the standing audience saluted him; he saluted the standing orchestra. A blue-ribboned wreath, with a gilt-lettered sentiment, was handed up, along with other flowers; while throughout the concert a bunch of deep-red roses had lain beside the conductor's platform. There were general shouts—twice over. The much-clasped hand of Mr. Burgin was again warmly grasped. One triumphant devotee—a member of the orchestra conniving—possessed herself of Dr. Koussevitzky's baton—new incident on such occasions. The time-keepers reported two minutes more than on Friday—and much louder.

H. T. P.

Keep Them Unlessened

With the end of the Symphony Concerts comes also the end, for the while, of the weekly lectures at the Public Library about the programs. They will be resumed next autumn; but it is not so certain that the accompanying "reference lists" will again be printed and distributed. The available appropriation for such purposes is limited and it may be applied elsewhere. If so, there will be general regret among the frequenters of the lectures, the studious at the concerts, the libraries and the private persons in other cities who have regularly received these lists. The prestige of the Brown Music Library as a source of information and encouragement has risen high and spread wide under the present curator, Mr. Richard Appel. It would be a pity to have it diminished by the abandonment of these bibliographies, in their kind little models of compilation.

Perhaps a summarizing note on the fly-leaf of the last was written with a thought of this possibility. It runs:

This lecture marks the conclusion of the sixth season of the lectures on the programs of the Boston Symphony Concerts. Begun in the year that marked the beginning of the Koussevitzky conductorship, these lectures have sought to fill a long-felt need in making familiar to the ever changing public the glories of symphonic music. Twenty-seven different instructors have co-operated in explaining the one hundred and twenty-four concerts. This does not count the eighteen composers who have presented their own works and some fourteen artists who have assisted.

The biographies listing the editions of the works to be played and critncisms thereon, together with a list of phonograph recordings and player-piano rolls have been prepared each week and distributed both at the library and by mail to all members of the class as well as to other libraries and interested individuals. . . . The number of enrollments for the six years was 2138.

to murder, and

Transcript May 7

At the second concert in Paris by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Ravel's "Bolero" was on the program. By word of the Paris Correspondent of the Herald Tribune, the composer "disagreed sharply" with the conductor's version, saying that he took it too fast—"at a tempo of 100, instead of the 70 indicated in the score." Monsieur Ravel "reserved his approbation for 'Bolero' as directed by Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1930

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 24th and last concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall; last with the exception of the repetition tonight. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill, "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnolle. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience: in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality, of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse, modern tendencies unskilfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 83 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero, Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijsh, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, 'cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahm's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazounov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 5 - 1930

Paris Acclaims Philharmonic in Two Concerts

Orchestra Under Toscanini Hailed as Superlative in First European Hearings

Ravel Hears Own Work

Shares Ovation for 'Bolero'; Opera Seats Bring Bonus

From the Herald Tribune Paris Bureau
Copyright, 1930, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, May 4.—In the second concert of its European tour, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Arturo Toscanini again conducting, moved the audience in the crowded Opera tonight, to a demonstration even greater than on the previous evening.

The climax came at the end of the French numbers, when Toscanini's treatment of Claude Debussy's "La Mer" and Maurice Ravel's "Bolero," had thrilled the audience. At the conclusion of the Ravel number, the crowd noticed the composer in the audience, and compelled him to share the ovation to Toscanini and the orchestra.

Friends of M. Ravel noted that during the rendition of his composition his head moved in sign of disapproval. Following the concert he admitted to the correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune that he disagreed sharply with Toscanini's interpretation of his (Ravel's) latest creation, stating that the conductor directed too fast—in a tempo of 100, in place of the 70 indicated by the original manuscript. M. Ravel said that he admired and did not question the Italian director's genius as concerned the remainder of the program, reserving approbation of direction of his "Bolero" for Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who "created" it for an orchestra.

Seats Bring Record Premium

Following the performance last night, seats for tonight ranged at previously unheard-of premiums throughout Paris, and hundreds gathered on the steps of the Opera bargaining with ticket speculators. Even M. Ravel was unable to obtain a seat until the last minute, when Eva Gauthier, American soprano, had him seated beside her.

Music circles noted with curiosity that not one American selection figured in Toscanini's two programs.

"Toscanini's orchestra is utterly significant," said Louis Schneider, music critic of "The Paris Herald," European edition of The New York Herald Tribune, following the concert. "There is no further eulogy necessary. It is impossible to say more."

"For the first time in many years," said Miss Gauthier, "there is unbounded sincerity in the reaction of press and public alike on such an occasion. There is no claque and no bias, meerly admiration for greatness."

Third Concert Considered

Included in the audience tonight were Eugene O'Neill, the playwright, and his wife, who is Carlotta Monterey, the singer; Mme. Ganna Walska (Mrs. Harold F. McCormick), Pola Negri, motion picture actress, and James Joyce, author. There was a heavy representation of the diplomatic corps and of Americans.

There is talk of the possibility of a third concert by the orchestra here, following the scheduled end of its tour in London on June 4. From Paris the orchestra goes to Zurich for a concert on Tuesday.

The majority of Parisian critics have not had opportunity to review the orchestra's first concert, but indications of high praise are available.

The newspaper, "L'Intransigeant," this evening praises the orchestra's rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as "unforgettable," and declares the orchestra to be "of the first rank in the world."

Louis Schneider, of "The Paris Herald," hails the orchestra's performance as a "triumph." According to Parisian custom, other prominent journals will not publish reviews of the concert before tomorrow or the following day.

Tonal Beauties "Recreated"

"If ever it were a duty to pronounce the word 'triumph,'" says M. Schneider in "The Paris Herald," "it is a duty so to describe this soiree at the Opera where the great Maestro Toscanini presented to the public his 114 executants and where he himself revealed to us or, rather, created anew for our astonished, charmed and enraptured ears a program of compositions which are quite familiar but which he has made his own. The miracle of the concert was that Toscanini, who arrived in Paris only last Thursday, was obliged to adapt himself and his orchestra to a hall wherein neither he nor his executants had been accustomed to work.

"The moment Toscanini took his place on the podium we were won by his simplicity. While so many conductors go into theatrical gestures and flourishes, rising on tiptoe to the intensity of the sonorities, he barely raises his left arm. The nuances, the pianissimi, are the features of his art. Toscanini is not the maestro of tradition who impresses by breadth of shoulder or length of hair. His gestures are delicate and refined. His manner is energetic, but never cut and dried. He gives merely the impression of a fervent musician preoccupied solely with expression of the work he is conducting—almost seeking self-effacement before works which must emerge above the conductor and his executants.

"This simplicity, this sincerity, this lack of melodramatic attitudes, gives the exact image of how he distinguished his manner of conducting from that of others. We became aware of it as soon as he launched into the first measure of the 'Eroica.' What a lesson was conveyed by an adagio movement without heavy slowness, but with pathetic, poignant nobility! What lightness in the scherzo! The finale was conducted with a quivering ardor which was life itself. That is what Toscanini has understood and what he has inspired in his executants, what he conveys to his audience."

"Tristan" Excerpts Bring Tribute

Of the rendition of Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the incidental music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," M. Schneider says that it "seemed to be the height of orchestral perfection," continuing: "It required the really masterly execution of Prelude and 'Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolde,' to transport us into regions beyond whither this musical genius had wandered. The 'Leitmotif of Death,' as sung by the symphonic ensemble, will long echo in our enraptured memories."

According to the music critic of "L'Intransigeant": "Those who were present at the Opera last night never will forget the admirable interpretation of the 'Eroica' symphony. The style of execution is its simplicity. There is no vain searching, no stress upon details to the prejudice of the ensemble."

This critic adds: "With Toscanini the musical discourse unfolds clearly, luminously, with the nuances pathetic and with an accent of verity such that not for a moment does the listener say to himself, 'What an adroit man is Toscanini!' but solely, 'What beautiful music!' I would be much embarrassed to explain in what the funeral march of the 'Eroica' differed from those we have known in the most careful translations. Always it was that with Toscanini it attained a degree of nobility and emotion to which the most specialized leaders until now have not raised it."

The rendition of the Mendelssohn scherzo, according to "L'Intransigeant," "affirmed the splendid qualities of the New York orchestra. Composed of carefully selected virtuosi, it represents in the musical world an organization of the first rank. Toscanini has in it a most docile and intelligent interpreter of his thoughts."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
MAY 9 - 19

...tzky
...riods

...BORN.

...Boston Sym... regarded as ... classical sym... is country. In ... since Serge Koussevitzky took up its baton, there has been a change. The Boston orchestra has become a particularly persistent and even daring purveyor of the new.

It has now completed its forty-ninth season, and the statistics of that season, as given by the authoritative Philip Hale in the Boston Herald, are of no less interest to us New Yorkers than to the citizens of the Hub.

On the twenty-four programs offered nearly fifty composers were represented in eighty-eight performances. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's modernism, Beethoven heads the list with six. Next comes Richard Strauss with five.

Mozart, Brahms, Sibelius and Ravel scored four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, a novelty in Boston, was performed twice, as were Ravel's "Bolero," Haydn's symphony "with the horn call," Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and fugue by Bach and the new symphony of Arnold Bax.

Composers whose names had not previously figured at Boston Symphony concerts were Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Tournier and Metzler. Eight compositions by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston and Tournier were played for the first time.

The valedictory program was certainly eclectic in makeup. It comprised Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell), Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and the first symphony of Brahms.

"Fortunately for the general public," says Mr. Hale, "Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM FILM DAILY
MAY 5 - 1930

Vernon Duke, who recently joined the Paramount New York studio music staff, to write special numbers for "Heads Up" and "The Sap From Syracuse," is known on the Continent as Vladimir Dukelsky. His latest symphony was given for the first ...mphony, last ...vation. Duke ...ssian aristoc... great deal of ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS SEASON'S FINAL CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last Cambridge concert of the season last Friday evening, the Boston Transcript comments that no work for the evening fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem "Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. "And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman."

Lilacs was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. 'Lilacs' derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of the audience becomes apparent.

"It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to 'Oberon.' The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitements of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell. A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning have been made than with this overture.

"And after 'Lilacs' had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by 'Oberon,' there followed the four divisions of Ravel's 'Spanish Rhapsody,'—the mysterious prelude, 'To the Night,' the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant 'Feria.' Again, at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow it, Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances the almost improvisational Malaguena the more definitely rhythmed Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the 'Feria.' Again the orchestra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsodic suite rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

"For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries whom he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident.

"No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him; as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history."

96

ork Times

Concert-Chronicle

may 5 Trans

Exeunt Omnes

THE matinée public, at the final Symphony Concert of the year 1929-30, manifested (as the French have it) at every opportunity. The evening public reserved its heavy firing (to write again in figures) until the end. True, the audience of Saturday hailed the entering Koussevitzky as eagerly as had that of Friday; rose more spontaneously; clapped not a whit less long and loud. Through the first half of the concert, however, it took music, performance, conductor and orchestra rather for granted. The superlative delivery of the Overture to "Oberon" kindled it to no excitement. It was interested rather than impressed with Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and Monsieur Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody,' though the latter piece was played with more rhythmic "edge" and vivid color than on Friday. There was reason to note that, while from many of Mr. Hill's measures sound the blooming, blowing lilacs of his poet, others are finely touched with quiet affection for this flower of New England and for the soil that bred it, because as Miss Lowell wrote, "My roots are in it." Possibly, also, Ravel's music is too little sensuous by conventional Spanish prescriptions, immediately to impress the ear. His night-piece, for example, is restless and rough-coated; whereas Debussy's, in "Iberia," is smooth and perfumed. So adept and subtle is Ravel's workmanship that not a detail fails to "come through." Yet they are so many and often so scintillant that the ear is dazzled rather than illuded.

The second part of the program brought Brahms's First Symphony and, after three-quarters of an hour of rapt listening, the deluge. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled time and again; the standing audience saluted him; he saluted the standing orchestra. A blue-ribboned wreath, with a gilt-lettered sentiment, was handed up, along with other flowers; while throughout the concert a bunch of deep-red roses had lain beside the conductor's platform. There were general shouts—twice over. The much-clasped hand of Mr. Burgin was again warmly grasped. One triumphant devotee—a member of the orchestra conniving—possessed herself of Dr. Koussevitzky's baton—new incident on such occasions. The time-keepers reported two minutes more than on Friday—and much louder.

H. T. P.

Keep Them Unlessened

With the end of the Symphony Concerts comes also the end, for the while, of the weekly lectures at the Public Library about the programs. They will be resumed next autumn; but it is not so certain that the accompanying "reference lists" will again be printed and distributed. The available appropriation for such purposes is limited and it may be applied elsewhere. If so, there will be general regret among the frequenters of the lectures, the studious at the concerts, the libraries and the private persons in other cities who have regularly received these lists. The prestige of the Brown Music Library as a source of information and encouragement has risen high and spread wide under the present curator, Mr. Richard Appel. It would be a pity to have it diminished by the abandonment of these bibliographies, in their kind little models of compilation.

Perhaps a summarizing note on the fly-leaf of the last was written with a thought of this possibility. It runs:

This lecture marks the conclusion of the sixth season of the lectures on the programs of the Boston Symphony Concerts. Begun in the year that marked the beginning of the Koussevitzky conductorship, these lectures have sought to fill a long-felt need in making familiar to the ever changing public the glories of symphonic music. Twenty-seven different instructors have co-operated in explaining the one hundred and twenty-four concerts. This does not count the eighteen composers who have presented their own works and some fourteen artists who have assisted.

The biographies listing the editions of the works to be played and critnciams thereon, together with a list of phonograph recordings and player-piano rolls have been prepared each week and distributed both at the library and by mail to all members of the class as well as to other libraries and interested individuals. The number of enrollments for the six years was 2138.

6 murder,

Transcript May 7

At the second concert in Paris by Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Ravel's "Bolero" was on the program. By word of the Paris Correspondent of the Herald Tribune, the composer "disagreed sharply" with the conductor's version, saying that he took it too fast—"at a tempo of 100, instead of the 70 indicated in the score." Monsieur Ravel "reserved his approbation for 'Bolero' as directed by Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1930

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 24th and last concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall; last with the exception of the repetition tonight. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill, "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnolle. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience: in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality, of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse, modern tendencies unskilfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 88 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero, Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijsh, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, 'cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahm's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazounov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 5 - 1930

First European Hearings

Ravel Hears Own Work

Shares Ovation for 'Bolero'; Opera Seats Bring Bonus

From the Herald Tribune Paris Bureau
Copyright, 1930, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, May 4.—In the second concert of its European tour, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Arturo Toscanini again conducting, moved the audience in the crowded Opera tonight, to a demonstration even greater than on the previous evening.

The climax came at the end of the French numbers, when Toscanini's treatment of Claude Debussy's "La Mer" and Maurice Ravel's "Bolero," had thrilled the audience. At the conclusion of the Ravel number, the crowd noticed the composer in the audience, and compelled him to share the ovation to Toscanini and the orchestra.

Friends of M. Ravel noted that during the rendition of his composition his head moved in sign of disapproval. Following the concert he admitted to the correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune that he disagreed sharply with Toscanini's interpretation of his (Ravel's) latest creation, stating that the conductor directed too fast—in a tempo of 100, in place of the 70 indicated by the original manuscript. M. Ravel said that he admired and did not question the Italian director's genius as concerned the remainder of the program, reserving approbation of direction of his "Bolero" for Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, who "created" it for an orchestra.

Seats Bring Record Premium

Following the performance last night, seats for tonight ranged at previously unheard-of premiums throughout Paris, and hundreds gathered on the steps of the Opera bargaining with ticket speculators. Even M. Ravel was unable to obtain a seat until the last minute, when Eva Gauthier, American soprano, had him seated beside her.

Music circles noted with curiosity that not one American selection figured in Toscanini's two programs.

"Toscanini's orchestra is utterly significant," said Louis Schneider, music critic of "The Paris Herald," European edition of The New York Herald Tribune, following the concert. "There is no further eulogy necessary. It is impossible to say more."

"For the first time in many years," said Miss Gauthier, "there is unbounded sincerity in the reaction of press and public alike on such an occasion. There is no claque and no bias, meerly admiration for greatness."

Third Concert Considered

Included in the audience tonight were Eugene O'Neill, the playwright, and his wife, who is Carlotta Monterey, the singer; Mme. Ganna Walska (Mrs. Harold F. McCormick), Pola Negri, motion picture actress, and James Joyce, author. There was a heavy representation of the diplomatic corps and of Americans.

There is talk of the possibility of a third concert by the orchestra here, following the scheduled end of its tour in London on June 4. From Paris the orchestra goes to Zurich for a concert on Tuesday.

The majority of Parisian critics have not had opportunity to review the orchestra's first concert, but indications of high praise are available.

The newspaper, "L'Intransigeant," this evening praises the orchestra's rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as "unforgettable," and declares the orchestra to be "of the first rank in the world."

Louis Schneider, of "The Paris Herald," hails the orchestra's performas a "triumph." According to Parisian custom, other prominent journals will not publish reviews of the concert before tomorrow or the following day.

Tonal Beauties "Recreated"

"If ever it were a duty to pronounce the word 'triumph,'" says M. Schneider in "The Paris Herald," "it is a duty so to describe this soiree at the Opera where the great Maestro Toscanini presented to the public his 114 executants and where he himself revealed to us or, rather, created anew for our astonished, charmed and enraptured ears a program of compositions which are quite familiar but which he has made his own. The miracle of the concert was that Toscanini, who arrived in Paris only last Thursday, was obliged to adapt himself and his orchestra to a hall wherein neither he nor his executants had been accustomed to work.

"The moment Toscanini took his place on the podium we were won by his simplicity. While so many conductors go into theatrical gestures and flourishes, rising on tiptoe to the intensity of the sonorities, he barely raises his left arm. The nuances, the pianissimi, are the features of his art. Toscanini is not the maestro of tradition who impresses by breadth of shoulder or length of hair. His gestures are delicate and refined. His manner is energetic, but never cut and dried. He gives merely the impression of a fervent musician preoccupied solely with expression of the work he is conducting—almost seeking self-effacement before works which must emerge above the conductor and his executants.

"This simplicity, this sincerity, this lack of melodramatic attitudes, gives the exact image of how he distinguished his manner of conducting from that of others. We became aware of it as soon as he launched into the first measure of the 'Eroica.' What a lesson was conveyed by an adagio movement without heavy slowness, but with pathetic, poignant nobility! What lightness in the scherzo! The finale was conducted with a quivering ardor which was life itself. That is what Toscanini has understood and what he has inspired in his executants, what he conveys to his audience."

"Tristan" Excerpts Bring Tribute

Of the rendition of Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the incidental music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," M. Schneider says that it "seemed to be the height of orchestral perfection," continuing: "It required the really masterly execution of Prelude and 'Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolde,' to transport us into regions beyond whither this musical genius had wandered. The 'Leitmotif of Death,' as sung by the symphonic ensemble, will long echo in our enraptured memories."

According to the music critic of "L'Intransigeant": "Those who were present at the Opera last night never will forget the admirable interpretation of the 'Eroica' symphony. The style of execution is its simplicity. There is no vain searching, no stress upon details to the prejudice of the ensemble."

This critic adds: "With Toscanini the musical discourse unfolds clearly, luminously, with the nuances pathetic and with an accent of verity such that not for a moment does the listener say to himself, 'What an adroit man is Toscanini!' but solely, 'What beautiful music!' I would be much embarrassed to explain in what the funeral march of the 'Eroica' differed from those we have known in the most careful trans-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAM

MAY 9 - 1930

Koussevitzky Mixes Periods

By PITTS SANBORN.

For decades the Boston Symphony Orchestra was regarded as the conservator of the classical symphonic tradition in this country. In the last few years, since Serge Koussevitzky took up its baton, there has been a change. The Boston orchestra has become a particularly persistent and even daring purveyor of the new.

It has now completed its forty-ninth season, and the statistics of that season, as given by the authoritative Philip Hale in the Boston Herald, are of no less interest to us New Yorkers than to the citizens of the Hub.

On the twenty-four programs offered nearly fifty composers were represented in eighty-eight performances. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's modernism, Beethoven heads the list with six. Next comes Richard Strauss with five.

Mozart, Brahms, Sibelius and Ravel scored four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, a novelty in Boston, was performed twice, as were Ravel's "Bolero," Haydn's symphony "with the horn call," Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and fugue by Bach and the new symphony of Arnold Bax.

Composers whose names had not previously figured at Boston Symphony concerts were Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Tournier and Metzler. Eight compositions by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston and Tournier were played for the first time.

The valedictory program was certainly eclectic in makeup. It comprised Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell), Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and the first symphony of Brahms.

"Fortunately for the general public," says Mr. Hale, "Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

FILM DAILY

MAY 5 - 1930

Vernon Duke, who recently joined the Paramount New York studio music staff, to write special numbers for "Heads Up" and "The Sap From Syracuse," is known on the Continent as Vladimir Dukelsky. His latest symphony was given for the first time by the Boston Symphony, last week, and received an ovation. Duke is a member of the Russian aristocracy and has spent a great deal of time in England.

l Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS SEASON'S FINAL CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last Cambridge concert of the season last Friday evening, the Boston Transcript comments that no work for the evening fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem "Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. "And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman."

Lilacs was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. 'Lilacs' derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of the audience becomes apparent.

"It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to 'Oberon.' The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitements of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell. A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning have been made than with this overture.

"And after 'Lilacs' had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by 'Oberon,' there followed the four divisions of Ravel's 'Spanish Rhapsody,'—the mysterious prelude, 'To the Night,' the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant 'Feria.' Again, at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow it, Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances, the almost improvisational Malaguena, the more definitely rhythmed Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the 'Feria.' Again the orchestra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsodic suite rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

"For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries whom he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident.

"No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him; as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history."

4 M *NY World May 11/30

CONCERTS OF

Concert Pitch

Conductorial Caricatures

By Samuel Chotzinoff

STOKOWSKI

BEFORE you know it he has emerged from backstage, skirted the first violins, jumped lightly on to the podium, inclined his head hastily toward the applause of those in the audience who had perceived his swift progress from the wings and who had time to bring their palms together in greeting, raised his stick and evoked the opening sounds of the overture, symphony or what-not he has elected to play first. Only a second has elapsed between his not being there at all and his active assumption of leadership, but in that second his personality had registered on his admirers as effectively as an image on a photographic plate. The tall, lithe figure, with its firmly poised blond head and small, sensitive mouth hastens toward his platform with the self-conscious stride of one who cannot feel himself at ease until he has his back toward us and his eyes on his orchestra. This walk from the seclusion of the greenroom to the haven of the podium is obviously a trial, a running of the gantlet. Yet he knows that the several thousand pairs of eyes that will follow him will reflect admiration, not censure. What is it, then, that he fears? Why is he so eager to plunge his chattering, unconscious audience into music, without the customary moment for adjustment?

Now the music is on and the audience is technically free to regard the steely grace of the leader in action. His actions are exigent and passionate and his profile, when he turns toward the first fiddles or the cellos, burns not only with the emotion of the moment but also with a consciousness of the scene in which he is the chief actor: The house packed with smart people, the splendor of his orchestra, his power over his men, his imperial exactions in the cause of beauty and the spectacular harmony existing between his person and his high calling.

His gestures, rapierlike, or suave with the flexibility of velvet-covered steel, visibly enhance the music, yet they are not without the suspicion of artifice; as if, in the very moment of their release, the brain that conceived them had wondered what impression they would make on a beholder. His bow, when the music is over, is a baffling genuflection. It seems to say in one breath "I thank you—thank you for nothing—you are very kind—what can you know of what I have accomplished—I am grateful—I have been casting pearls—thank you."

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY was once the wonder of the world. At the end of the late war it was listed in the class of the maimed and wounded. Frenchmen were imported to cure it, but their ministrations proved to be the medicine of diplomacy. The directors decided to try something Russian and engaged Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky was celebrated as a phenomenal virtuoso on the double bass who, having acquired wealth, assembled an orchestra, chartered a boat and sailed the Volga, bringing symphonic culture to the unlettered inhabitants of the banks of this famous stream. Mr. Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, captured the allegiance of the town without a struggle and, coming to Carnegie Hall, was greeted by the public and the press as the resuscitator of the comatose Bostonians.

And now again, as in pre-war days, the Boston Orchestra fills Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky has turned the trick—and knows it. There is a unanimous rattle of applause as the elegant doctor makes his appearance, a tribute which has time to grow into a demonstration while he walks leisurely to his platform. He is sleek, and his form is tailored to perfection. He walks like a General who, after having achieved a colossal victory, is prevailed upon to exhibit himself to his grateful countrymen. He knows the psychology that actuates mobs; he also knows his own worth. Before mounting his stand he faces the adoring multitude and remains immovable, as if waiting for the applause to rise to proportions sufficiently magnificent to merit his acknowledgment. The thunder having grown large, the doctor lifts his head to the gallery and draws an arc by lowering it (the head) to the first row of the orchestra, a geometrical procedure which is repeated as often as the general enthusiasm warrants it.

The doctor expects a conscious silence from the auditorium before he gives his men the signal to begin. This signal is accomplished by his raising both arms very slowly, as if with this action he was actually drawing up the spirit of silence from the cellar to the ceiling. The atmosphere is that proper to a seance, and at the psychological moment the doctor, who is the medium, releases the scheduled phenomena. He addresses himself primarily to the instruments seated on his right and left; in consequence of which the listeners have always before them one or the other side of his face. These profiles are charged with unusual feeling, the outward expression of the doctor's consuming reactions to the music he invokes. His exhortations to the first and second fiddle sections are visible to the audience, yet there is that in his beseeching attitude that says: "My frenzy is being watched by a full house—give all that you can—press your fingers and draw your bows with all the strength you have—and do not omit to look up at me whenever convenient."

* * *

TOSCANINI

THE little maestro walks to his place with the unconcern of one who has been hired to do a job of work. He carries his stick under his arm, like a tool, hops with youthful agility onto his platform, takes his bow soberly, turns to his men and waits for silence. When he is ready to begin he gives the cello stand in front of him a resounding whack. His gestures are unmethodical and unpremeditated, seeming to be dictated by the musical demands of the moment. His right arm describes right angles and circles; his left does a variety of things, from indicating entrances to eliciting tone, the latter of which is achieved by the naive pressure of the thumb against the region of the heart.

At the conclusion of a movement the conductor puts his stick under his arm, takes out a large handkerchief and mops his face and the top of his head energetically. If the night is warm and the music exacting he extends the drying process to the back of his neck, which he rubs thoroughly and efficiently in full view of 3,000 people. At the end of the concert he takes as many recalls as he thinks his performance merited; then, though the acclaim is still at its peak, he surreptitiously pinches the concert master's arm, a prearranged signal which disperses the band, and the concert is over.

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Fiedler's programs for the Pops, printed today in this department, show that he wishes to keep something, as much, perhaps, as he can, of the spirit of musical progress imparted to these concerts in Mr Casella's regime. He is compelled to make the bulk of his programs of oldstandbys for box office purposes, but there will be a few crumbs of comfort for the musical highbrows. The Cecilia Society Chorus of which Mr Fiedler is the present conductor, will appear Wednesday night in music by Musorgsky, Borodin and Henschel. Some folk dances arranged by Bela Bartok are on Monday's program, some de Falla on Thursday's, and so it goes. Rolland Tapley, a Boston violinist who has for some years played in the Symphony orchestra, will play the finale of the Mendelssohn concerto Saturday night, and, in his capacity as musical director at a camp, direct the singing of a camp song. This, like the other special nights, is open to the public.

Russian Leader Sailed Wednesday; Returns October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has concluded its forty-ninth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky sailed for Europe Wednesday, and will return to open the fiftieth anniversary season of the orchestra, Oct. 10. This will be the seventh American season of the Russian conductor. Subsequent to the orchestral season, a summer season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be given under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler.

In the season past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave forty-eight concerts in Boston, which with the Monday and Tuesday series increased to six each, a Pension Fund concert, four Young People's concerts, and four extra concerts in the Brahms Festival, has made a total of sixty-nine concerts. Each series, together with a series in New York, Cambridge and Providence, was fully subscribed.

A feature of the season was the Brahms Festival given in Symphony Hall, March 21 and 28, in which the four symphonies and the two piano concertos were played (Artur S[illegible]nabel, soloist), together with the German Requiem and smaller orchestral and choral scores, and a concert of chamber music. Debussy's incidental music to the "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and ht- "Demoiselle Elue" was [illegible] Boston with chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

TOSCANINI I

Early Reactions to the phony Tour—Orchest

By OLIN DOWNES.

IT is not easy to separate the wheat from the chaff of cable reports of musical performances overseas. But the concerts given by Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Paris on May 3 and 4 appear to have elicited much the same enthusiasm from the general public and from discriminating sources in [illegible] press that the To[illegible]

Chicago Tribune May 8

Americans Lead In Music Appreciation, Says Koussevitsky

Boston Symphony Head In Paris For Concert; Orchestra Coming

The American people have a greater appreciation of music than any other race in the world. In no other country do artists find more appreciative audiences.

That is the opinion of Sergei Koussevitsky, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who arrived in Paris last night after crossing on the Mauretania. In a brief interview, in his home on the Rue Conseiller Collignon, last night, M. Koussevitsky told of the tremendous enthusiasm which dominates musical America today.

"The reception given to visiting artists and to new compositions by American musical audiences is really overwhelming," declared M. Koussevitsky. "It is not true that women make up the greater part of these audiences. In every audience, one sees an equally large group of men who are eagerly seeking to understand and to know music.

"There are twenty first class orchestras in America, isn't that astonishing? In those twenty orchestras, there are three that are perfect. Well, with so many excellent concerts being given every season, it is easy to understand what is taking place in America. The people are beginning to know and to appreciate the best in music. Every school has an orchestra, every city has its orchestra. The children are being educated to love and to understand the works of the great composers.

"In Europe one finds that the audiences are made up of a select group of people. In America, the audiences are made up of the mass of people. America is wealthy and with its wealth, it is establishing a culture among its people. The people have a great desire to know and to understand."

According to M. Koussevitsky, Igor Stravinsky has exerted a greater influence on American music than any other modern composer. He declared that the modern American school of composers was following in the footsteps of this great master.

M. Koussevitsky believes that jazz is a thing of the past. He declared that the compositions in syncopated music today were inferior to these works created in the past.

"American composers no longer find jazz a suitable medium of expression," he observed. " Jazz creations today are really mediocre compared to what has been done in syncopated music before."

M. Koussevitsky will conduct at the Opera on June 12. He will return to Boston in July for three days and come back to Paris again. Next season, the Boston Symphony orchestra will come abroad to make a six week's tour of the Continent.

Boston Symphony Programs

The program book of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts each season contains elaborate lists and summaries of the works performed that year. Similar statistics are published in Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York for the great orchestras in those cities. Some comparisons and comment on these programs may tend to show whether the current remarks about the music Boston is permitted by Dr Koussevitzky to hear have any justification. Do we hear too few classics? Is the American composer neglected? Do we hear too much modern music?

First, about the classics. A fair test of these is the performances of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart, and Brahms. In Boston we had in the subscription series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the Beethoven symphonies, the first, second, and third of the Brahms symphonies, and from Mozart the E flat and an early symphony in C.

In Philadelphia, in 30 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard the third, fifth, seventh and eighth of the Beethoven symphonies; the first, second, and fourth by Brahms, and by Mozart only an early one in D major (K 385).

In Chicago, in 28 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard only two Beethoven symphonies; and of the Mozart symphonies only the E flat.

A comparison more extended in scope of the programs in these three cities would only confirm what this brief one shows, that Dr Koussevitzky gave his audiences as much, if not more, music by the great classic composers than Mr Stock in Chicago, or Mr Stokowski and his colleagues in Philadelphia.

The New York concerts of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are arranged in series much shorter than those in the other three cities, and do not lend themselves to exact comparison. In 10 different subscription series in New York and Brooklyn, including 99 concerts in all, Mr Tescanini, Mr Mengleberg, and guest conductors, gave 13 different works by Beethoven (not all symphonies) and nine works by Mozart, and six by Brahms.

American Compositions

Next, the case of the American composer. In Boston Dr Koussevitzky included in the 24 pairs of concerts these American compositions, of which those marked * were first performances here. Sinfonietta in D major, G. W. Chadwick; "Java"* and "Burma", Henry Eichheim; "Chants Negres" Blair Fairchild "Broadway", Samuel Gardner; "The Enchanted Isle," "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; "Lilacs," E. B. Hill; "Jungle," Werner Josten; "Canticum Fratris Solis", C. M. Loeffler; Suite for Orchestras, Walter Piston; or 11 works by nine different composers.

In Philadelphia Mr Stokowski, Mr Gabrilowitsch and guest conductors led the following American compositions, in the 30 pairs of subscription concerts. "Java," Henry Eichheim; "Masquerade," Carl McKinley; "Morocco," Ernest Schelling; "Jurgen," Deems Taylor; Concerto for quarter tone piano, Hans Barth; Concerto for piano, Abram Chasins, or six pieces by six composers.

In Chicago, Mr Stock's 28 programs included these American works. Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," John Alden Carpenter; "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; overture, "In Bohemia," Henry Hadley; "A Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratris Solis," C. M. Loeffler; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Edward MacDowell; "Morocco," Earnest Schelling; Suite "From the Northland," Leo Sowerby; Concerto for violin, and "Psalmodic Rhapsody" for chorus and orchestra, Frederick Stock; making 10 different works by eight composers.

In New York, Mr Toscanini included no American works on his programs, nor has he put any on the programs for the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, now in progress, an omission even more serious. Other conductors included works by two recently naturalized Americans, and that was all. Obviously, Dr Koussevitzky is more generous than his rivals to American composers, if the past season's programs are to be the test.

Provincial New York

New York, which hears much less music by American composers at its orchestral concerts than is played in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, not to mention several lesser musical capitals, can hardly claim to be the chief musical center of the United States judged by what in other Nations has always been the chief test, the performance of new works by the composers of the Nation.

It is not, by the way, always clear just which composers are to be counted as Americans. In the tables above resident composers like Bloch and Goossens, who grew up and won reputations abroad before coming here, are omitted and only Americans by birth or by residence for most of their lives in the United States are counted as American.

Finally, about modern music by foreigners. In Boston we had in the regular series performances of works by living composers not Americans as follows. If the title is given for a work that indicates the first Boston performance. Symphony No. 2 Bax (played at two pairs of concerts, "Schelomo," Bloch; two works by de Falla; Second Symphony, Dukelsky; three works by Glazunov (all conducted by the composer); Concertino, Goossens; Concerto grosso, Lazar; "Assylian Bas Reliefs," Martelli; Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli; Piano Concerto No. 2, and another work ("Scythian Suite") Prokofieff; Bolero (repeated) and three other works, Ravel; "Feste Romane," and another work ("Pines of Rome"), Respighi; Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessi, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangiagalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2, Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

Stock the Modernist

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr Stock in Chicago, and not Dr Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated. Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listen each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

This is the list of modern novelties played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, not including repetitions of works already given in New York. Under Mr Mengelberg, Sinfonietta, Bernard Wagenaar; under Mr Molinari, Suite from the opera "Guilietta e Romeo," Zandonai; under Mr Tescanini; excluding arrangements from the classics, Symphonic Variations, Castelnuovo, Tedesco; Sinfonietta, Goossens; "Summer Evening," Kodaly; Venetian Ronde, Pizzetti; Bolero, Ravel; Venetian Carnival, Tommassini or in all, only eight works by eight composers, as against, to count only novelties, 22 works by 22 composers in Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr Stock and the hidebound conservation that rules in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
MAY 1 1

Koussevitzky Ends Boston Season

Russian Leader Sailed Wednesday; Returns October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has concluded its forty-ninth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky sailed for Europe Wednesday, and will return to open the fiftieth anniversary season of the orchestra, Oct. 10. This will be the seventh American season of the Russian conductor. Subsequent to the orchestral season, a summer season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be given under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler.

In the season past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave forty-eight concerts in Boston, which with the Monday and Tuesday series increased to six each, a Pension Fund concert, four Young People's concerts, and four extra concerts in the Brahms Festival, has made a total of sixty-nine concerts. Each series, together with a series in New York, Cambridge and Providence, was fully subscribed.

A feature of the season was the Brahms Festival given in Symphony Hall, March 21 and 28, in which the four symphonies and the two piano concertos were played (Artur S[illegible]nabel, soloist), together with the German Requiem and smaller orchestral and choral scores, and a concert of chamber music. Debussy's incidental music to the "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and his "Demoiselle Elue" was given in Boston with chorus.

CONCERTS OF THE W

Concert Pitch

Conductorial Caricatures

By Samuel Chotzinoff

STOKOWSKI

BEFORE you know it he has emerged from backstage, skirted the first violins, jumped lightly on to the podium, inclined his head hastily toward the applause of those in the audience who had perceived his swift progress from the wings and who had time to bring their palms together in greeting, raised his stick and evoked the opening sounds of the overture, symphony or what-not he has elected to play first. Only a second has elapsed between his not being there at all and his active assumption of leadership, but in that second his personality had registered on his admirers as effectively as an image on a photographic plate. The tall, lithe figure, with its firmly poised blond head and small, sensitive mouth hastens toward his platform with the self-conscious stride of one who cannot feel himself at ease until he has his back toward us and his eyes on his orchestra. This walk from the seclusion of the greenroom to the haven of the podium is obviously a trial, a running of the gantlet. Yet he knows that the several thousand pairs of eyes that will follow him will reflect admiration, not censure. What is it, then, that he fears? Why is he so eager to plunge his chattering, unconscious audience into music, without the customary moment for adjustment?

Now the music is on and the audience is technically free to regard the steely grace of the leader in action. His actions are exigent and passionate and his profile, when he turns toward the first fiddles or the cellos, burns not only with the emotion of the moment but also with a consciousness of the scene in which he is the chief actor: The house packed with smart people, the splendor of his orchestra, his power over his men, his imperial exactions in the cause of beauty and the spectacular harmony existing between his person and his high calling.

His gestures, rapierlike, or suave with the flexibility of velvet-covered steel, visibly enhance the music, yet they are not without the suspicion of artifice; as if, in the very moment of their release, the brain that conceived them had wondered what impression they would make on a beholder. His bow, when the music is over, is a baffling genuflection. It seems to say in one breath "I thank you—thank you for nothing—you are very kind—what can you know of what I have accomplished—I am grateful—I have been casting pearls—thank you."

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY was once the wonder of the world. At the end of the late war it was listed in the class of the maimed and wounded. Frenchmen were imported to cure it, but their ministrations proved to be the medicine of diplomacy. The directors decided to try something Russian and engaged Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Koussevitzky was celebrated as a phenomenal virtuoso on the double bass who, having acquired wealth, assembled an orchestra, chartered a boat and sailed the Volga, bringing symphonic culture to the unlettered inhabitants of the banks of this famous stream. Mr. Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, captured the allegiance of the town without a struggle and, coming to Carnegie Hall, was greeted by the public and the press as the resuscitator of the comatose Bostonians.

And now again, as in pre-war days, the Boston Orchestra fills Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky has turned the trick—and knows it. There is a unanimous rattle of applause as the elegant doctor makes his appearance, a tribute which has time to grow into a demonstration while he walks leisurely to his platform. He is sleek, and his form is tailored to perfection. He walks like a General who, after having achieved a colossal victory, is prevailed upon to exhibit himself to his grateful countrymen. He knows the psychology that actuates mobs; he also knows his own worth. Before mounting his stand he faces the adoring multitude and remains immovable, as if waiting for the applause to rise to proportions sufficiently magnificent to merit his acknowledgment. The thunder having grown large, the doctor lifts his head to the gallery and draws an arc by lowering it (the head) to the first row of the orchestra, a geometrical procedure which is repeated as often as the general enthusiasm warrants it.

The doctor expects a conscious silence from the auditorium before he gives his men the signal to begin. This signal is accomplished by his raising both arms very slowly, as if with this action he was actually drawing up the spirit of silence from the cellar to the ceiling. The atmosphere is that proper to a seance, and at the psychological moment the doctor, who is the medium, releases the scheduled phenomena. He addresses himself primarily to the instruments seated on his right and left; in consequence of which the listeners have always before them one or the other side of his face. These profiles are charged with unusual feeling, the outward expression of the doctor's consuming reactions to the music he invokes. His exhortations to the first and second fiddle sections are visible to the audience, yet there is that in his beseeching attitude that says: "My frenzy is being watched by a full house—give all that you can—press your fingers and draw your bows with all the strength you have—and do not omit to look up at me whenever convenient."

* * *

TOSCANINI

THE little maestro walks to his place with the unconcern of one who has been hired to do a job of work. He carries his stick under his arm, like a tool, hops with youthful agility onto his platform, takes his bow soberly, turns to his men and waits for silence. When he is ready to begin he gives the cello stand in front of him a resounding whack. His gestures are unmethodical and unpremeditated, seeming to be dictated by the musical demands of the moment. His right arm describes right angles and circles; his left does a variety of things, from indicating entrances to eliciting tone, the latter of which is achieved by the naive pressure of the thumb against the region of the heart.

At the conclusion of a movement the conductor puts his stick under his arm, takes out a large handkerchief and mops his face and the top of his head energetically. If the night is warm and the music exacting he extends the drying process to the back of his neck, which he rubs thoroughly and efficiently in full view of 3,000 people. At the end of the concert he takes as many recalls as he thinks his performance merited; then, though the acclaim is still at its peak, he surreptitiously pinches the concert master's arms, a prearranged signal which disperses the band, and the concert is over.

Koussevitzky Ends Boston Season

Russian Leader Sailed Wednesday; Returns October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has concluded its forty-ninth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky sailed for Europe Wednesday, and will return to open the fiftieth anniversary season of the orchestra, Oct. 10. This will be the seventh American season of the Russian conductor. Subsequent to the orchestral season, a summer season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be given under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler.

In the season past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave forty-eight concerts in Boston, which with the Monday and Tuesday series increased to six each, a Pension Fund concert, four Young People's concerts, and four extra concerts in the Brahms Festival, has made a total of sixty-nine concerts. Each series, together with a series in New York, Cambridge and Providence, was fully subscribed.

A feature of the season was the Brahms Festival given in Symphony Hall, March 21 and 28, in which the four symphonies and the two piano concertos were played (Artur S[illegible]nabel, soloist), together with the German Requiem and smaller orchestral and choral scores, and a concert of chamber music. Debussy's incidental music to the "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and his "Demoiselle Elue" was given in Boston with chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAY 11 [illegible]

TOSCANINI I

Early Reactions to the phony Tour—Orchest

By OLIN DOWNES.

IT is not easy to separate the wheat from the chaff of cable reports of musical performances overseas. But the concerts given by Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Paris on May 3 and 4 appear to have elicited much the same enthusiasm from the general public and from discriminating sources in the press that the To[illegible]

Chicago Tribune May 8

Americans Lead In Music Appreciation, Says Koussevitsky

Boston Symphony Head In Paris For Concert; Orchestra Coming

The American people have a greater appreciation of music than any other race in the world. In no other country do artists find more appreciative audiences.

That is the opinfon of Sergei Koussevitsky, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who arrived in Paris last night after crossing on the Mauretania. In a brief interview, in his home on the Rue Conseiller Collignon, last night, M. Koussevitsky told of the tremendous enthusiasm which dominates musical America today.

"The reception given to visiting artists and to new compositions by American musical audiences is really overwhelming," declared M. Koussevitsky. "It is not true that women make up the greater part of these audiences. In every audience, one sees an equally large group of men who are eagerly seeking to understand and to know music.

"There are twenty first class orchestras in America, isn't that astonishing? In those twenty orchestras, there are three that are perfect. Well, with so many excellent concerts being given every season, it is easy to understand what is taking place in America. The people are beginning to know and to appreciate the best in music. Every school has an orchestra, every city has its orchestra. The children are being educated to love and to understand the works of the great composers.

"In Europe one finds that the audiences are made up of a select group of people. In America, the audiences are made up of the mass of people. America is wealthy and with its wealth, it is establishing a culture among its people. The people have a great desire to know and to understand."

According to M. Koussevitsky, Igor Stravinsky has exerted a greater influence on American music than any other modern composer. He declared that the modern American school of composers was following in the footsteps of this great master.

M. Koussevitsky believes that jazz is a thing of the past. He declared that the compositions in syncopated music today were inferior to these works created in the past.

"American composers no longer find jazz a suitable medium of expression," he observed. "Jazz creations today are really mediocre compared to what has been done in syncopated music before."

M. Koussevitsky will conduct at the Opera on June 12. He will return to Boston in July for three days and come back to Paris again. Next season, the Boston Symphony orchestra will come abroad to make a six week's tour of the Continent.

LAYERS

minine role in "The Criminal Code," ill be remembered by Boston play-ers for her association with the astle Square Theatre. Since those ys she has appeared in the "Great ivide," "Crimson Alibi," "The Mas-erader," "The Wandering Jew" and the statuesque queen of "Castles the Air." Miss Lawton has also rned recognition in Shakespearian les.

The Theatre Guild has acquired the merican rights of Max Mohr's com-y, "Die Welt der Enkel," which ight be translated as "Our Grand-ns' World." The piece has played th unusual success in Hamburg, urzburg and Vienna.

f you want to know how it feels act the same role in a play over 0 times, just ask Alec Harford, who s been doing just that with the t of Renfield, the lunatic in "Drac-." Only a man who has studied be a singer could possibly stand terrific strain on the vocal chords. the audiences heard only two Beet-ven symphonies; and of the Mozart symphonies only the E flat.

A comparison more extended in scope of the programs in these three cities would only confirm what this brief one shows, that Dr Koussevitzky gave his audiences as much, if not more, music by the great classic composers than Mr Stock in Chicago, or Mr Stokowski and his colleagues in Philadelphia.

The New York concerts of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are arranged in series much shorter than those in the other three cities, and do not lend themselves to exact comparison. In 10 different subscription series in New York and Brooklyn, including 99 concerts in all, Mr Tescanini, Mr Mengleberg, and guest conductors, gave 13 different works by Beethoven (not all symphonies) and nine works by Mozart, and six by Brahms.

American Compositions

Next, the case of the American composer. In Boston Dr Koussevitzky included in the 24 pairs of concerts these American compositions, of which those marked * were first performances here. Sinfonietta in D major, G. W. Chadwick; "Java"* and "Burma", Henry Eichheim; "Chants Negres" Blair Fairchild "Broadway", Samuel Gardner; "The Enchanted Isle," "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; "Lilacs," E. B. Hill; "Jungle," Werner Josten; "Canticum Fratris Solis", C. M. Loeffler; Suite for Orchestras, Walter Piston; or 11 works by nine different composers.

In Philadelphia Mr Stokowski, Mr Gabrilowitsch and guest conductors led the following American compositions, in the 30 pairs of subscription concerts. "Java," Henry Eichheim; "Masquerade," Carl McKinley; "Morocco," Ernest Schelling; "Jurgen," Deems Taylor; Concerto for quarter tone piano, Hans Barth; Concerto for piano, Abram Chasins, or six pieces by six composers.

In Chicago, Mr Stock's 28 programs included these American works. Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," John Alden Carpenter; "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; overture, "In Bohemia," Henry Hadley; "A Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratris Solis," C. M. Loeffler; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Edward MacDowell; "Morocco," Earnest Schelling; Suite "From the Northland," Leo Sowerby; Concerto for violin, and "Psalmodic Rhapsody" for chorus and orchestra, Frederick Stock; making 10 different works by eight composers.

In New York, Mr Toscanini included no American works on his programs, nor has he put any on the programs for the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, now in progress, an omission even more serious. Other conductors included works by two recently naturalized Americans, and that was all. Obviously, Dr Koussevitzky is more generous than his rivals to American composers, if the past season's programs are to be the test.

Provincial New York

New York, which hears much less music by American composers at its orchestral concerts than is played in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, not to mention several lesser musical capitals, can hardly claim to be the chief musical center of the United States judged by what in other Nations has always been the chief test, the performance of new works by the composers of the Nation.

It is not, by the way, always clear just which composers are to be counted as Americans. In the tables above resident composers like Bloch and Goossens, who grew up and won reputations abroad before coming here, are omitted and only Americans by birth or by residence for most of their lives in the United States are counted as American.

Finally, about modern music by foreigners. In Boston we had in the regular series performances of works by living composers not Americans as follows. If the title is given for a work that indicates the first Boston performance. Symphony No. 2 Bax (played at two pairs of concerts, "Schelomo," Bloch; two works by de Falla; Second Symphony, Dukelsky; three works by Glazunov (all conducted by the composer); Concertino, Goossens; Concerto grosso, Lazar; "Assylian Bas Reliefs," Martelli; Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli; Piano Concerto No. 2, and another work ("Scythian Suite") Prokofieff; Bolero (repeated) and three other works, Ravel; "Feste Romane," and another work ("Pines of Rome"), Respighi; Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessi, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangiagalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2; Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

Stock the Modernist

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr Stock in Chicago, and not Dr Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated. Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listen each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

This is the list of modern novelties played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, not including repetitions of works already given in New York. Under Mr Mengelberg, Sinfonietta, Bernard Wagenaar; under Mr Molinari, Suite from the opera "Guilietta e Romeo," Zandonai; under Mr Tescanini; excluding arrangements from the classics, Symphonic Variations, Castelnuovo, Tedesco; Sinfonietta, Goossens; "Summer Evening," Kodaly; Venetian Ronde, Pizzetti; Bolero, Ravel; Venetian Carnival, Tommassini or in all, only eight works by eight composers, as against, to count only novelties, 22 works by 22 composers in Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr Stock and the hidebound conservation that rules in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
MAY 11 1930

Koussevitzky Ends Boston Season

Russian Leader Sailed Wednesday; Returns October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has concluded its forty-ninth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky sailed for Europe Wednesday, and will return to open the fiftieth anniversary season of the orchestra, Oct. 10. This will be the seventh American season of the Russian conductor. Subsequent to the orchestral season, a summer season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be given under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler.

In the season past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave forty-eight concerts in Boston, which with the Monday and Tuesday series increased to six each, a Pension Fund concert, four Young People's concerts, and four extra concerts in the Brahms Festival, has made a total of sixty-nine concerts. Each series, together with a series in New York, Cambridge and Providence, was fully subscribed.

A feature of the season was the Brahms Festival given in Symphony Hall, March 21 and 28, in which the four symphonies and the two piano concertos were played (Artur S[illegible]nabel, soloist), together with the German Requiem and smaller orchestral and choral scores, and a concert of chamber music. Debussy's incidental music to the "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and his "Demoiselle Elue" was given in Boston with chorus.

98

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAY 11 193

Modern Music Recorded

By EDWARD CUSHING

Reviewing Recorded Performances of Ravel's Bolero, Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, and Strawinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps'

WITHIN the past few months much modern music has been made available for the owner of a gramophone, the collector of a library of phonographic discs. The recording companies, having in three or four years well-nigh exhausted the standard symphonic repertory, have turned their attention from the classic to the living masters, with results which are, as we shall presently see, notable indeed. To be sure, the dead have not been wholly neglected in favor of the living—the winter has witnessed the release of further recordings of symphonies and concertos, suites, quartets, sonatas, solo instrumental and vocal music by Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Moussorgsky, Schubert, Schumann and Strauss, and to a consideration of these publications we shall come in good time. But of greater significance are the achievements of various orchestras—notably those of Boston and Philadelphia—and certain conductors—notably Mr. Koussewitsky and Mr. Stokowski—in the recording of modern master works, the productions of contemporary composers; the recording, in other words, of such works as Ravel's Bolero, of Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, of Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." In a sense, we suppose, these recordings were experimental, but so successfully have they been accomplished that we may reasonably conclude the recording process has attained maturity, that its technique has been, if not perfected, at least advanced to a degree that permits the reproduction of the most complex modern scores. Five years past a recorded "Sacre du Printemps" would have been unthinkable (indeed, almost that long ago Mr. Stokowski attempted to make records of this celebrated score); today the gramophone affords us a performance of this work scarcely less thrilling than one we might hear in the concert hall. . . . But let us turn to a more detailed consideration of the new records:

Ravel's Bolero

Two recordings of the season's most celebrated symphonic novelty are now available: one made by a European orchestra under the direction of the composer, and the other a domestic product (Victor), reproducing a performance of Ravel's ballet by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Of these, only the second requires our attention.

The Bolero received its premiere in the United States at a concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, given at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 14 last, under the direction of Mr. Toscanini. It was not until some time afterward that Mr. Koussewitsky secured the work for performance in Boston; it was not until midseason that he included it on programs which the Boston Symphony played in Brooklyn and New York. Recent press dispatches, reporting the opening of the Philharmonic-Symphony's European tour with a concert given in Paris, quote Ravel's expression of a preference for Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of his work—especially his choice of a slower tempo than that at which Mr. Toscanini paces the music—and doubtless this sanction embraces the recorded performance. It is not our intention to discuss the comparative virtues of Mr. Toscanini's and Mr. Koussewitsky's interpretations of the Bolero; we feel called upon only again to felicitate Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra on this proof of their virtuosity, perpetuated on these records.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, in certain respects, a less scrupulous musician than Mr. Toscanini, quite ready to take advantage of opportunities for the exhibition of his own and his orchestra's virtuosity. The results of this tendency are performances without exception brilliant, but not infrequently superficial in their penetration and revelation of the music's substance. But Ravel's Bolero is not musically significant; its salience may be traced to the virtuoso treatment of its musical material, and to its unique form, which is that of a series of variations on a theme of popular Spanish character. These variations are not, however, variations in the strict sense of the term: the theme itself (in two parts) is repeated without melodic, rhythmic or harmonic alteration; only the instrumentation changed with each repetition. At first the rhythm of the Bolero, a Spanish dance in triple time, is indicated by percussion, and over this accompaniment which continues until the end of the piece, the theme is first sung by a solo flute. Thereafter it is given to other instruments in turn; later to groups of instruments. Almost imperceptibly the tempo is accelerated; almost imperceptibly a crescendo is built up to a dramatic climax in the concluding measures of the Bolero, for which Ravel reserves the only harmonic modulation which he permits himself in this work. This form and treatment may be studied from the records made under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction: the acoustic quality of these discs is exceptionally fine, and the characteristic timbre of each of the instruments to which the melody of the Bolero is allotted is recorded with unusual fidelity. Recorded in three parts, the Bolero suffers only from the necessary interruptions of its continuity, which release the listener from the obsession created by the unceasing and gradually intensified repetition of a commonplace melodic and rhythmic formula.

The European recording of the Bolero, made upon the direction of the composer, has been imported to this country. In every essential respect it is inferior to the domestic product.

Classical Symphony

Thanks to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussewitsky, and the Victor Company that we are indebted for records of Prokofiew's Classical Symphony and of the Gavotte and March from the same composer's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The Classical Symphony has often appeared on Mr. Koussewitsky's programs, has been admired by the audiences of Boston symphony concerts at the Academy of Music and Carnegie Hall. It is an excellent example in the neo-classic style, representing the reaction of the modern composer against romanticism and impressionism. It is less solemn than many contemporary compositions. Prokofiew has a sense of humor, a delicate wit, and these qualities, with imagination and skill, make the symphony a delightful concert piece. This recording is irresponsible for the Victor Music Monthly's tardiness, consequently we have and may have forgotten many of the details of the performance. But we recall that Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of the score was admirably clear and precise, and that the orchestra played with the utmost brilliancy and finesse. Mr. Koussewitsky has recorded the Gavotte and March with the Boston Symphony, but the Classical Symphony is played by the London Symphony Orchestra. Some years ago Mr. Coates and the London Symphony made a record of the Scherzo and March extracted from this latter work, perpetuating a performance scarcely inferior to that contrived by Mr. Koussewitsky. But it is convenient to have excerpts from the "Love of Three Oranges" sharing a set of two discs with the Classical Symphony—though, to be sure, there are other of Prokofiew's works which might have been ra-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAY 15 1930

An American Orchestra in Europe

Thus far, the tour of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society in Europe has been an unqualified artistic success. In France and in Italy, where popular musical culture is centuries older than it is in the United States and where critical standards are high, praise of the performance of the orchestra and of the interpretations of its conductor, Signor Toscanini, has been uniformly enthusiastic. Every reason exists for believing that the judgment of Vienna, Berlin and London will be the same as that already returned by Paris, Zurich and Rome.

Unfortunately, the triumph of the orchestra is one in which Americans can glory only a little. In the last analysis, it reflects less the growth of musical culture in the United States than its tremendous financial power. That men of great wealth in the United States are glad to spend their fortunes in subsidizing so excellent an orchestra and in retaining so admirable a leader is evidence that a preoccupation with material affairs does not preclude a lively interest in the arts. The circumstance that thousands of Americans weekly during the season are eager to hear such an orchestra under such a leader is likewise evidence of artistic susceptibilities, but having supplied the money and the audience the contribution of the United States is virtually ended. Not only are most of those who make up the orchestra of foreign birth and of alien blood, but, most significant, the repertory of the orchestra in Europe is bare of American compositions.

The lack of American compositions among those performed in Europe is laid partially, and perhaps with some justice, at the door of Signor Toscanini, whose interest in American composers is less lively than that of M. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of Mr. Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. These gentlemen in similar circumstances doubtless would have found worthy American compositions to play; indeed, at his annual spring concerts in Paris, M. Koussevitzky has introduced several American composers to Europe. None the less, the circumstance remains that no American composition for orchestra yet produced stands so high among works of its kinds that its omission from orchestral repertoire is glaring. Despite the activities of such able composers as Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Hanson, Mr. Copland, Mr. Sessions, Mr. Taylor and others, musical composition in America has not yet produced works of overwhelming merit. In cultivation of the arts, the United States still has far to go before it reaches the stage at which it may be unpatronizingly compared with Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 18 1930

TWO ORCHESTRAL LISTS

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WHILE the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is pursuing its highly successful career abroad, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has completed its season (which runs into the first week of May), and dispatched us the last of the well-known brown-covered pamphlets containing the invaluable program notes of Mr. Philip Hale, and the customary summary of the orchestra's activities. In this connection, it might be interesting to compare the musical fare offered by the two orchestras in one each of their principal series—the Philharmonic's Thursday evening series, for instance, in Carnegie Hall, and the Bostonians's Friday afternoon series in Symphony Hall.

The Philharmonic-Symphony gave twenty-six Thursday evening concerts: fifteen under Arturo Toscanini, seven under Willem Mengelberg and four under Bernardino Molinari, offering the following repertoire:

BACH, Passacaglia (tr. Respighi), Brandenburg Concerto No. 4; Suite No. 3. BEETHOVEN: Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9; Overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Leonore," No. 3; Excerpts from "Prometheus."

BERLIOZ: Harold in Italy; "Queen Mab" scherzo; Rakoczy March. BOCCHERINI, Cello Concerto. BORODIN, Dances from "Prince Igor." BRAHMS, Four Symphonies, Double Concerto; Haydn Variations. Violin Concerto. BUSCH, Mozart Variations.

CASELLA, Suite from "La Giara." CASTELNUOVO-TEDESCO, Symphonic Variations. CHOPIN, Piano Concerto in E minor. DEBUSSY, La Mer, Afternoon of a Faun, L'Isle Joyeuse (tr. Molinari). DE FALLA, Dances from "Three Cornered Hat." DVORAK, Cello Concerto. FRANCK, Symphony; Les Eolides. GOOSSENS, Sinfonietta.

HANDEL, Concerti Grossi Nos. 6, 12; Excerpts from "Alcina." HAYDN, Symphonies Nos. 13 (88); 3 (99). HONEGGER, Pastorale d'Ete; Pacific 231. KODALY, Psalmus Hungaricus; Summer Evening. LISZT, Hungarian Fantasy. LOEFFLER, A Pagan Poem. MENDELSSOHN, Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream;" "Fingal's Cave." MAHLER, Das Lied von der Erde. MOUSSORGSKY, Pictures at an Exhibition (tr. Ravel). MOZART: Adagio and Fugue; Masonic Funeral Music; "Jupiter" Symphony; Symphony in D (K. 504), piano concertos in D minor and A major.

PAER: Overture to "Il Sargino." PICK-MANGIAGALLI, Nocturne and Rondo. PIZZETTI, Rondo Veneziano. RAVEL, Bolero, La Valse. RESPIGHI, Feste Romane, Fountains of Rome; Concerto Gregoriano. ROGER DUCASSE, Sarabande. ROSSINI, Overtures to "L'Italiana in Algeri" and "Signor Bruschino."

SCHUMANN, Overture to "Manfred," Rhenish Symphony. SIBELIUS, Finlandia. SMETANA, Vltava. STRAUSS, Don Quixote, Till Eulenspiegel, Heldenleben, Death and Transfiguration, Don Juan, Salome's Dance. STRAVINSKY, Fireworks, "Fire Bird" Suite. TCHAIKOVSKY, Romeo and Juliet, Symphony No. 5. TOMMASINI, Carnevale di Venezia. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, Tallis Variations. VIVALDI, Concerto Grosso in A minor. WAGENAAR, Sinfonietta.

WAGNER: A Faust Overture; Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser;" Prelude and Prelude to Act III of "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude and Finale from "Tristan"; Ride of the Valkyries; Waldweben from "Siegfried"; Rhine Journey, Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung"; Prelude and Good Friday Music from "Parsifal."

WEBER: "Rubezahl" Overture. WETZLER, Dances from "The Basque Venus." ZANDONAI, Excerpts from "Giulietta e Romeo."

The Boston Symphony have twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts: twenty-one under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and one each under Richard Burgin, Alexander Glazounoff and Eugene Goossens. Henry Eichheim, Samuel Gardner and Walter Piston conducted their own works in three programs otherwise under Dr. Koussevitzky. The following repertoire was offered:

BACH, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Prelude and Fugue in E flat (arr. Steinberg). BAX, Symphony No. 2. BEETHOVEN, Symphonies Nos. 4, 5, 6; Piano Concerto No. 4; Overtures to "Leonore," No. 3, "Egmont." BLOCH, Schelomo. BORODIN, Symphony No. 2. BRAHMS, Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3; Academic Festival Overture.

CHADWICK, Sinfonietta. DEBUSSY, La Mer, La Demoiselle Elue; Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien. DE FALLA, Dances from "Three Cornered Hat." DVORAK, New World Smyphony. DUKELSKY, Symphony No. 2. EICHHEIM, Java; Burma. FAIRCHILD, Chants Negres. GAILLIARD, Sonata in G (tr. Steinberg). GARDNER, Broadway. GLAZOUNOFF, Symphony No. 6; Violin Concerto; Stenka Razine. GOOSSENS, Concertino. GRUENBERG, The Enchanted Isle, Jazz Suite.

HANDEL, Concerto Grosso No. 10. HAYDN, Symphony in D (No. 31). HILL, Lilacs. JOSTEN, Jungle. LAZAR, Concerto Grosso No. 1. LOEFFLER, Canticle of St. Francis. MARTELLI, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs. MOUSSORGSKY, Prelude to "Khovantchina." MOZART, Symphonies in E flat (K.543) and C (K.538); Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Eine kleine Nachtmusik.

PICK-MANGIAGALLI, Prelude and Fugue. PISTON, Suite PROKOFIEFF, Scythian Suite; Piano Concerto No. 2. RAVEL, Ma Mere l'Oye, Bolero, Suite No. 2 from "Daphnis et Chloe"; Rhapsodie Espagnole. RESPIGHI, Pines or Rome, Feste Romane. RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, Suite from "Coq d'Or"; Sadko. SAINT-SAENS, Symphony No. 3, Violin Concerto. SCHUMANN, Symphonies Nos. 1, 2. SIBELIUS, Symphonies Nos. 2, 6; Violin Concerto. SPOHR, Nocturne and Janissaries' Music. STRAUSS, Interlude from "Intermezzo," Till Eulenspiegel, Don Juan, Sirfonia Domestica, Alpine Symphony STRAVINSKY, "Fire Bird" Suite, Apollon Musagete.

TCHAIKOVSKY, Pathetic Symphony, 1812 Overture. TOURNIER, Feerie. VIVALDI, Concerto in D minor. WAGNER, A Faust Overture, Prelude and Finale from "Tristan." WALTON, Portsmouth Point. WEBER, Overtures to "Oberon" and "Euryanthe." WETZLER, Dances from The Basque Venus.

Forty-seven composers were represented in each series under discussion. The Philharmonic-Symphony played 103 works in this particular series; the Bostonians, in the corresponding series, 88 works. Of the 176 on both lists only 15 were common to both series; of the 69 composers 25. Whereby it can be deduced that the orchestras followed different lines in program making.

Of the composers represented in the Philharmonic's Thursday evenings, Wagner leads the list with eleven works or excerpts. Beethoven follows with ten; Brahms with seven; Mozart and Strauss with six each; Bach, Debussy, Handel, Mendelssohn, Respighi with three each; Haydn, Honegger, Ravel, Rossini, Schumann, Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky with two each.

Of the composers represented in the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoons Beethoven leads with six works, followed by Strauss with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four; Bach, Debussy, Glazounoff with three; Bax, De Falla, Eichheim, Gruenberg, Haydn, Prokofieff, Respighi, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, Wagner and Weber with two each.

The Philharmonic-Symphony, offering fourteen more works than the Boston Symphony in a series including two more concerts, gave much more attention to Wagner and considerably more to Beethoven. The Bostonians waxed more modern, playing forty-five works by twenty-seven living composers, as compared with the thirty-three works by twenty-two living composers given by the Philharmonic. A similar difference appears in the matter of novelties offered in the two series, ten works new to New York and twenty-five new to Boston.

American composers, as has been remarked before, found little favor with the Philharmonic this last season, two, Loeffler and Wagenaar, achieving representation with one work each. But Mr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues played thirteen works by eleven American composers. In the case of Italian composers in the two series, the case is nearly an exact reverse: Philharmonic, twelve composers, fifteen works; Boston Symphony, three composers, four works.

In general, we can consider excellent performances of classic and romantic works as the feature of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season, especially of that part of it under Mr. Toscanini's direction, but must look to the Boston

(Continued from page five)

Symphony's visit for the most interesting novelties.

One reason that American composers fare better with the Boston Symphony than with our Philharmonic-Symphony may well be that Dr. Koussevitzky has devoted most of his activities to the Boston orchestra, although he conducts a short series in Paris each spring, and presumably has had more time to examine home-grown scores. Mr. Mengelberg, who has given us American works every now and then, although not often, divided his active season between the Philharmonic and the Amsterdam Concertgebouw; Mr. Molinari's season is shared by several cities. Mr. Toscanini is concentrating his activities on the Philharmonic-Symphony, but last season was only the first not shared with La Scala; it is reported that American scores will be among the works he will consider for 1930-'31.

We wrote last spring that we were willing to wager that the most frequently performed of the longer piano works in the New York recitals of 1929-'30 would be one by Beethoven, Chopin and Schumann. It proved, however, to be Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue, with fourteen performances, but Chopin was well represented this season, the C sharp minor scherzo finishing second with thirteen performances, and the F minor Ballade third with eleven.

Chopin's Fantasy, Op. 49, Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53, and B minor sonata are tied for fourth place with Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques at ten performances each. Nine performances were received by Chopin's Ballades in G minor and A flat major; eight by Beethoven's "Moonlight" and "Appassionata" sonatas; seven by Chopin's F major Ballade, Bach's Italian Concerto, Brahm's F minor sonata and Chopin's B minor scherzo. Liszt, Balakireff and Franck were also represented by piano works of corresponding length played five or more times.

Last year Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata and the Chopin Fantasy tied for first place with eleven performances each, followed by the G minor Ballade with ten. In 1927-'28 this ballade won the championship with eighteen performances, followed by the A flat Polonaise and the Fantasy, with thirteen and twelve representations.

Chausson's "Poeme" was the violinistic champion this season with seven performances, among longer works; the Bach and Vitali Chaconnes, Franck's sonata and Bruch's G minor concerto follow with six performances each. Last season, the Franck sonata and Brahm's D minor sonata tied for first place with seven performances. These figures are intended to include the 148 piano recitals and sixty-two violin recitals given in 1929-'30, up through yesterday.

A professional reviewer attending many piano or violin recitals is likely to hear certain often played numbers much more often than they would be heard by an average concert goer, and thereby should not give too much importance to the impression of repetitiousness which he may have gained at the end of a season's rounds. In the piano recitals, the most played work figured in less than one in ten recitals. But it seems hardly unfair to suggest that our piano recitalists often think along similar lines in their program making, and a minority look outside the list of thirty or forty major works—well, say fifty works—for their principal numbers. Sometimes, within the list, there are fluctuations, a work will be little played for a while, and then begin an intensive session in the limelight.

This is not, of course, to call for a wholesale turning to new or unfamiliar works, but a suggestion that a judicious search beyond the charmed circle of the favored classic and romantic numbers should add to the freshness and interest of the programs.

MAY '17
on Page 12

98

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAY 11 193[illegible]

Modern Music Recorded

By EDWARD CUSHING

Reviewing Recorded Performances of Ravel's Bolero, Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, and Strawinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps'

WITHIN the past few months much modern music has been made available for the owner of a gramophone, the collector of a library of phonographic discs. The recording companies, having in three or four years well-nigh exhausted the standard symphonic repertory, have turned their attention from the classic to the living masters, with results which are, as we shall presently see, notable indeed. To be sure, the dead have not been wholly neglected in favor of the living—the winter has witnessed the release of further recordings of symphonies and concertos, suites, quartets, sonatas, solo instrumental and vocal music by Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Moussorgsky, Schubert, Schumann and Strauss, and to a consideration of these publications we shall come in good time. But of greater significance are the achievements of various orchestras—notably those of Boston and Philadelphia—and certain conductors—notably Mr. Koussewitsky and Mr. Stokowski—in the recording of modern master works, the productions of contemporary composers; the recording, in other words, of such works as Ravel's Bolero, of Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, of Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." In a sense, we suppose, these recordings were experimental, but so successfully have they been accomplished that we may reasonably conclude the recording process has attained maturity, that its technique has been, if not perfected, at least advanced to a degree that permits the reproduction of the most complex modern scores. Five years past a recorded "Sacre du Printemps" would have been unthinkable (indeed, almost that long ago Mr. Stokowski attempted to make records of this celebrated score); today the gramophone affords us a performance of this work scarcely less thrilling than one we might hear in the concert hall. . . . But let us turn to a more detailed consideration of the new records:

Ravel's Bolero

Two recordings of the season's most celebrated symphonic novelty are now available: one made by a European orchestra under the direction of the composer, and the other a domestic product (Victor), reproducing a performance of Ravel's ballet by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Of these, only the second requires our attention.

The Bolero received its premiere in the United States at a concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, given at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 14 last, under the direction of Mr. Toscanini. It was not until some time afterward that Mr. Koussewitsky secured the work for performance in Boston; it was not until midseason that he included it on programs which the Boston Symphony played in Brooklyn and New York. Recent press dispatches, reporting the opening of the Philharmonic-Symphony's European tour with a concert given in Paris quote Ravel's expression of a preference for Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of his work—especially his choice of a slower tempo than that at which Mr. Toscanini paces the music—and doubtless this sanction embraces the recorded performance. It is not our intention to discuss the comparative virtues of Mr. Toscanini's and Mr. Koussewitsky's interpretations of the Bolero; we feel called upon only again to felicitate Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra on this proof of their virtuosity, perpetuated on these records.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, in certain respects, a less scrupulous musician than Mr. Toscanini, quicker to take advantage of opportunities for the exhibition of his own and his orchestra's virtuosity. The results of this tendency are performances without exception brilliant, but not infrequently superficial in their penetration and revelation of the music's substance. But Ravel's Bolero is not musically significant; its salience may be traced to the virtuoso treatment of its musical material, and to its unique form, which is that of a series of variations on a theme of popular Spanish character. These variations are not, however, variations in the strict sense of the term: the theme itself (in two parts) is repeated without melodic, rhythmic or harmonic alteration; only the instrumentation changed with each repetition. At first the rhythm of the Bolero, a Spanish dance in triple time, is indicated by percussion, and over this accompaniment which persists until the end of the piece, the theme is first sung by a solo flute. Thereafter it is given to other instruments in turn; later to groups of instruments. Almost imperceptibly the tempo is accelerated; almost imperceptibly a crescendo is built up to a dramatic climax in the concluding measures of the Bolero, for which Ravel reserves the only harmonic modulation which he permits himself in this work. This form and treatment may be studied from the records made under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction: the acoustic quality of these discs is exceptionally fine, and the characteristic timbre of each of the instruments to which the melody of the Bolero is allotted recorded with unusual fidelity. Recorded in three parts, the Bolero differs only from the necessary interruptions of its continuity, which release the listener from the obsession created by the unceasing and gradually intensified repetition of a commonplace melodic and rhythmic motif.

The European recording of the Bolero, made upon the direction of the composer, has been imported to this country. In every essential respect it is inferior to the domestic product.

Classical Symphony

[illegible] to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussewitsky, and the Victor Company that we are indebted for records of Prokofiew's Classical Symphony and of the Gavotte and March from the same composer's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The Classical Symphony has often appeared on Mr. Koussewitsky's programs, has been enjoyed by the audiences of Boston symphony concerts at the Academy of Music and Carnegie Hall. It is an essay in the neoclassic style, representing the reaction of the modern composer against romanticism and impressionism and is much less solemn than most contemporary compositions. Prokofiew has a sense of humor, a delicate wit, and these qualities, with imagination and skill, make the symphony a delightful concert piece. This recording is irresponsible. The Victor Music Mo[illegible]ncy, conscientious and [illegible] may [illegible]ian [illegible] of ago Mr. Coates and the London Symphony made a record of the Scherzo and March extracted from this latter work, perpetuating a performance scarcely inferior to that contrived by Mr. Koussewitsky. But it is convenient to have excerpts from the "Love of Three Oranges" sharing a set of two discs with the Classical Symphony—though, to be sure, there are other of Prokofiew's works which might have been recorded in their stead. Let us hope that one of these days Mr. Koussewitsky and the Victor Company will make available for the library of the gramophone both the Scythian Suite and the First Piano Concerto.

rope Philharbeen an and in enturies where e per-retа-been s for Berlin dy re-

ra is ttle.
of its at glad to spend their fort[illegible]n subsidizing so excellent an orchestra and in retaining so admirable a leader is evidence that a preoccupation with material affairs does not preclude a lively interest in the arts. The circumstance that thousands of Americans weekly during the season are eager to hear such an orchestra under such a leader is likewise evidence of artistic susceptibilities, but having supplied the money and the audience the contribution of the United States is virtually ended. Not only are most of those who make up the orchestra of foreign birth and of alien blood, but, most significant, the repertory of the orchestra in Europe is bare of American compositions.

The lack of American compositions among those performed in Europe is laid partially, and perhaps with some justice, at the door of Signor Toscanini, whose interest in American composers is less lively than that of M. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of Mr. Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. These gentlemen in similar circumstances doubtless would have found worthy American compositions to play; indeed, at his annual spring concerts in Paris, M. Koussevitzky has introduced several American composers to Europe. None the less, the circumstance remains that no American composition for orchestra yet produced stands so high among works of its kinds that its omission from orchestral repertoire is glaring. Despite the activities of such able composers as Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Hanson, Mr. Copland, Mr. Sessions, Mr. Taylor and others, musical composition in America has not yet produced works of overwhelming merit. In cultivation of the arts, the United States still has far to go before it reaches the stage at which it may be unpatronizingly compared with Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 18 1930

TWO ORCHESTRAL LISTS

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WHILE the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is pursuing its highly successful career abroad, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has completed its season (which runs into the first week of May), and dispatched us the last of the well-known brown-covered pamphlets containing the invaluable program notes of Mr. Philip Hale, and the customary summary of the orchestra's activities. In this connection, it might be interesting to compare the musical fare offered by the two orchestras in one each of their principal series—the Philharmonic's Thursday evening series, for instance, in Carnegie Hall, and the Bostonians's Friday afternoon series in Symphony Hall.

The Philharmonic-Symphony gave twenty-six Thursday evening concerts: fifteen under Arturo Toscanini, seven under Willem Mengelberg and four under Bernardino Molinari, offering the following repertoire:

BACH, Passacaglia (tr. Respighi). Brandenburg Concerto No. 4; Suite No. 3. BEETHOVEN: Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9; Overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Leonore," No. 3; Excerpts from "Prometheus."

BERLIOZ: Harold in Italy; "Queen Mab" scherzo; Rakoczy March. BOCCHERINI, Cello Concerto. BORODIN, Dances from "Prince Igor." BRAHMS, Four Symphonies, Double Concerto; Haydn Variations. Violin Concerto. BUSCH, Mozart Variations. CASELLA, Suite from "La Giara." CASTELNUOVO-TEDESCO, Symphonic Variations. CHOPIN, Piano Concerto in E minor. DEBUSSY, La Mer, Afternoon of a Faun, L'Isle Joyeuse (tr. Molinari). DE FALLA, Dances from "Three Cornered Hat." DVORAK, Cello Concerto. FRANCK, Symphony; Les Eolides. GOOSSENS, Sinfonietta.

HANDEL, Concerti Grossi Nos. 6, 12; Excerpts from "Alcina." HAYDN, Symphonies Nos. 13 (88); 3 (99). HONEGGER, Pastorale d'Ete; Pacific 231. KODALY, Psalmus Hungaricus; Summer Evening. LISZT, Hungarian Fantasy. LOEFFLER, A Pagan Poem. MENDELSSOHN, Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream;" "Fingal's Cave." MAHLER, Das Lied von der Erde. MOUSSORGSKY, Pictures at an Exhibition (tr. Ravel). MOZART: Adagio and Fugue; Masonic Funeral Music; "Jupiter" Symphony; Symphony in D (K. 504), piano concertos in D minor and A major.

PAER: Overture to "Il Sargino." PICK-MANGIAGALLI, Nocturne and Rondo. PIZZETTI, Rondo Veneziano. RAVEL, Bolero, La Valse. RESPIGHI, Feste Romane, Fountains of Rome; Concerto Gregoriano. ROGER DUCASSE, Sarabande. ROSSINI, Overtures to "L'Italiana in Algeri" and "Signor Bruschino."

SCHUMANN, Overture to "Manfred," Rhenish Symphony. SIBELIUS, Finlandia. SMETANA, Vltava. STRAUSS, Don Quixote, Till Eulenspiegel, Heldenleben, Death and Transfiguration, Don Juan, Salome's Dance. STRAVINSKY, Fireworks, "Fire Bird" Suite. TCHAIKOVSKY, Romeo and Juliet, Symphony No. 5. TOMMASINI, Carnevale di Venezia. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, Tallis Variations. VIVALDI, Concerto Grosso in A minor. WAGENAAR, Sinfonietta.

WAGNER: A Faust Overture; Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser;" Prelude and Prelude to Act III of "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude and Finale from "Tristan"; Ride of the Valkyries; Waldweben from "Siegfried"; Rhine Journey, Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung"; Prelude and Good Friday Music from "Parsifal." WEBER: "Rubezahl" Overture, WETZLER, Dances from "The Basque Venus." ZANDONAI, Excerpts from "Giulietta e Romeo."

The Boston Symphony have twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts: twenty-one under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and one each under Richard Burgin, Alexander Glazounoff and Eugene Goossens. Henry Eichheim, Samuel Gardner and Walter Piston conducted their own works in three programs otherwise under Dr. Koussevitzky. The following repertoire was offered:

BACH, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Prelude and Fugue in E flat (arr. Steinberg). BAX, Symphony No. 2. BEETHOVEN, Symphonies Nos. 4, 5, 6; Piano Concerto No. 4; Overtures to "Leonore," No. 3, "Egmont." BLOCH, Schelomo. BORODIN, Symphony No. 2. BRAHMS, Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3; Academic Festival Overture.

CHADWICK, Sinfonietta. DEBUSSY, La Mer, La Demoiselle Elue; Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien. DE FALLA, Dances from "Three Cornered Hat." DVORAK, New World Smyphony. DUKELSKY, Symphony No. 2. EICHHEIM, Java, Burma. FAIRCHILD, Chants Negres. GAILLIARD, Sonata in G (tr. Steinberg). GARDNER, Broadway. GLAZOUNOFF, Symphony No. 6; Violin Concerto; Stenka Razine. GOOSSENS, Concertino. GRUENBERG, The Enchanted Isle, Jazz Suite.

HANDEL, Concerto Grosso No. 10. HAYDN, Symphony in D (No. 31). HILL, Lilacs. JOSTEN, Jungle. LAZAR, Concerto Grosso No. 1. LOEFFLER, Canticle of St. Francis. MARTELLI, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs. MOUSSORGSKY, Prelude to "Khovantchina." MOZART, Symphonies in E flat (K.543) and C (K.338); Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Eine kleine Nachtmusik.

PICK-MANGIAGALLI, Prelude and Fugue. PISTON, Suite PROKOFIEFF, Scythian Suite; Piano Concerto No. 2. RAVEL, Ma Mere l'Oye, Bolero, Suite No. 2 from "Daphnis et Chloe"; Rhapsodie Espagnole. RESPIGHI, Pines or Rome, Feste Romane. RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, Suite from "Coq d'Or"; Sadko. SAINT-SAENS, Symphony No. 3, Violin Concerto. SCHUMANN, Symphonies Nos. 1, 2. SIBELIUS, Symphonies Nos. 2, 6; Violin Concerto. SPOHR, Nocturne and Janissaries' Music. STRAUSS, Interlude from "Intermezzo," Till Eulenspiegel, Don Juan, Sinfonia Domestica, Alpine Symphony STRAVINSKY, "Fire Bird" Suite, Apollon Musagete.

TCHAIKOVSKY, Pathetic Symphony, 1812 Overture. TOURNIER, Feerie. VIVALDI, Concerto in D minor. WAGNER, A Faust Overture, Prelude and Finale from "Tristan." WALTON, Portsmouth Point. WEBER, Overtures to "Oberon" and "Euryanthe." WETZLER, Dances from The Basque Venus.

Forty-seven composers were represented in each series under discussion. The Philharmonic-Symphony played 103 works in this particular series; the Bostonians, in the corresponding series, 88 works. Of the 176 on both lists only 15 were common to both series; of the 69 composers 25. Whereby it can be deduced that the orchestras followed different lines in program making.

Of the composers represented in the Philharmonic's Thursday evenings, Wagner leads the list with eleven works or excerpts. Beethoven follows with ten; Brahms with seven; Mozart and Strauss with six each; Bach, Debussy, Handel, Mendelssohn, Respighi with three each; Haydn, Honegger, Ravel, Rossini, Schumann, Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky with two each.

Of the composers represented in the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoons Beethoven leads with six works, followed by Strauss with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four; Bach, Debussy, Glazounoff with three; Bax, De Falla, Eichheim, Gruenberg, Haydn, Prokofieff, Respighi, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, Wagner and Weber with two each.

The Philharmonic-Symphony, offering fourteen more works than the Boston Symphony in a series including two more concerts, gave much more attention to Wagner and considerably more to Beethoven. The Bostonians waxed more modern, playing forty-five works by twenty-seven living composers, as compared with the thirty-three works by twenty-two living composers given by the Philharmonic. A similar difference appears in the matter of novelties offered in the two series, ten works new to New York and twenty-five new to Boston.

American composers, as has been remarked before, found little favor with the Philharmonic this last season, two, Loeffler and Wagenaar, achieving representation with one work each. But Mr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues played thirteen works by eleven American composers. In the case of Italian composers in the two series, the case is nearly an exact reverse: Philharmonic, twelve composers, fifteen works; Boston Symphony, three composers, four works.

In general, we can consider excellent performances of classic and romantic works as the feature of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season, especially of that part of it under Mr. Toscanini's direction, but must look to the Boston

(Continued from page five)

Symphony's visit for the most interesting novelties.

One reason that American composers fare better with the Boston Symphony than with our Philharmonic-Symphony may well be that Dr. Koussevitzky has devoted most of his activities to the Boston orchestra, although he conducts a short series in Paris each spring, and presumably has had more time to examine home-grown scores. Mr. Mengelberg, who has given us American works every now and then, although not often, divided his active season between the Philharmonic and the Amsterdam Concertgebouw; Mr. Molinari's season is shared by several cities. Mr. Toscanini is concentrating his activities on the Philharmonic-Symphony, but last season was only the first not shared with La Scala; it is reported that American scores will be among the works he will consider for 1930-'31.

We wrote last spring that we were willing to wager that the most frequently performed of the longer piano works in the New York recitals of 1929-'30 would be one by Beethoven, Chopin and Schumann. It proved, however, to be Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue, with fourteen performances, but Chopin was well represented this season, the C sharp minor scherzo finishing second with thirteen performances, and the F minor Ballade third with eleven.

Chopin's Fantasy, Op. 49, Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53, and B minor sonata are tied for fourth place with Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques at ten performances each. Nine performances were received by Chopin's Ballades in G minor and A flat major; eight by Beethoven's "Moonlight" and "Appassionata" sonatas; seven by Chopin's F major Ballade, Bach's Italian Concerto, Brahm's F minor sonata and Chopin's B minor scherzo. Liszt, Balakireff and Franck were also represented by piano works of corresponding length played five or more times.

Last year Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata and the Chopin Fantasy tied for first place with eleven performances each, followed by the G minor Ballade with ten. In 1927-'28 this ballade won the championship with eighteen performances, followed by the A flat Polonaise and the Fantasy, with thirteen and twelve representations.

Chausson's "Poeme" was the violinistic champion this season with seven performances, among longer works; the Bach and Vitali Chaconnes, Franck's sonata and Bruch's G minor concerto follow with six performances each. Last season, the Franck sonata and Brahm's D minor sonata tied for first place with seven performances. These figures are intended to include the 148 piano recitals and sixty-two violin recitals given in 1929-'30, up through yesterday.

A professional reviewer attending many piano or violin recitals is okay to hear certain often played numbers much more often than they would be heard by an average concert goer and thereby should not give too much importance to the impression of repetitiousness which he may have gained at the end of a season's rounds. If the piano recitals, the most played works figured in less than one in ten recitals. But it seems hardly unfair to suggest that our piano recitalists often run along similar lines in their program making, and a minority look outside the list of thirty or forty major works—well, say fifty works—for their principal numbers. Sometimes, within the list, there are fluctuations, a work will be little played for a while, and then begin an intensive session in the limelight.

This is not, of course, to call for a wholesale turning to new or unfamiliar works, but a suggestion that a judicious search beyond the charmed circle of the favored classic and romantic numbers should add to the freshness and interest of the programs.

MAY 17 [illegible] Page

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAY 18 1930

VARIOUS CONDUCTORS

Summing Up of a Season's Concerts in Other Cities—Rotating Concertmasters

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE orchestral seasons in Philadelphia and in Boston end later than they do in New York. They have been the subject of recent comment by reviewers of the two cities. The respective policies of these orchestras are of interest. The Boston Orchestra, like the orchestra of Chicago, keeps to the one-conductor system, which is certainly best when it is practicable.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given brief respites during the season by entrusting certain visiting "guests" with the baton for pairs of concerts. These "guests," with the exception of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, who conducted one pair of concerts, were all composers, although Eugene Goossens, who conducted the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan. 24 and 25, has a reputation as orchestral leader as well as creative musician. The composer-conductors were Henry Eichheim, Alexander Glazunoff, Eugene Goossens, Walter Piston and Samuel Gardner. Of these, Mr. Glazunoff conducted a complete program of his own works, which included his Sixth symphony, violin concerto, and symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Mr. Goossens conducted a complete program which contained one novelty of his own creating, his "Concertino" for double string orchestra. Mr. Eichheim conducted performances of his orchestral pieces "Java" and "Burma," Mr. Gardner his "Broadway," Mr. Piston his Suite for orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky was relieved entirely of three pairs of subscription concerts of the regular Winter series and partly of three other pairs of concerts. Thus, with short periods of rest, one conductor remained in control of the orchestra for the whole season.

***

THE Philadelphia Orchestra had two principal conductors. The first was Leopold Stokowski, the second Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Guest conductors were Tullio Serafin, Emil Mlynarski and Artur Bodanzky. No composers were invited to preside. The season was, for all intents and purposes, divided between two conductors of very different methods and temperament. The same rule held true of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, of which the two conductors not rated as guests were Toscanini and Mengelberg. This system, though hardly avoidable with either orchestra (due to special conditions), did not work for the utmost good. No orchestra can do its best with conductors in charge as dissimilar as Stokowski and Gabrilowitsch, Toscanini and Mengelberg. It has been remarked before this in these columns that each conductor capable of forming conceptions of his own and enforcing his wishes upon the players procures a different tone from the orchestra. The things demanded of the players are different in important respects. The orchestras not only sound differently; they play differently. The one conductor may well undo in a sense what his predecessor has accomplished with pains and labor. The orchestra subjected to such treatment loses finish and identity of style, to say nothing of the serious effects upon public taste and public attitude toward music in the bewildering succession of various leaders.

***

NO better example could be offered of the vicious effects of this system than the cooperation, or lack of it, of Toscanini and Mengelberg as leaders of the Philharmonic-Symphony last season. The tonal as well as interpretive conceptions of these men differ as the night from the day. The Toscanini tone is all transparency and lustre, and it is not as deep in sonority as the Mengelberg tone, which on the other hand is coarser, less finely balanced and constituted than the tone of the Italian. And when Mr. Mengelberg followed Mr. Toscanini, the musical town was astonished and at first incredulous on hearing of Mr. Mengelberg's outspoken disapproval of what Mr. Toscanini had done with the band. These remarks were broadcast not only to friends of Mr. Mengelberg but to newspaper critics. They were followed by a specially bad concert under Mengelberg's direction, when the Philharmonic-Symphony played with an astonishing and most disagreeable stridency, brutality and exaggerated heaviness of tone. The disparity between the Mengelberg performances and the performances of Toscanini, the infuriated conducting of the one as compared with the lucent and dramatic performances of the other, coupled with Mengelberg's condemnation of what he alleged Toscanini had done to the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in the course of rehearsals and concerts, did not help the cause of the Dutch chef d'orchestre. The interesting part of all this is that Mengelberg was right in a considerable degree, even if he was not justified.

He did not know himself how far he was right, or why. But he did face an orchestra that Toscanini had changed in its executive and interpretive habits from the one Mengelberg had known the previous season; also an orchestra fatigued by Toscanini's unsparing demands upon the men in rehearsal. The orchestra just would not come up to scratch at Mengelberg's command, and Mengelberg found an instrument so different from the one he had left the season before that he could hardly credit his hearing. He complained audibly, bitterly. The orchestra had no more tone, but only a weak Italian pianissimo. Toscanini's long, broad beat had demoralized the players so that they could not obey satisfactorily the more economical gestures of Mengelberg, he said.

In the meantime, the orchestra, used up by the super-rehearsals of Toscanini, worked into a state of fatigue and general indifference, answered but lightly Mengelberg's pleas for bigger tone in the performance and refused to rise to his wishes. Mengelberg's fantastical performance of the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the César Franck symphony were a protest, deep and heartfelt, against the fine-grained Italianism of his colleague, and also a strenuous effort to bring the orchestra back to its previous technical and tonal characteristics. The attempt did not succeed. Mengelberg did indeed confront a new band, and in a day of waning public appeal. This was an aggravated example of what it means to an orchestra to seesaw between two conductors of prestige and personality.

***

NOR do Mr. Stokowski's unstable methods as regards his concertmasters appear to have proved any better for his orchestra than the changes of conductors. Last season the Philadelphia Orchestra was without an official concertmaster. The players of first violins in the orchestra became concertmasters in turn, by rotation. This followed a disagreement between Mr. Stokowski and his concertmaster in a previous season. It did not improve the virtuosity of the orchestra. Samuel Laciar remarked in The Philadelphia Public Ledger that "nothing serious happened and it may have been merely coincident that Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben' and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade,' with their very elaborate violin solos, did not appear on the programs of the season, although the latter ran very high in the request program voting among the 'miscellaneous class.' Not that these solo passages cannot be played by every member of the first violin section, but it places a violinist at a tremendous disadvantage to be called upon to play such works when he is filling the concertmaster's chair only 'by accident,' as it were." It might be added to this that the stability given an orchestra by an experienced and wholly reliable concertmaster is a thing not to be attained by any other single means or lightly to be dispensed with.

***

MEANWHILE the Pop concerts have started in Boston with Arthur Fiedler as conductor. They started with Ravel's "Bolero," a king of pieces for concerts of such a nature. Mr. Toscanini played "Bolero" in Paris in the composer's presence. He indicated Ravel to the audience. Ravel remarked ungratefully that he preferred Mr. Koussevitzky's tempo when he played the piece, a remark quoted with especial happiness in Boston. It is good to read Mr. Fiedler's programs. Those of Alfredo Casella, who preceded him at the Pops, were deadly serious. But the Boston Pop concerts are not subscription concerts in the wintertime. They are concerts of refreshment and entertainment. Mr. Fiedler takes account of this and realizes how much good music is to be found in the pages of an Offenbach, Suppé or Johann Strauss. If his programs, in turn, have an influence to redeem the churchly solemnity with which the audiences listened to the ministrations of Mr. Casella and the masters whom he invoked for an evening's entertainment, much good will be done. Debussy remarked that there is one music, which may be found in a waltz as well as in a symphony. It is also possible to listen to music without a portentous frown and a corrugated brow and still be an excellent listener and love the art, and even, like a true inhabitant of the wisest city in the world, "understand" it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 18 1930

99

A BEST-SELLER RECORDED

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

ONE hopes that Maurice Ravel, who has a pretty wit and a rare sense of irony, takes time occasionally to glance at some of the press reviews of his music published a quarter-century ago. He would surely be edified to come across certain of the critical comments that greeted, for example, the first performance here of his delicately textured string quartet, which one eminent appraiser described as "a drastic dose of wormwood and assafetida," indicating the necessity of an antidote, and which caused another to wonder that the artists who played it were not rewarded with catcalls and missiles. Ravel was then regarded as a "modernist," a perpetrator of wilfully obscure and ugly and perverted music—though few, in fact, were willing to admit that it was music at all.

What a change has come over the scene today! Ravel is being enriched, it is said, by his latest composition, and is on his way to becoming one of the magnificos of the contemporary music world. The tonal oil-gusher which is making him a plutocrat is—need we say?—"Bolero." It was only six months ago that Mr. Toscanini, at a Philharmonic-Symphony meeting in Carnegie Hall, disclosed to the world the concert version of "Bolero," with unforgettable results. The audience shouted, cheered, went crazy—and every audience since then has shouted, cheered, gone crazy at performances of "Bolero." The effect is, as Mr. Barrie's policeman would certainly have noted, infalliable.

And now, too, within half a year of its première as a concert work, "Bolero" has been recorded—not once, but twice. Close upon the heels of the version made abroad, with Ravel himself conducting the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris (Brunswick), comes a version made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky (Victor).

* * *

His Tongue in His Cheek?

IT HAS been alleged that Ravel wrote this work with his tongue in his cheek, "as Bizet wrote the the Toreador's song in 'Carmen.'" It is quite possible. Perhaps Ravel, a little weary of composing nothing but irreproachable music, esteemed by connoisseurs but unknown to lovers of the "Valse Triste" and "The Rosary," determined to make capital for once out of his necromantic musicianship and his mastery of all the tricks of his trade. Probably he smiles a bit wryly today over the reflection that such music as his delectable setting of the "Sheherazade" of Leclère for voice and orchestra, or the enticing "Rapsodie Espagnole," or "Daphnis et Chloe," or "L'Heure Espagnole," are savored only by musicians. Shall there not be cakes and ale occasionally for the scrupulous artist, in a moment of relaxation, as well as for the magnifico of jazz or the composer of "The Rosary"? At all events, "Bolero" is an accomplished fact, and Monsieur Ravel, let us hope, is taking his ease in the sun,buying a Cézanne or two, and planning the type of yacht he will order for a Mediterranean cruise next winter.

There are those who say that "Bolero" is only a clever trick. We suspect that it is more than that. It is a score in which craftsmanship and ingenuity are raised almost to the pitch of genius. Possibly there is something in the assertion that the piece "has not the true Bolero rhythm," for which reason, according to Mr. Philip Hale, Senor E. Fernandez Arbos, the excellent conductor from Madrid, "says he would not dare to conduct the work in Spain." We fancy that others will dare, and that the Spaniards will forgive Ravel, before the piece is half over, for his alleged impiety in dealing with their celebrated dance.

* * *

Tour de Force

IN "Bolero," remarks that faithful friend of all musical Frenchmen, Monsieur G. Jean-Aubry, "invention is reduced to a strict minimum, if by 'invention' is understood the idea of the fabrication of new themes. By a sort of irony, which is quite in keeping with his character, Maurice Ravel, having received an order for an orchestral dance to last about fifteen minutes, chose as a theme the most ordinary Bolero, the simplest, the least ornate, the least distinguished. From start to finish of the work this theme constantly recurs.

"The hearing of the same theme pitilessly reiterated might be expected to bore an audience to tears. Not so with this 'Bolero.' Ravel wished to demonstrate the converse of the well known definition which says that beauty is 'unity in variety,' and to prove that beauty can also be 'variety in unity.' In spite of the constant repetition, he has succeeded in writing an extremely varied and amusing work, and has done it solely by his prodigious orchestral virtuosity: by varying, with extraordinary skill, the instrumentation of the reiterated theme. He has succeeded in establishing the diverse coloring of the score and producing a new effect each time. It is like a complex system of lighting which, without in any way modifying the nature of the object illuminated, changes it constantly, in our sight, merely by the different play of lights."

* * *

Audacity Rewarded

RAVEL has solved, without evading any of its manifold difficulties, the musical problem which he set himself. The work might be regarded as the issue of a liaison between the Rossinian crescendo and the classic Passacaglia. At the beginning (Tempo di Bolero, moderato assai, C major, 3—4), the snare-drum, pianissimo, sets the rhythm of the Spanish dance, and this rhythm is maintained inexorably to the end. Above this ostinato, the instruments, entering at first one by one, reiterate a tune that is as common as mud, without change of tonality until just before the close, when the key, after having stuck to C major for 330 bars, suddenly changes, with magical effect, to E major.

The taking over of the impudently banal tune and its subsidiaries by one instrument after another—flute, clarinet, oboe d'amour, muted trumpet, saxophone—is accomplished with beguiling effect. When Ravel has drawn in his chosen assortment of individual instruments, he employs them in groups. By a mere process of tonal arithmetic, the constantly augmented sound produces a huge crescendo, lasting eighteen minutes or so, and reaching an irresistible climax.

The outcome is triumphant. Ravel, improving upon "Valencia," has turned off, in his brilliant and fluent way, an astonishing piece of bravura, captivating to the sense and the fancy. The insolent disdain of monotony's dire peril; the wit (insolent, too) of the manner in which the various orchestral participants are introduced; the long and ensnaring crescendo; the superb effect of the modulation to E major: these things are vanquishing.

* * *

The Two Recordings of "Bolero"

THE two recordings—Brunswick's French version, under Ravel's direction (four sides), and Victor's American, under Koussevitzky (three sides)—are exceedingly interesting to study side by side. Ravel's is, on the whole, the clearer. There is greater transparency in those collective statements of the theme that are given to mixed groups of instruments—as, for example, at the point where the principal tune is sung in the key of the tonic (C major) by h[illegible]horn and celesta, and in E major and G major by two flutes (page 19 of t[illegible]he miniature orchestral score). In the French version, the delicately di[illegible] dissonant strands are clearly audible; in the Koussevitzky version the tone at this point is opaque.

Ravel takes the piece at a slower tempo than his printed metronome mark calls for. He is reported to have criticized Mr. Toscanini in Paris for disregarding the metronome instruction in the score and playing the music too fast. But Ravel, judged by his own metronome mark (crotchet=76), takes it too slowly—his tempo throughout the "Bolero" is about crotchet=67.

Mr. Koussevitzky, on the other hand, regards the letter of the score, and establishes a tempo strictly in accordance with the composer's direction—but with this important qualification: he maintains this tempo only up to the point, a little more than half way through the piece, where the first violins take the chief melody in octaves. At this point (it is at the beginning of the third part of the record) Mr. Koussevitzky suddenly accelerates the tempo, driving it to crotchet=84. The effect is not happy, and it is without authority in the score, which asks for no tempo modification whatever. The hypnotic rigidity of Ravel's tempo has a cumulative power which Koussevitzky's abrupt speeding-up quite misses. Finally—to give the French recording its full due—Ravel's version reproduces the tumultuous effect of the concluding bar more vividly than does the American, which is blurred and thick in comparison.

But in quality of tone and vitality of accent the advantage is all on the side of the American recording. The Boston Orchestra is a better band than the Lamoureux, and Mr. Koussevitzky is a better conductor than Ravel. These factors tell in the recording. The individual instruments are superior in the Koussevitzky record, and their characteristic timbres are more faithfully reproduced. The full orchestral tone, as in the fortissimo of the concluding pages, is richer and more resonant. But one longs for the day when the scientific geniuses who are working in the service of the record-makers shall have solved the problem of securing a fortissimo of the massed violins of an orchestra that does not sound steely and harsh. The incomparably thrilling tone of the symphonic fiddles soaring through a climax of Wagner or Strauss has yet, so far as we know, to be satisfactorily [illegible]ed on the disks.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

100

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAY 17 1930

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS COMPARED WITH THOSE OF OTHER ORCHESTRAS

A summary of the musical works presented by the leading orchestras of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago are given by the music editor of the Boston Globe in a recent issue and some valuable comparisons and comment made in regard to predominance of modern music, classics or American compositions, with strong preference given Dr. Koussevitzky's programs as offering a wide and wise variety.

First, about the classics. A fair test of these is the performances of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart, and Brahms. In Boston we had in the subscription series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the Beethoven symphonies, the first, second, and third of the Brahms symphonies, and from Mozart the E flat and an early symphony in C.

In Philadelphia, in 30 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard the third, fifth, seventh and eighth of the Beethoven symphonies; the first, second, and fourth by Brahms, and by Mozart only an early one in D major (K 385).

In Chicago, in 28 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard only two Beethoven symphonies; and of the Mozart symphonies only the E flat.

A comparison more extended in scope of the programs in these three cities would only confirm what this brief one shows, that Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audiences as much, if not more, music by the great classic composers than Mr. Stock in Chicago, or Mr. Stokowski and his colleagues in Philadelphia.

The New York concerts of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are arranged in series much shorter than those in the other three cities, and do not lend themselves to exact comparison. In 10 different subscription series in New York and Brooklyn, including 99 concerts in all, Mr. Tescanini, Mr. Mengleberg, and guest conductors, gave 13 different works by Beethoven (not all symphonies) and nine works by Mozart, and six by Brahms.

Next, the case of the American composer. In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky included in the 24 pairs of concerts these American compositions, of which those marked * were first performances here. Sinfonietta in D major, G. W. Chadwick; "Java"* and "Burma", Henry Eichheim; "Chants Negres" Blair Fairchild "Broadway", Samuel Gardner; "The Enchanted Isle," "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; "Lilacs," E. B. Hill; "Jungle," Werner Josten; "Canticum Fratris Solis", C. M. Loeffler; Suite for Orchestras, Walter Piston; or 11 works by nine different composers.

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Gabrilowitsch and guest conductors led the following American compositions, in the 30 pairs of subscription concerts. "Java," Henry Eichheim; "Masquerade," Carl McKinley; "Morocco," Ernest Schelling; "Jurgen," Deems Taylor; Concerto for quarter tone piano, Hans Barth; Concerto for piano, Abram Chasins, or six pieces by six composers.

In Chicago, Mr. Stock's 28 programs included these American works. Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," John Alden Carpenter; "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; overture, "In Bohemia," Henry Hadley; "A Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratris Solis," C. M. Loeffler; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Edward MacDowell; "Morocco," Earnest Schelling; Suite "From the Northland," Leo Sowerby; Concerto for violin, and "Psalmodic Rhapsody" for chorus and orchestra, Frederick Stock; making 10 different works by eight composers.

In New York, Mr. Toscanini included no American works on his programs, nor has he put any on the programs for the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, now in progress. Other conductors included works by two recently naturalized Americans, and that was all. Obviously, Dr. Koussevitzky is more generous than his rivals to American composers, if an omission even more serious the past season's programs are to be the test.

New York, which hears much less music by American composers at its orchestral concerts than is played in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, not to mention several lesser musical capitals, can hardly claim to be the chief musical center of the United States judged by what in other Nations has always been the chief test, the performance of new works by the composers of the Nation.

It is not, by the way, always clear just which composers are to be counted as Americans. In the tables above resident composers like Bloch and Goossens, who grew up and won reputations abroad before coming here, are omitted and only Americans by birth or by residence for most of their lives in the United States are counted as American.

Finally, about modern music by foreigners. In Boston we had in the regular series performances of works by living composers not Americans as follows. If the title is given for a work that indicates the first Boston performance. Symphony No. 2 Bax (played at two pairs of concerts, "Schelomo," Bloch; two works by de Falla; Second Symphony, Dukelsky; three works by Glazunov (all conducted by the composer; Concertino, Goossens; Concerto grosso, Lazar; "Assyrian Bas Reliefs," Martelli; Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli; Piano Concerto No. 2, and another work ("Scythian Suite") Prokofieff; Bolero (repeated) and three other works, Ravel; "Feste Romane," and another work ("Pines of Rome") Respighi; Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessi, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangiagalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2; Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr. Stock in Chicago, and not Dr. Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated.

Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listed each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr. Stock and the hidebound conservation that rules in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

MAY 27 1930

Ravel's 'Bolero' Again

Boston Symphony Gives Thrilling Interpretation of French Composer's Colorful Work

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL
Press Music Critic

CONCERT-GOERS who heard the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with Frederick Stock, in the last event of the season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, still hear the incessant rhythm of Maurice Ravel's fascinating "Bolero"—an encore piece—ringing in their ears. You remember, those constantly reiterated beats and rolls of the snare drum? And you recall Mr. Stock's foreword as to some 356 measures—if our recollection is not at fault—through which that snare drum sounded, of course?

We had the exceeding good fortune to hear Ravel's same "Bolero" a day or two since, for the second time. It was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Not only that, but it was heard in Pittsburgh, although it was announced after the close of the orchestra season here the Boston aggregation would not visit Pittsburgh again in a year or more, owing to demands upon its time from its home town.

* * *

YET, WE heard the orchestra here, just the same; and we heard it play Ravel's "Bolero," which takes up exactly 13 minutes of time and rhythm, and glowing tone; of crashing crescendi, of smashing climaxes of dashing brilliancy, of flashing colors in myriad hues, so redolent of Spain, through the brain-child of the eminent French composer. You recall, likely, how the snare drum—which "starred" in the Chicago Orchestra's offering—started off with a faint pianissimo, and how the golden-toned clarinet entered a little later, on that alluring melody built over a tonic bass that dominated the entire 356 measures!

Well, the Boston Symphony's snare drummer "starred" in the playing we heard for the second time here, and the golden-toned clarinet of Koussevitzky's aggregation was fully equal to that of Mr. Stock. All we had to do was to close our eyes and imagine we were hearing the Chicago Orchestra over again, for the performance of the Boston Orchestra was on a parity with that of its Western contemporary.

* * *

AFTER this brief exposition it might be just as well to "spill the beans" now. The Boston Orchestra we heard was on a Victor record, rather, two of them, for the 13 minutes of playing required the two sides of one disc and one side of another. It was through the courtesy of J. J. Conaty—representative of the Standard Talking Machine Company—we listened in on the Boston players, in the audition room at 305 Penn Avenue. And those 13 minutes certainly were enjoyed.

Ravel dedicated this particular "Bolero," a dance of Spanish origin, to a dancer, who, in November, 1928, interpreted the music for the first time. Since then the "Bolero," so strikingly fantastic in content, has been played by many leading symphony orchestras, Koussevetzky's interpretation for the Victor sending a thrill through the hearer.

And so, hats off to Koussevitzky and his Boston players, especially the trap drummer; hats off to the Victor people, and hats off to Maurice Ravel. Often I've wished I could write just that kind of music. But then, even 50,000,000 Frenchmen couldn't do so well, either!

On Record
monitor May 31

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is now making recordings for a wider public than its several series of concerts may reach. During the last season its contributions to the new repertory of the Victor company were notable. Among them is the outstanding "hit" of the musical season, Maurice Ravel's impudent "Bolero," tour de force of the master orchestrator of our day.

Hearing in the concert hall this piece, which depends for its effect on monotonous, ceaseless rhythm and a constantly growing orchestral sonority, one might question its transference to disks with any real effectiveness. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, given the composer's stamp of approval over Mr. Toscanini's more galloping reading, comes through with brilliance and incisiveness. From the first soft marking of the rhythm and the first gentle yet firm outlining of the melody, the recorded version, like the concert hall reading, progresses inevitably and with a smashing impact to the vigorous climactic close.

"Bolero" fills 1½ double disk records. The remaining space on the second record is given over to a Debussyan orchestration of Erik Satie's "Gymnopédie" No. 1, a quiet, innocuous music, startling in its day but now holding little more than historical interest. Yet, from a musical point of view, it presents a pleasing and desirable aspect.

Maurice Ravel's magnificent suite "Daphnis et Chloé" is far removed from the tonal vigors and the rhythmic impetuosities of "Bolero." Yet there are many to whom it will appeal very strongly, and more permanently than the more vigorous dance music. Its beauties are those of exquisite miniatures, loveliness for the musical connoisseur, for those who will listen quietly, attentively, devotedly. Dr. Koussevitzky is a master hand with these delicacies and nuances, with the subtle tone gradations and lingering sonorities which lend character and merit to the gracile suite. Under his ministrations, his men have turned out a performance of rare effectiveness.

One hardly mentions the Boston Symphony Orchestra today without including Dr. Koussevitzky's name in the same phrase. It is suitable, then, that a recording of Koussevitzky's own, on the contrabass, should be listed with those of his men. To hear Koussevitzky on the records is to know the source of his fame. As he plays this most baffling of instruments, it is a deep-voiced cello, reaching below the depths of the ordinary cello, but singing with that same rich warmth, that same vibratory loveliness which is the cello at its best and the contrabass at its rarest. This record deploys a "Chanson Triste" of Dr. Koussevitzky's own composing and the Largo from a Sonata by Eccles for string bass and piano. In both pieces Pierre Luboshutz accompanies the [illegible] musi- [illegible]ot fre- [illegible]rabass [illegible]caliber [illegible]. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 18 1930

"GO WEST," AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS!

To the Editor of The New York Times:

IN his article in THE TIMES of Sunday, May 11, Mr. Downes appraises some of the benefits which may be derived from the present European tour of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. He voices the hope that Mr. Koussevitzky may soon be enabled to take his famous Boston organization abroad and so publish further the high state of symphonic achievement in America.

The writer would like to suggest that it would be far wiser if Mr. Koussevitzky—or Mr. Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra—were to do the exact opposite. Instead of going East to emulate Mr. Toscanini's European triumphs, why not go West and give the rest of America a long-hoped-for opportunity to hear these magnificent orchestras and their conductors?

Mr. Downes, like most of the other New York critics, has already noted the curious spectacle of a great American orchestra touring foreign countries without a single American work in its répertoire. It would seem a far more unfortunate fact that this orchestra has never even been heard in the vast majority of our own American cities.

Music lovers who live in New York seldom realize that there are millions of other Americans in every section of the country who appreciate fine music just as much as we do, but who have tragically few opportunities to hear it performed. The writer lived for a number of years in San Francisco, and knows from personal experience of the immense interest and pleasure aroused by occasional visits of great musicians. He remembers that his own love for symphonic music began when he first heard the New York Symphony Orchestra during one of Walter Damrosch's country-wide tours about fifteen years ago. He knows how the West today would anticipate a visit from the Philharmonic under Toscanini. The news that great sums of money have been spent to send them instead to European cities can only afford music lovers outside of New York a feeling of supreme disappointment.

Perhaps more can be hoped from Messrs. Koussevitzky and Stokowski. Surely they now have already shown themselves far more sympathetic toward American composers. If the opportunity arises in the next few years for either orchestra to make a tour, perhaps they will understand the wisdom of seeing America first.

It will probably be far less exciting and offer less opportunity for personal glory than a European trip. But Mr. Koussevitzky may find no little satisfaction in the fact that his performance of "Daphnis and Chloë" does not fall upon barren ground, even in Kansas or Oregon. And Mr. Stokowski may be amazed to discover that the glories of his orchestra have preceded him on his phonograph records; that Seattle and Des Moines will respond to the Passacaglia, the Brahms symphonies and the Debussy nocturnes like veterans of the top balcony of Carnegie Hall.

The huzzahs might not be quite as loud as those now reverberating fro[illegible] Paris and Turin and Milan. But the appreciation will be no less sincere.

RICHARD LEONARD.

New York, May 13, 1930.

June May 31

The comicalities of the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Society seem inexhaustible. The official name of the orchestra, since it extinguished Mr. Damrosch's band, is the Philharmonic-Symphony. From this double designation a correspondent in Milan, writing to the Manchester Guardian, draws this singular inference: "The combined Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras of New York and Boston and Toscanini are obviously made for each other."

Tut! tut! egregio signore, your maestro has not yet absorbed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Without too much difficulty, and not without praise, it still manages to maintain an independent existence.

700

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAY 17 1930

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS COMPARED WITH THOSE OF OTHER ORCHESTRAS

A summary of the musical works presented by the leading orchestras of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago are given by the music editor of the Boston Globe in a recent issue and some valuable comparisons and comment made in regard to predominance of modern music, classics or American compositions, with strong preference given Dr. Koussevitzky's programs as offering a wide and wise variety.

First, about the classics. A fair test of these is the performances of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart, and Brahms. In Boston we had in the subscription series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the Beethoven symphonies, the first, second, and third of the Brahms symphonies, and from Mozart the E flat and an early symphony in C.

In Philadelphia, in 30 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard the third, fifth, seventh and eighth of the Beethoven symphonies; the first, second, and fourth by Brahms, and by Mozart only an early one in D major (K 385).

In Chicago, in 28 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard only two Beethoven symphonies; and of the Mozart symphonies only the E flat.

A comparison more extended in scope of the programs in these three cities would only confirm what this brief one shows, that Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audiences as much, if not more, music by the great classic composers than Mr. Stock in Chicago, or Mr. Stokowski and his colleagues in Philadelphia.

The New York concerts of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are arranged in series much shorter than those in the other three cities, and do not lend themselves to exact comparison. In 10 different subscription series in New York and Brooklyn, including 99 concerts in all, Mr. Tescanini, Mr. Mengleberg, and guest conductors, gave 13 different works by Beethoven (not all symphonies) and nine works by Mozart, and six by Brahms.

Next, the case of the American composer. In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky included in the 24 pairs of concerts these American compositions, of which those marked * were first performances here. Sinfonietta in D major, G. W. Chadwick; "Java"* and "Burma", Henry Eichheim; "Chants Negres" Blair Fairchild "Broadway", Samuel Gardner; "The Enchanted Isle," "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; "Lilacs," E. B. Hill; "Jungle," Werner Josten; "Canticum Fratris Solis", C. M. Loeffler; Suite for Orchestras, Walter Piston; or 11 works by nine different composers.

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Gabrilowitsch and guest conductors led the following American compositions, in the 30 pairs of subscription concerts. "Java," Henry Eichheim; "Masquerade," Carl McKinley; "Morocco," Ernest Schelling; "Jurgen," Deems Taylor; Concerto for quarter tone piano, Hans Barth; Concerto for piano, Abram Chasins, or six pieces by six composers.

In Chicago, Mr. Stock's 28 programs included these American works. Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta," John Alden Carpenter; "Jazz Suite," Eugene Gruenberg; overture, "In Bohemia," Henry Hadley; "A Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratris Solis," C. M. Loeffler; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Edward MacDowell; "Morocco," Earnest Schelling; Suite "From the Northland," Leo Sowerby; Concerto for violin, and "Psalmodic Rhapsody" for chorus and orchestra, Frederick Stock; making 10 different works by eight composers.

In New York, Mr. Toscanini included no American works on his programs, nor has he put any on the programs for the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, now in progress. Other conductors included works by two recently naturalized Americans, and that was all. Obviously, Dr. Koussevitzky is more generous than his rivals to American composers, if an omission even more serious, the past season's programs are to be the test.

New York, which hears much less music by American composers at its orchestral concerts than is played in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, not to mention several lesser musical capitals, can hardly claim to be the chief musical center of the United States judged by what in other Nations has always been the chief test, the performance of new works by the composers of the Nation.

It is not, by the way, always clear just which composers are to be counted as Americans. In the tables above resident composers like Bloch and Goossens, who grew up and won reputations abroad before coming here, are omitted and only Americans by birth or by residence for most of their lives in the United States are counted as American.

Finally, about modern music by foreigners. In Boston we had in the regular series performances of works by living composers not Americans as follows. If the title is given for a work that indicates the first Boston performance. Symphony No. 2 Bax (played at two pairs of concerts, "Schelomo," Bloch; two works by de Falla; Second Symphony, Dukelsky; three works by Glazunov (all conducted by the composer; Concertino, Goossens; Concerto grosso, Lazar; "Assylian Bas Reliefs," Martelli; Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli; Piano Concerto No. 2, and another work ("Scythian Suite") Prokofieff; Bolero (repeated) and three other works, Ravel; "Feste Romane," and another work ("Pines of Rome") Respighi; Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessi, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangiagalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2; Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr. Stock in Chicago, and not Dr. Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated.

Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listed each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr. Stock and the hidebound conservation that rules in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

MAY 27 1930

Ravel's 'Bolero' Again

Boston Symphony Gives Thrilling Interpretation of French Composer's Colorful Work

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL
Press Music Critic

CONCERT-GOERS who heard the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with Frederick Stock, in the last event of the season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, still hear the incessant rhythm of Maurice Ravel's fascinating "Bolero"—an encore piece—ringing in their ears. You remember, those constantly reiterated beats and rolls of the snare drum? And you recall Mr. Stock's foreword as to some 356 measures—if our recollection is not at fault—through which that snare drum sounded, of course?

We had the exceeding good fortune to hear Ravel's same "Bolero" a day or two since, for the second time. It was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Not only that, but it was heard in Pittsburgh, although it was announced after the close of the orchestra season here the Boston aggregation would not visit Pittsburgh again in a year or more, owing to demands upon its time from its home town.

* * *

YET, WE heard the orchestra here, just the same; and we heard it play Ravel's "Bolero," which takes up exactly 13 minutes of time and rhythm, and glowing tone; of crashing crescendi, of smashing climaxes of dashing brilliancy, of flashing colors in myriad hues, so redolent of Spain, through the brain-child of the eminent French composer. You recall, likely, how the snare drum—which "starred" in the Chicago Orchestra's offering—started off with a faint pianissimo, and how the golden-toned clarinet entered a little later, on that alluring melody built over a tonic bass that dominated the entire 356 measures!

Well, the Boston Symphony's snare drummer "starred" in the playing we heard for the second time here, and the golden-toned clarinet of Koussevitzky's aggregation was fully equal to that of Mr. Stock. All we had to do was to close our eyes and imagine we were hearing the Chicago Orchestra over again, for the performance of the Boston Orchestra was on a parity with that of its Western contemporary.

* * *

AFTER this brief exposition it might be just as well to "spill the beans" now. The Boston Orchestra we heard was on a Victor record, rather, two of them, for the 13 minutes of playing required the two sides of one disc and one side of another. It was through the courtesy of J. J. Conaty—representative of the Standard Talking Machine Company—we listened in on the Boston players, in the audition room at 305 Penn Avenue. And those 13 minutes certainly were enjoyed.

Ravel dedicated this particular "Bolero," a dance of Spanish origin, to a dancer, who, in November, 1928, interpreted the music for the first time. Since then the "Bolero," so strikingly fantastic in content, has been played by many leading symphony orchestras, Koussevetzky's interpretation for the Victor sending a thrill through the hearer.

And so, hats off to Koussevitzky and his Boston players, especially the trap drummer; hats off to the Victor people, and hats off to Maurice Ravel. Often I've wished I could write just that kind of music But then, even 50,000,000 Frenchmen couldn't do so well, either!

On Record
Monitor May 31

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is now making recordings for a wider public than its several series of concerts may reach. During the last season its contributions to the new repertory of the Victor company were notable. Among them is the outstanding "hit" of the musical season, Maurice Ravel's impudent "Bolero," tour de force of the master orchestrator of our day.

Hearing in the concert hall this piece, which depends for its effect on monotonous, ceaseless rhythm and a constantly growing orchestral sonority, one might question its transference to disks with any real effectiveness. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, given the composer's stamp of approval over Mr. Toscanini's more galloping reading, comes through with brilliance and incisiveness. From the first soft marking of the rhythm and the first gentle yet firm outlining of the melody, the recorded version, like the concert hall reading, progresses inevitably and with a smashing impact to the vigorous climactic close.

"Bolero" fills 1½ double disk records. The remaining space on the second record is given over to a Debussyan orchestration of Erik Satie's "Gymnopédie" No. 1, a quiet, innocuous music, startling in its day but now holding little more than historical interest. Yet, from a musical point of view, it presents a pleasing and desirable aspect.

Maurice Ravel's magnificent suite "Daphnis et Chloé" is far removed from the tonal vigors and the rhythmic impetuosities of "Bolero." Yet there are many to whom it will appeal very strongly, and more permanently than the more vigorous dance music. Its beauties are those of exquisite miniatures, loveliness for the musical connoisseur, for those who will listen quietly, attentively, devotedly. Dr. Koussevitzky is a master hand with these delicacies and nuances, with the subtle tone gradations and lingering sonorities which lend character and merit to the gracile suite. Under his ministrations, his men have turned out a performance of rare effectiveness.

One hardly mentions the Boston Symphony Orchestra today without including Dr. Koussevitzky's name in the same phrase. It is suitable, then, that a recording of Koussevitzky's own, on the contrabass, should be listed with those of his men. To hear Koussevitzky on the records is to know the source of his fame. As he plays this most baffling of instruments, it is a deep-voiced cello, reaching below the depths of the ordinary cello, but singing with that same rich warmth, that same vibratory loveliness which is the cello at its best and the contrabass at its rarest. This record deploys a "Chanson Triste" of Dr. Koussevitzky's own composing and the Largo from a Sonata by Eccles for string bass and piano. In both pieces Pierre Luboshutz accompanies the contrabassiste with musicianly deftness. Novelties are not frequent on the disks. This contrabass music is a novelty of the finest caliber and the choicest quality. C. S. B.

"GO WE ... ORCHESTRAS!

THIS CLIPPING FROM

To the Editor of The New York Times:

IN his article in THE TIMES of Sunday, May 11, Mr. Downes appraises some of the benefits which may be derived from the present European tour of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. He voices the hope that Mr. Koussevitzky may soon be enabled to take his famous Boston organization abroad and so publish further the high state of symphonic achievement in America.

The writer would like to suggest that it would be far wiser if Mr. Koussevitzky—or Mr. Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra—were to do the exact opposite. Instead of going East to emulate Mr. Toscanini's European triumphs, why not go West and give the rest of America a long-hoped-for opportunity to hear these magnificent orchestras and their conductors?

Mr. Downes, like most of the other New York critics, has already noted the curious spectacle of a great American orchestra touring foreign countries without a single American work in its répertoire. It would seem a far more unfortunate fact that this orchestra has never even been heard in the vast majority of our own American cities.

Music lovers who live in New York seldom realize that there are millions of other Americans in every section of the country who appreciate fine music just as much as we do, but who have tragically few opportunities to hear it performed. The writer lived for a number of years in San Francisco, and knows from personal experience of the immense interest and pleasure aroused by occasional visits of great musicians. He remembers that his own love for symphonic music began when he first heard the New York Symphony Orchestra during one of Walter Damrosch's country-wide tours about fifteen years ago. He knows how the West today would anticipate a visit from the Philharmonic under Toscanini. The news that great sums of money have been spent to send them instead to European cities can only afford music lovers outside of New York a feeling of supreme disappointment.

Perhaps more can be hoped from Messrs. Koussevitzky and Stokowski. Surely they now have already shown themselves far more sympathetic toward American composers. If the opportunity arises in the next few years for either orchestra to make a tour, perhaps they will understand the wisdom of seeing America first.

It will probably be far less exciting and offer less opportunity for personal glory than a European trip. But Mr. Koussevitzky may find no little satisfaction in the fact that his performance of "Daphnis and Chloë" does not fall upon barren ground, even in Kansas or Oregon. And Mr. Stokowski may be amazed to discover that the glories of his orchestra have preceded him on his phonograph records; that Seattle and Des Moines will respond to the Passacaglia, the Brahms symphonies and the Debussy nocturnes like veterans of the top balcony of Carnegie Hall.

The huzzahs might not be quite as loud as those now reverberating from Paris and Turin and Milan. But the appreciation will be no less sincere.

RICHARD LEONARD.

New York, May 13, 1930.

Times May

The comicalities of the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Society seem inexhaustible. The official name of the orchestra, since it extinguished Mr. Damrosch's band, is the Philharmonic-Symphony. From this double designation a correspondent in Milan, writing to the Manchester Guardian, draws this singular inference: "The combined Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras of New York and Boston and Toscanini are obviously made for each other."

Tutti tutti egregio signore, your maestro has not yet absorbed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Without too much difficulty, and not without praise, it still manages to maintain an independent existence.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

Brahms in Full Feather: First American Festival of His Music

Sorting Out the Backgrounds—Fifty Years of Brahms from the Symphony Orchestra

THE general increase in the popularity of Brahms in the last ten years is fresh proof that a half century is none too little for a more than approximate estimate of a composer. While the "importance of Wagner, or Mendelssohn,, or Chaikovsky has varied with musical fashions, the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years. One critical moment was at the turn of the century. The smoke of the great Brahms-Wagner and Brahms-Bruckner wars having cleared away, people gazed over a battle field strewn with broken friendships, and suddenly realized that this world is large enough comfortably to hold two divergent musical styles at the same time. Then, it seemed, was the moment for critics to pronounce the last rites ove. Brahms as an issue, and to give him his just niche among the immortals. As it now appears, the final word was not then spoken. There has been still another accounting by time, that cool and leisurely critic.

That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms's most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. "Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer," wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1916. "To the ordinary amateur, who can enjoy his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, but it is apt to repel him."

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "repellent," "obscure," persisted for years, reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then there was the metaphor of the "unapproachable hilltides." James Huneker, with whom Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"His topmost peaks are tremendously remote, and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the plains" ("Old Time in Modern Music," 1905). And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his pinnacle rather than come to our level; if we want him we must climb to him by steps that are perhaps painful and slow." R. A. Streatfield looked upon Brahms as "wrapped in obscurity," and followed this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of human sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906), "It is perhaps this very austerity, this severe self-repression, this remoteness of personality that constitute to some minds the charm of Brahms's music. In a similar [illegible] on lofty heights, expecting him to stay there forever, with a small circle of the elect at his feet.

Such opinions as these need no other answer than the present festival, which perhaps no other Nineteenth Century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished forth on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has never greatly thrived on Mediterranean shores).

As for the "limitations" listed above, they have proved to be in large part the limitations of a tardy world. Time and custom, which solve all musical enigmas and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark places of Brahms, that the world might see, and mentioned out his arbitrary harshnesses, that the world might accept. In this way the "murky fog," which in the eighties was supposed to enshroud the symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the atmosphere was not yet clear about these four mountains, for a mist of wordy legends such as those quoted above hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient, has at last cleared the air. It is doubtful whether an audience of 1930, listening to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, is particularly aware of anything austere, harsh, or forbidding about them. One looks in vain for the chords of "pain" which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the melodic profusion of Brahms's themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word the sheer musical wealth is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today—and applauded to the echo. As for the graver moods that once repelled—they now only add a special character and impressiveness.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 finds something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular those passages which his contemporaries found too abrupt. The reticence and profundity of his emotional current, and the placid endings of his movements estranged him from many in his day of much romantic inflation and heroic fustian. These qualities are outblown and dated, while the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The lustre of Brahms's essential gold is more fully revealed rather than diminished by time.

George Henschel had not long taken charge of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 when the public realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful "modern"—(the word seems to have borne the same dread implications which it has for many today toward composers correspondingly advanced). This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms's native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose thereupon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbid (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the "Courier" of the same date found he symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second program by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

> One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms's Symphonies at concerts here? By no manner of means! There is not an inconsiderable portion of our public to whom the announcement of a Brahms symphony is a promise of unspeakable delight; people who look at their programs with anxious solicitude to see if there be not something by Brahms on it. Let them have their Brahms now and then, and let the rest of the public go hang, if it objects.

This "not inconsiderable portion of our public" did grow apace, and when Arthur Nikisch became the conductor in 1889, Boston was astonished to discover that the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry, were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance. This was the magician who also startled the hidebound and wary public of the Leipzig Gewandhaus into an appreciation of Brahms, the melodist, colorist and poet. Under the eloquent apostle there bloomed a flourishing faction. It became a cult, with its fringe of priggishness and other accompanying phenomena. Ere long Boston was spoken of as a Brahms center.

At the news of Brahms's death (April 3, 1897) Emil Paur, who was then conductor, arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10, the following appropriate and impressive, if decidedly sombre, program. Tragic Overture, Op. 81; Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Op. 102; Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98. Soloists were: Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

It would be interesting to know who first referred to the Brahms Symphonies as "classics," and when the remark was made. It was probably in the first years of this century. In any case, Emil Paur must have done his admirable part in giving them this label of permanence and universal respect. Boston, fortunate in its Brahms conductors had surely one of the very finest of them in Dr. Karl Muck, in whose artist's nature the style of the composer seems closely ingrained. He combined the precision of a Gericke with the romance of a Nikisch in performances which are cherished memories.

This retrospect is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town.

JOHN N. BURK

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

The Bachelor With Ways of His Own

Brahms as He Came and Went Among a Friendly Circle In His Prime

IN order to know Brahms as a man," says W. ter Niemann in his recently published life of the composer, "we must pay a visit to him in his home"; so, following this hopeful suggestion, we have exhibited in part the carefully reconstructed picture of Brahms at home which Herr Niemann offers us in his book. Let us now complete, so far as space permits, the German author's graphic portrayal of Brahms the man, as Vienna knew him in the last two decades of his life.

The beardless Johannes of the '60s, "a blond, lean figure of a decidedly professorial type," according to Richard Heuberger, astonished his friends at Zurich by his robust health. He was able to take a nap at any moment in the day time, in the open air as easily as in his rooms, and even at night it did not trouble him if the least if at times he was forced to camp out on the sofa in a friend's house, or even under the piano. The summer which he spent at Portschach in 1878 turned this beardless Brahms into a sturdy, mature man with luxuriant hair—which became silver with advancing years—and a voluminous beard and mustache. "With a shaven chin one is taken for an actor or a parson," he said to Widmann at Pressbaum in 1881.

Portraits of Brahms dating from the '80s show us the well known imposing fine, idealistic German artist's head; later the full beard, in contrast with the mustache—half-sandy, half-gray—took on a more and more silver hue, while a comfortable embonpoint gained upon him apace. Thus, at Leipzig in 1887 Brahms already appeared to Jenner as a "round little gentleman," and in 1894, to Clara Schumann's grandson, Ferdinand, who was still quite young, as "a short, corpulent gentleman with full beard, already gray."

In the streets of Vienna, during his later years, he was often seen trotting about in an overcoat, with "trousers that were always too short, a black alpaca jacket and bright colored shirts without any collar," according to Eugenie Schumann. He wore, or carried in his hand a stiff, round black hat or a soft, broad brimmed one, with the inevitable huge cigar in his mouth, and pince-nez on his nose (he was extremely short-sighted) taking short, brisk, light steps, always walking on his heels, breathing rather hard, his arms often crossed behind his back, while his eyes looked piercingly forward into the distance.

"Brahms was fond of strong, black Mocha coffee, which he prepared himself; and breakfast was his favorite and most important meal. He could drink this coffee at any hour of the day; indeed, he maintained that he could sleep well, no matter how heavy his supper had been, provided only that he accompanied it with a cup of very strong coffee." His recipe for this was simple—as many coffee-beans as would ordinarily make ten cupfuls.

The routine of his day was simple and regular. He rose early; during the summer holidays, often as early as five o'clock—"You have no idea what you are missing if you don't go into the woods at five in the morning," he once said to Eugenie Schumann. He then worked without stopping until midday. At half past twelve he would go for his luncheon to the "Roter Igel." He would take his coffee either there, or below in the Stadtpark, and would then go for a long walk, usually in the Prater, but often out into the country or in the Wiener Wald. He was particularly fond of the Prater as a focus of Viennese life: "Nowhere else does one enjoy the amiable and gay character of the Viennese," he said, "as in one's strolls through the Prater."

In the evening, often after a visit to a concert or opera, he would take his evening drink at his regular table in the little low-ceiled back room of the "Roter Igel"—which was, he maintained, the best and cheapest of the old inns of Vienna between Wildpretmarkt and Tuchlauben. It is sacred in the eyes of musicians because of a tradition that Beethoven had visited it. Here Brahms would meet his few but carefully chosen intimates: Hanslick, Kalbeck, Door, Pohl, Brull, Rottenberg, Nottebohm and others. If he was not to be found at the "Roter Igel," he would be sitting—at least between 1875 and 1881—at the habitués' table at Gause's Bilsener Bierhalle in the Johnannisgasse. Though Brahms had a good appetite and stood no moderate and what he ate [illegible]

Continued on Page

The Concert-Crier

Next Week

Brahms Festival—Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 23, Fourth Symphony, "Song of Destiny," Second Piano-Concerto; Monday evening, March 24, "German Requiem"; Tuesday evening, "Liebeslieder," Quintet for Piano and Strings, Intermezzi and Rhapsody for Piano (Op. 119); familiar songs; Wednesday evening, First Symphony, First Piano-Concerto, Rhapsody for Male Chorus, Alto and Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses; Burgin String Quartet; Margarete Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland, Fraser Gange, singers.

Orchestral—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (Haydn's Symphony "with the horn-call," new Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ.)

In Ensemble—London String Quartet, Branch Library, Roslindale, Sunday afternoon, Central Library, Copley Square, Sunday evening (Quartets, Op. 59, No. 3, and Op. 130, by Beethoven). Free

Eminences—Sigrid Onegin, contralto, Hotel Statler, Wednesday morning (Airs from Meyerbeer and Rossini; songs by Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Loewe. . . . Georges Enesco, violinist, Paine Hall (Harvard University), Friday evening (Concerto of Vivaldi, Concert-Piece by Saint-Saëns; Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Ravel's "Tzigane"; miscellany.)

Violinist—Baldassare Ferlazzo; Jordan Hall, Thursday evening (Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Op. 108; Saint-Saëns's "Havanaise"; miscellany).

Singers—Stanley Lichtenstein, tenor; Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon (Airs and songs from Scarlatti, Schubert, Brahms, Berlioz, Ravel, Delius). . . . Giannie Kefalas, tenor; Jordan Hall, Sunday evening, (Operatic airs; German Lieder; Greek folk-pieces.

Further On

Week, March 30-April 5—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Serge Rakhmaninoff pianist (miscellaneous pieces from Chopin and Liszt only). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, James Byars, tenor (pieces from Handel and Schubert, Negro Spirituals). . . . Tuesday evening, Paine Hall (Harvard), Harvard University Orchestra. Wallace Woodworth conductor; Dorothy Comstock, violinist, George Brown, violoncellist, assisting. Pieces from Gluck, Bach, Bruch, Dvorák). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard), Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Frances Gettys, soprano. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings. Symphony Hall, twenty-first pair of Symphony Concerts.

Week, April 6-12—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Handel and Haydn Society, Thompson Stone conductor; Mmes. Guilford, Alcock, Messrs. Althouse, Simmons, solo-singers (Verdi's Requiem, Kodály's "Psalmus Hungaricus") . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, Rafaele Martino conductor, and Betty Bird Higginson, soprano; (Fugue by Frescobaldi, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony); . . . Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale, and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square, London String Quartet (Quartets of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms), Free. . . . Monday evening, Jordan Hall, Jacob Langendoen violoncellist, Alice Armstrong Kimball, soprano (Breval's Sonata and fresh miscellany for violoncello; airs and songs) . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Dorothy George, soprano. . . . Thursday evening, Alumnae Hall (Wellesley), Albert Spalding, violinist.

Week, April 13-19—Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square; London String Quartet (Quartets of Chaikovsky, Debussy, Hindemith). Free . . . Tuesday evening, Jordan Hall; Maxim Schapiro, pianist (Schumann's Sonata in F-sharp minor; Balakirev's "Islamey"; Russian miscellany). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard); Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; twenty-second pair of Symphony Concerts.

Dance Calendar

Agnes de Mille—Symphony Hall, Friday evening, April 4—a new dancer of skill, charm and fresh inventions; Warren Leonard, her partner, variously accomplished; Frank Parker, diseur of lively humor and mocking wit. The three together provide the entertainment of an intimate review in miniature.

"Largamente"

Brahms Conducting

As Memory Summons Him—Brahms In The Eyes and The Ears of An American Student

IT was on December 12, 1891, that I first heard Brahms play the piano. It was at a Joachim Quartet Concert at the venerable Singakademie in Berlin. The famous composer had come to the Prussian capitol to attend the performance of his clarinet quintet and to play the piano part in his new trio in A minor op. 114 for piano, 'cello and clarinet. He had written both works, which were still in manuscript, for Richard Muehfeld of Meiningen, who was by far the greatest virtuoso on the clarinet I have ever heard.

On this occasion the Joachim Quartet, which was then the foremost chamber music organization in the world, broke with its traditions, which had been in force 1869, and played for the first time works not written exclusively for strings. The interest to see and hear the great man from Vienna was intense and when Brahms stepped onto the stage he was given a rousing welcome.

The great composer was by no means a piano virtuoso in the modern sense of the word, and yet he had a big technique although a faulty one. He went roughshod over difficult passages, often hitting false notes, but he had a great deal of facility and remarkable independence and strength of fingers. Two years later I heard Brahms play again and both times I gained the impression that he never would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how little time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conceptions and his attitude toward the compositions. He was utterly oblivious to the audience and was concerened only with the interpretation of the music; and his readings were all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts beautifully, proclaiming the themes in a very individual manner, with great warmth and feeling, and he lingered lovingly on certain details that particularly pleased him. I was struck by the freedom with which he played and by his precision of rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld, clarinet, and Robert Hausmann, 'cello. They had to follow him, and the hawk-like manner in which they watched him, and the way they yielded to his every mood, whim and modification of tempo and nuance bespoke the awe in which they stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms's tone was hard. He strove for orchestral effects and the Berlin critic of the Deutsche Warte who wrote "Brahms has a bear-like touch" (Brahms hat einen barenmaessigen Anschlag) was quite right. The famous composer at times completely drowned out the 'cello and the clarinet although Muehfeld had a voluminous tone of remarkable carrying power.

Notwithstanding his technical shortcomings, to which even the greatest Brahms enthusiast could not be oblivious, if he was at all discriminating, it was inspiring and uplifting to hear him in his own works, for there was a divine spark in his playing as well as in his compositions. I was twenty-three years old in 1891, when I first heard Brahms, so I was old enough to appreciate the greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms, I had no opportunity to discuss his music with him, but two years later, in 1893, with the help of Joachim I succeeded in drawing him into a musical discussion. Brahms was very touchy on certain points, as I had meanwhile ascertained, and I drew him out by brinsing up one of his hobbies for which he had been much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utterly indifferent to what the critics wrote about his compositions, but when I touched on the censure of professional pianists who called his piano pieces "unpianistic," he warmed up and made with considerable asperity the following remark which I noted down immediately afterward because I realized their great significance.

I have no patience with the pianists, who growl because of a few new technical difficulties. Shall progress stop because of a few hard nuts to crack? All my life I have been deeply interested in piano technique, and I have endeavored in my piano works to combine good musical ideas with new idioms. You will find the new technique more particularly in my Paganini variations and in my Capricci. I admit that many of the passages lie awkwardly for the hands. This new kind of technique seems inconvenient ("unbequem," was the word he used) because arms, hands and fingers are used in a new way. The new idiom requires greater strength, freedom and independence of fingers than the traditional classical piano technique. But this is no reason why my innovations should be called unpianistic. I know that there are some very mean places in the Paganini Variations, but my original intention in writing the two sets was that they should be technical exercises for practice only. It was not until later that I decided to have them published as concert pieces, and that was partly because von Buelow, Clara Schumann and Tausig advised me to do so. Musically, I consider my Handel Variations more important.

In later years, when such great virtuosi as Joseffy, Pachmann, Busoni, and Godowsky began to play the Paganini Variations and to take delight in the new kinds of pianistic difficulties, I recalled the famous composer's words and realized how wisely he had expressed himself on this point.

When I asked Brahms if he ever intended to compose a second violin concerto, he replied with great vehemence, "under no circumstances whatever." On being questioned as to his reasons, he quoted scripture, Matthew VI, 34. When I told him I could not see the application of the passage to a new violin concerto, he replied, "I said 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' because I had more than enough trouble with my first and only violin concerto. I feel too circumscribed by the tonal limitations of the four strings. I think symphonically."

It seems strange to me that Brahms should use the term "tonal limitations" instead of "technical limitations," for all the violinists were up in arms against the new kind of difficulties in the Brahms violin concerto. Even as great a critic as Otto Neitzel of Cologne had written, "The Brahms concerto is not written for it is written against the violin." I spoke of this to Brahms, whereupon he said in a very impatient manner:

I don't understand why the violinists make such a fuss over the passages in my concerto. They are worse than the pianists. Why are they not more concerned with the tonal effects? They are all so absorbed with the technique that they overlook euphony (Klang). Hardly any of them can make the passages of the first movement and finale sound well, and that is why I can't bear to hear the younger violinists play it any more. It bores me to death when some young fiddler comes and asks permission to play my concerto for me. Now you know why I shall never write another violin concerto.

Joachim, to whom Brahms had been speaking quite as much as to me, afterward said to me, "those were two intensely interesting statements by Brahms concerning his new piano and violin idioms. And for him they were unusually long ones, for he is generally very taciturn."

The great composer's last visit to Berlin was in 1896, the year before his death. Joachim, who was his most intimate friend, had invited him to hear a private performance of one of his string quartets at a small select social company. This was my last meeting with Brahms. He had aged visibly. His complexion which had formerly been ruddy had turned to a sickly yellowish brown. He had cancer of the liver, of which he died in April of the following year.

The first thing Brahms said to me on this occasion was, "You are an American, do you play the banjo?"

Astonished at such a question from him, I replied "No, I am sorry to say I do not, but why do you ask?"

"Because I met an American girl in Leipzig," he replied, "who played the banjo for me. It was the first and only time I ever heard the instrument and I was much interested in the rhythm of ragtime which she played very cleverly."

Ragtime was then all the rage in America, and Brahms seemed so interested in it that I asked him if he intended to utilize the rhythm in one of his own compositions. A far-away look came into his expressive blue eyes while he said, "I had thought of doing so but I doubt if I shall ever get to it. My ideas no longer flow as easily as they used to."

There have been in the Brahms biographies contradictory reports concerning his transposing a Beethoven Sonata half a tone higher when playing in public with Eduard Remenyi, with whom he made a tour of northern Germany in 1853. In the sketch of Brahms's life, for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were playing the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. I questioned Brahms concerning this and he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was not the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Minor Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Brahms at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and that Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the piano was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Celle, the composer said, "The piano was half a tone flat and as Remenyi had absolute pitch, he could not possibly play with it as it was, so he tuned his violin to the B flat of the piano, which was really A, and I transposed the program half a tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this historic affair seemed to me to be altogether too modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist in our day would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C sharp minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his work with Remenyi and derived some interesting information about my meeting with the great pianist at Wiesbaden.

Further conversation revealed the interesting news that Brahms was Liszt's guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Peter Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

It was during that memorable visit that Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave him for this. The story is a true one as Carl Klindworth, who was present, assured me in later years.

Brahms like Schumann was a great Bach student and on the occasion of my first meeting with him in 1891, he at first paid no attention to me whatever, although I was introduced to him by Joachim. It was not until I quoted John III, 3 to him that he really looked at me. He then finished the quotation by quoting John III, 5, which is a continuation, and then we quoted both the old and the new Testament to each other until his interest was aroused. ARTHUR M. ABELL

"Molto Marcato"

Brahms Conducting

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

101

Brahms in Full Feather: First American Festival

Sorting Out the Backgrounds—Fifty Years of Brahms from the Symphony Orchestra

THE general increase in the popularity of Brahms in the last ten years is fresh proof that a half century is none too little for a more than approximate estimate of a composer. While the "importance of Wagner, or Mendelssohn,, or Chaikovsky has varied with musical fashions, the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years. One critical moment was at the turn of the century. The smoke of the great Brahms-Wagner and Brahms-Bruckner wars having cleared away, people gazed over a battle field strewn with broken friendships, and suddenly realized that this world is large enough comfortably to hold two divergent musical styles at the same time. Then, it seemed, was the moment for critics to pronounce the last rites over Brahms as an issue, and to give him his just niche among the immortals. As it now appears, the final word was not then spoken. There has been still another accounting by time, that cool and leisurely critic.

That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms's most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. "Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer," wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1916. "To the ordinary amateur, who can enjoy his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, but it is apt to repel him."

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "repellent," "obscure," persisted for years, reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then there was the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, with whom Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"His topmost peaks are tremendously remote, and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the plains" ("Mezzo Tints in Modern Music," 1905). And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his pinnacle rather than come to our level; if we want him we must climb to him by steps that are perhaps painful and slow." R. A. Streatfield looked upon Brahms as "wrapped in obscurity," and followed this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of human sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906), "It is perhaps this very austerity, this severe self-repression, this remoteness of personality, that constitute to some minds the charm of Brahms's music. In a similar vein, others [illegible] in lonely heights, expecting him to stay there forever, with a small circle of the elect at his feet.

Such opinions as these need no other answer than the present festival, which perhaps no other Nineteenth Century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished forth on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has never greatly thrived on Mediterranean shores).

As for the "limitations" listed above, they have proved to be in large part the limitations of a tardy world. Time and custom, which solve all musical enigmas and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark places of Brahms, that the world might see, and smoothed out his arbitrary harshnesses, that the world might accept. In this way the "murky fog," which in the eighties was supposed to enshroud the symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the atmosphere was not yet clear about these four mountains, for a mist of wordy legends such as those quoted above hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient, has at last cleared the air. It is doubtful whether an audience of 1930, listening to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, is particularly aware of anything austere, harsh, or forbidding about them. One looks in vain for the chords of "pain" which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the melodious profusion of Brahms's themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word the sheer musical wealth is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today—and applauded to the echo. As for the graver moods that once repelled—they now only add a special character and impressiveness.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 finds some-ame dread implications which it has or many today toward composers correspondingly advanced). This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms's native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose thereupon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbid (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the "Courier" of the same date found the symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second program by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian publio. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

> One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms's Symphonies at con-

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

The Bachelor With Ways of His Own

Brahms as He Came and Went Among a Friendly Circle In His Prime

IN order to know Brahms as a man," says Walter Niemann in his recently published life of the composer, "we must pay a visit to him in his home"; so, following this hopeful suggestion, we have exhibited in part the carefully reconstructed picture of Brahms at home which Herr Niemann offers us in his book. Let us now complete, so far as space permits, the German author's graphic portrayal of Brahms the man, as Vienna knew him in the last two decades of his life.

The beardless Johannes of the '60s, "a blond, lean figure of a decidedly professorial type," according to Richard Heuberger, astonished his friends at Zurich by his robust health. He was able to take a nap at any moment in the day time, in the open air as easily as in his rooms, and even at night it did not trouble him in the least if at times he was forced to camp out on the sofa in a friend's house, or even under the piano. The summer which he spent at Portschach in 1878 turned this beardless Brahms into a sturdy, mature man with luxuriant hair—which became silver with advancing years—and a voluminous beard and mustache. "With a shaven chin one is taken for an actor or a parson," he said to Widmann at Pressbaum in 1881.

Portraits of Brahms dating from the appeared to Jenner as a "rotund little gentleman," and in 1894, to Clara Schumann's grandson, Ferdinand, who was still quite young, as "a short, corpulent gentleman with full beard, already gray."

In the streets of Vienna, during his later years, he was often seen trotting about in an overcoat, with "trousers that were always too short, a black alpaca jacket and bright colored shirts without any collar," according to Eugenie Schumann. He wore, or carried in his hand, a stiff, round black hat or a soft, broad-brimmed one, with the inevitable huge cigar in his mouth, and pince-nez on his nose (he was extremely short-sighted), taking short, brisk, light steps, always walking on his heels, breathing rather hard, his arms often crossed behind his back, while his eyes looked piercingly forward into the distance.

"Brahms was fond of strong, black Mocha coffee, which he prepared himself, and breakfast was his favorite and most important meal. He could drink this coffee at any hour of the day; indeed, he maintained that he could sleep well, no regular. He rose early; during the summer holidays, often as early as five o'clock—"You have no idea what you are missing if you don't go into the woods at five in the morning," he once said to Eugenie Schumann. He then worked without stopping until midday. At half past twelve he would go for his luncheon to the "Roter Igel." He would take his coffee either there, or below in the Stadtpark, and would then go for a long walk. usually in the Prater, but often out into the country or in the Wiener Wald. He was particularly fond of the Prater as a focus of Viennese life: "Nowhere else does one enjoy the amiable and gay character of the Viennese," he said, "as in one's strolls through the Prater."

In the evening, often after a visit to a concert or opera, he would take his evening drink at his regular table in the little low-ceiled back room of the "Roter Igel"—which was, he maintained, the best and cheapest of the old inns of Vienna between Wildpretmarkt and Tuchlauben. It is sacred in the eyes of musicians because of a tradition that Beethoven had visited it. Here Brahms would meet his few but carefully chosen intimates: Hanslick, Kalbeck, Door, Pohl, Brull, Rottenberg, Nottebohm and others. If he was not to be found at the "Roter Igel," he would be sitting—at least between 1875 and 1881—at the

As Memor... In The... A...

It was on December ... first heard Brahms ... It was at a Joachi... cert at the venerable ... Berlin. The famous com... to the Prussian capitol t... formance of his clarinet ... play the piano part in ... A minor op. 114 for p... clarinet. He had writt... which were still in manu... ard Muehfeld of Meining... far the greatest virtuoso... I have ever heard.

On this occasion the J... which was then the fo... music organization in t... with its traditions, whi... force 1889, and played f... works not written exclus... The interest to see and ... man from Vienna was i... Brahms stepped onto t... given a rousing welco...

The great composer w... a piano virtuoso in the ... the word, and yet he had ... although a faulty one. ... shod over difficult passa... false notes, but he had ... facility and remarkable ... strength of fingers. T... heard Brahms play agai... I gained the impressio... would have been a rea... even if he had devoted hi... to the instrument. Const... time he had for pract... playing was wonderful. ... thing sublime about his ... his attitude toward the ... was utterly oblivious to ... was concerened only wi... tion of the music; and ... all the more interesting ... discoursing his own w...

He played the canta... fully, proclaiming the ... individual manner, wi... and feeling, and he lin... certain details that pa... him. I was struck by ... which he played and b... rhythm and elasticity ... trio Brahms paid no a... to his partners, Richar... net, and Robert Hausm... had to follow him, a... manner in which they ... the way they yielded t... whim and modificatio... nuance bespoke the a... stood of the illustrious ...

In heavy chords B... hard. He strove for ... and the Berlin critic ... Warte who wrote "Br... like touch" (Brahms ... maessigen Anschlag) w... famous composer at ... drowned but the 'cell... although Muehfeld i... tone of remarkable ca...

Notwithstanding his ... comings, to which ... Brahms enthusiast cou... if he was at all disc... inspiring and upliftin... his own works, for t... spark in his playing ... compositions. I was ... old in 1891, when I f... so I was old enough ... greatness of the occas...

When I first met ... opportunity to discu... him, but two years ... the help of Joachim I ... ing him into a ... Brahms was very ... points, as I had mes... and I drew him out ... of his hobbies for ... much criticized.

Brahms seemed to ... ent to what the crit... compositions, but wh... censure of professi... called his piano piec... warmed up and mad... asperity the followin... noted down immedi... cause I realized thei...

I have no patie... ists, who growl bec... technical difficultie... stop because of a ... crack? All my ... deeply interested i... and I have endeav... works to combine ... with new idioms. ... new technique m... my Paganini vari... Capriccii. I admit...

s in Full Feather: First American Festival of His Music

he Backgrounds—Fifty Brahms from the hony Orchestra

he popu- last ten t a half tle for a ate of a tance of aikovsky ions, the a fairly rs. One rn of the Brahms- er wars zed over n friend- that this ly to hold the same moment rites over him his s. As it s not then nother ac- leisurely hms could favorites diction of hampions, hs is not, word, a kham Lee recently teur, who Schubert, n a sealed enjoy it, rsh," "re- for years, ims was there was proachable vith whom —"His top- y remote, tmosphere the plains" sic," 1905). lescends to n his pin- ur level; if to him by and slow." n Brahms d followed bservation of human his "Mod- 906), "It is this severe s of person- minds the n a similar ely heights, rever, with is feet. d no other ival, which h Century or Wagner ished forth it, however, has never ean shores). isted above, ge part the Time and cal enigmas s thrown a k places of ht see, and harshnesses, t. In this hich in the shroud the l, the atmos- t these four rdy legends hung over patient, has is doubtful 30, listening e Fourth, is ing austere, them. One is of "pain" e first move- the melodi- themes, the the splendor a word the permost in a d today--and or the graver hey now only d impressive-same dread implications which it has or many today toward composers correspondingly advanced). This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms's native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose thereupon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbid (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the "Courier" of the same date found the symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second program by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

> One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers

The Bachelor With Ways of His Own

Brahms as He Came and Went Among a Friendly Circle In His Prime

IN order to know Brahms as a man," says Walter Niemann in his recently published life of the composer, "we must pay a visit to him in his home"; so, following this hopeful suggestion, we have exhibited in part the carefully reconstructed picture of Brahms at home which Herr Niemann offers us in his book. Let us now complete, so far as space permits, the German author's graphic portrayal of Brahms the man, as Vienna knew him in the last two decades of his life.

The beardless Johannes of the '60s, "a blond, lean figure of a decidedly professorial type," according to Richard Heuberger, astonished his friends at Zurich by his robust health. He was able to take a nap at any moment in the day time, in the open air as easily as in his rooms, and even at night it did not trouble him in the least if at times he was forced to camp out on the sofa in a friend's house, or even under the piano. The summer which he spent at Portschach in 1878 turned this beardless Brahms into a sturdy, mature man with luxuriant hair—which became silver with advancing years—and a voluminous beard and mustache. "With a shaven chin one is taken appeared to Jenner as a "rotund little gentleman," and in 1894, to Clara Schumann's grandson, Ferdinand, who was still quite young, as "a short, corpulent gentleman with full beard, already gray."

In the streets of Vienna, during his later years, he was often seen trotting about in an overcoat, with "trousers that were always too short, a black alpaca jacket and bright colored shirts without any collar," according to Eugenie Schumann. He wore, or carried in his hand a stiff, round black hat or a soft, broad brimmed one, with the inevitable huge cigar in his mouth, and pince-nez on his nose (he was extremely short-sighted) taking short, brisk, light steps, always walking on his heels, breathing rather hard, his arms often crossed behind his back, while his eyes looked piercingly forward into the distance.

"Brahms was fond of strong, black Mocha coffee, which he prepared himself, and breakfast was his favorite and most regular. He rose early; during the summer holidays, often as early as five o'clock—"You have no idea what you are missing if you don't go into the woods at five in the morning," he once said to Eugenie Schumann. He then worked without stopping until midday. At half past twelve he would go for his luncheon to the "Roter Igel." He would take his coffee either there, or below in the Stadtpark, and would then go for a long walk, usually in the Prater, but often out into the country or in the Wiener Wald. He was particularly fond of the Prater as a focus of Viennese life: "Nowhere else does one enjoy the amiable and gay character of the Viennese," he said, "as in one's strolls through the Prater."

In the evening, often after a visit to a concert or opera, he would take his evening drink at his regular table in the little low-ceiled back room of the "Roter Igel"—which was, he maintained, the best and cheapest of the old inns of Vienna between Wildpretmarkt and Tuchlauben. It is sacred in the eyes of musicians because of a tradition that Beethoven had visited it. Here Brahms would meet his few but carefully chosen intimates: Hanslick, Kalbeck, Door, Pohl, Brull, Rottenberg, Nottebohm and

As Memory Summons Him—Brahms In The Eyes and The Ears of An American Student

IT was on December 12, 1891, that I first heard Brahms play the piano. It was at a Joachim Quartet Concert at the venerable Singakademie in Berlin. The famous composer had come to the Prussian capitol to attend the performance of his clarinet quintet and to play the piano part in his new trio in A minor op. 114 for piano, 'cello and clarinet. He had written both works, which were still in manuscript, for Richard Muehfeld of Meiningen, who was by far the greatest virtuoso on the clarinet I have ever heard.

On this occasion the Joachim Quartet, which was then the foremost chamber music organization in the world, broke with its traditions, which had been in force 1869, and played for the first time works not written exclusively for strings. The interest to see and hear the great man from Vienna was intense and when Brahms stepped onto the stage he was given a rousing welcome.

The great composer was by no means a piano virtuoso in the modern sense of the word, and yet he had a big technique although a faulty one. He went rough shod over difficult passages, often hitting false notes, but he had a great deal of facility and remarkable independence and strength of fingers. Two years later I heard Brahms play again and both times I gained the impression that he never would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how little time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conceptions and his attitude toward the compositions. He was utterly oblivious to the audience and was concerened only with the interpretation of the music; and his readings were all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts beautifully, proclaiming the themes in a very individual manner, with great warmth and feeling, and he lingered lovingly on certain details that particularly pleased him. I was struck by the freedom with which he played and by his precision of rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld, clarinet, and Robert Hausmann, 'cello. They had to follow him, and the hawk-like manner in which they watched him, and the way they yielded to his every mood, whim and modification of tempo and nuance bespoke the awe in which they stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms's tone was hard. He strove for orchestral effects and the Berlin critic of the Deutsche Warte who wrote "Brahms has a bear-like touch" (Brahms hat einen baeremaessigen Anschlag) was quite right. The famous composer at times completely drowned out the 'cello and the clarinet although Muehfeld had a voluminous tone of remarkable carrying power.

Notwithstanding his technical shortcomings, to which even the greatest Brahms enthusiast could not be oblivious, if he was at all discriminating, it was inspiring and uplifting to hear him in his own works, for there was a divine spark in his playing as well as in his compositions. I was twenty-three years old in 1891, when I first heard Brahms, so I was old enough to appreciate the greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms, I had no opportunity to discuss his music with him, but two years later, in 1893, with the help of Joachim I succeeded in drawing him into a musical discussion. Brahms was very touchy on certain points, as I had meanwhile ascertained, and I drew him out by bringing up one of his hobbies for which he had been much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utterly indifferent to what the critics wrote about his compositions, but when I touched on the censure of professional pianists who called his piano pieces "unpianistic," he warmed up and made with considerable asperity the following remarks, which I noted down immediately afterward because I realized their great significance:

> I have no patience with the pianists, who growl because of a few new technical difficulties. Shall progress stop because of a few hard nuts to crack? All my life I have been deeply interested in piano technique, and I have endeavored in my piano works to combine good musical ideas with new idioms. You will find the new technique more particularly in they not more concerned with the tonal effects? They are all so absorbed with the technique that they overlook euphony (Klang). Hardly any of them can make the passages of the first movement and finale sound well, and that is why I can't bear to hear the younger violinists play it any more. It bores me to death when some young fiddler comes and asks permission to play my concerto for me Now you know why I shall never write another violin concerto.

Joachim, to whom Brahms had been speaking quite as much as to me, afterward said to me, "those were two intensely interesting statements by Brahms concerning his new piano and violin idioms. And for him they were unusually long ones, for he is generally very taciturn."

The great composer's last visit to Berlin was in 1896, the year before his death. Joachim, who was his most intimate friend, had invited him to hear a private performance of one of his string quartets at a small select social company. This was my last meeting with Brahms. He had aged visibly. His complexion which had formerly been ruddy had turned to a sickly yellowish brown. He had cancer of the liver, of which he died in April of the following year.

The first thing Brahms said to me on this occasion was, "You are an American, do you play the banjo?"

Astonished at such a question from him, I replied "No, I am sorry to say I do not, but why do you ask?"

"Because I met an American girl in Leipzig," he replied, "who played the banjo for me. It was the first and only time I ever heard the instrument and I was much interested in the rhythm of ragtime which she played very cleverly."

Ragtime was then all the rage in America, and Brahms seemed so interested in it that I asked him if he intended to utilize the rhythm in one of his own compositions. A far-away look came into his expressive blue eyes while he said, "I had thought of doing so but I doubt if I shall ever get to it. My ideas no longer flow as easily as they used to."

There have been in the Brahms biographies contradictory reports concerning his transposing a Beethoven Sonata half a tone higher when playing in public with Eduard Remenyi, with whom he made a tour of northern Germany in 1853. In the sketch of Brahms's life, for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were playing the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. I questioned Brahms concerning this and he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was not the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Minor Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Brahms at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and that Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the piano was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Celle, the composer said, "The piano was half a tone flat and as Remenyi had absolute pitch, he could not possibly play with it as it was, so he tuned his violin to the B flat of the piano, which was really A, and I transposed the program half a tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this historic affair seemed to me to be altogether too modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist in our day would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C sharp minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and derived some interesting information about his meeting with the great pianist at Weimar.

Further conversation revealed the interesting news that Brahms was Liszt's guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Peter Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a but it is apt to repel him."

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "repellent," "obscure," persisted for years, reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then there was the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, with whom Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"His topmost peaks are tremendously remote, and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the plains" ("Mezzo Tints in Modern Music," 1905). And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his pinnacle rather than come to our level; if we want him we must climb to him by steps that are perhaps painful and slow." R. A. Streatfield looked upon Brahms as "wrapped in obscurity," and followed this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of human sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906), "It is perhaps this very austerity, this severe self-repression, this remoteness of personality, that constitute to some minds the charm of Brahms's music. In a similar vein, one [illegible] him on lonely heights, expecting him to stay there forever, with a small circle of the elect at his feet.

Such opinions as these need no other answer than the present festival, which perhaps no other Nineteenth Century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished forth on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has never greatly thrived on Mediterranean shores).

As for the "limitations" listed above, they have proved to be in large part the limitations of a tardy world. Time and custom, which solve all musical enigmas and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark places of Brahms, that the world might see, and smoothed out his arbitrary harshnesses, that the world might accept. In this way the "murky fog," which in the eighties was supposed to enshroud the symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the atmosphere was not yet clear about these four mountains, for a mist of wordy legends such as those quoted above hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient, has at last cleared the air. It is doubtful whether an audience of 1930, listening to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, is particularly aware of anything austere, harsh, or forbidding about them. One looks in vain for the chords of "pain" which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the melodious profusion of Brahms's themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word the sheer musical wealth is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today—and applauded to the echo. As for the graver moods that once repelled—they now only add a special character and impressiveness.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 finds something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular those passages which his contemporaries found too abrupt. The reticence and profundity of his emotional current, and the placid endings of his movements estranged him from many in his day of much romantic inflation and heroic fustian. These qualities are outblown and dated, while the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The lustre of Brahms's essential gold is more fully revealed rather than diminished by time.

George Henschel had not long taken charge of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 when the public realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful "modern"—(the word seems to have borne the giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

> One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms's Symphonies at concerts here? By no manner of means! There is not an inconsiderable portion of our public to whom the announcement of a Brahms symphony is a promise of unspeakable delight; people who look at their programs with anxious solicitude to see if there be not something by Brahms on it. Let them have their Brahms now and then, and let the rest of the public go hang, if it objects.

This "not inconsiderable portion of our public" did grow apace, and when Arthur Nikisch became the conductor in 1889, Boston was astonished to discover that the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry, were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance. This was the magician who also startled the hidebound and wary public of the Leipzig Gewandhaus into an appreciation of Brahms, the melodist, colorist and poet. Under the eloquent apostle there bloomed a flourishing faction. It became a cult, with its fringe of priggishness and other accompanying phenomena. Ere long Boston was spoken of as a Brahms center.

At the news of Brahms's death (April 3, 1897) Emil Paur, who was then conductor, arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10, the following appropriate and impressive, if decidedly sombre, program. Tragic Overture, Op. 81; Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Op. 102; Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98. Soloists were: Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

It would be interesting to know who first referred to the Brahms Symphonies as "classics," and when the remark was made. It was probably in the first years of this century. In any case, Emil Paur must have done his admirable part in giving them this label of permanence and universal respect. Boston, fortunate in its Brahms conductors had surely one of the very finest of them in Dr. Karl Muck, in whose artist's nature the style of the composer seems closely ingrained. He combined the precision of a Gericke with the romance of a Nikisch in performances which are cherished memories.

This retrospect is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town.

JOHN N. BURK

"Largamente"

Brahms Conducting

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

The Bachelor With Ways of His Own

Brahms as He Came and Went Among a Friendly Circle In His Prime

IN order to know Brahms as a man," says Walter Niemann in his recently published life of the composer, "we must pay a visit to him in his home"; so, following this hopeful suggestion, we have exhibited in part the carefully reconstructed picture of Brahms at home which Herr Niemann offers us in his book. Let us now complete, so far as space permits, the German author's graphic portrayal of Brahms the man, as Vienna knew him in the last two decades of his life.

The beardless Johannes of the '60s, "a blond, lean figure of a decidedly professorial type," according to Richard Heuberger, astonished his friends at Zurich by his robust health. He was able to take a nap at any moment in the day time, in the open air as easily as in his rooms, and even at night it did not trouble him in the least if at times he was forced to camp out on the sofa in a friend's house, or even under the piano. The summer which he spent at Portschach in 1878 turned this beardless Brahms into a sturdy, mature man with luxuriant hair—which became silver with advancing years—and a voluminous beard and mustache. "With a shaven chin one is taken for an actor or a parson," he said to Widmann at Pressbaum in 1881.

Portraits of Brahms dating from the '80s show us the well known imposing fine, idealistic German artist's head; later the full beard, in contrast with the mustache—half-sandy, half-gray—took on a more and more silver hue, while a comfortable embonpoint gained upon him. Thus, at Leipzig in 1887 Brahms already appeared to Jenner as a "rotund little gentleman," and in 1894, to Clara Schumann's grandson, Ferdinand, who was still quite young, as "a short, corpulent gentleman with full beard, already gray."

In the streets of Vienna, during his later years, he was often seen trotting about in an overcoat, with "trousers that were always too short, a black alpeca jacket and bright colored shirts without any collar," according to Eugenie Schumann. He wore, or carried in his hand, a stiff, round black hat or a soft, broad-brimmed one, with the inevitable hug cigar in his mouth, and pince-nez on his nose (he was extremely short-sighted), taking short, brisk, light steps, always walking on his heels, breathing rather hard, his arms often crossed behind his back, while his eyes looked piercingly forward into the distance.

"Brahms was fond of strong, black Mocha coffee, which he prepared himself, and breakfast was his favorite and most important meal. He could drink this coffee at any hour of the day; indeed, he maintained that he could sleep well, no matter how heavy his supper had been, provided only that he accompanied it with a cup of very strong coffee." His recipe for this was simple—as many coffee-beans as would ordinarily make ten cupfuls.

The routine of his day was simple and regular. He rose early; during the summer holidays, often as early as five o'clock—"You have no idea what you are missing if you don't go into the woods at five in the morning," he once said to Eugenie Schumann. He then worked without stopping until midday. At half past twelve he would go for his luncheon to the "Roter Igel." He would take his coffee either there, or below in the Stadtpark, and would then go for a long walk, usually in the Prater, but often out into the country or in the Wiener Wald. He was particularly fond of the Prater as a focus of Viennese life: "Nowhere else does one enjoy the amiable and gay character of the Viennese," he said, "as in one's strolls through the Prater."

In the evening, often after a visit to a concert or opera, he would take his evening drink at his regular table in the little low-ceiled back room of the "Roter Igel"—which was, he maintained, the best and cheapest of the old inns of Vienna between Wildpretmarkt and Tuchlauben. It is sacred in the eyes of musicians because of a tradition that Beethoven had visited it. Here Brahms would meet his few but carefully chosen intimates: Hanslick, Kalbeck, Door, Pohl, Brull, Rottenberg, Nottebohm and others. If he was not to be found at the "Roter Igel," he would be sitting—at least between 1875 and 1881—at the habitués' table at Gause's Wiesener Bierhalle in the Johannisgasse. Though Brahms had a good appetite and stood his drink well, he was moderate and frugal both in what he ate and what he

Continued on Page Six

The Concert-Crier

Next Week

Brahms Festival—Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 23, Fourth Symphony, "Song of Destiny," Second Piano-Concerto; Monday evening, March 24, "German Requiem"; Tuesday evening, "Liebeslieder," Quintet for Piano and Strings, Intermezzi and Rhapsody for Piano (Op. 119); familiar songs; Wednesday evening, First Symphony, First Piano-Concerto, Rhapsody for Male Chorus, Alto and Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses; Burgin String Quartet; Margarete Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland, Fraser Gange, singers.

Orchestral—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (Haydn's Symphony "with the horn-call," new Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ.)

In Ensemble—London String Quartet; Branch Library, Roslindale, Sunday afternoon, Central Library, Copley Square, Sunday evening (Quartets, Op. 59, No. 2 and Op. 130, by Beethoven). Free

Eminences—Sigrid Onegin, contralto Hotel Statler, Wednesday morning (Airs from Meyerbeer and Rossini; songs of Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Loewe. . . . Georges Enesco, violinist, Paine Hall (Harvard University), Friday evening (Concerto of Vivaldi, Concert-Piece by Saint-Saëns; Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Ravel's "Tzigane"; miscellany.)

Violinist—Baldassare Ferlazzo; Jordan Hall, Thursday evening (Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Op. 108; Saint-Saëns's "Havanaise"; miscellany).

Singers—Stanley Lichtenstein, tenor; Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon (Airs and songs from Scarlatti, Schubert, Brahms, Berlioz, Ravel, Delius). . . . Tiante Kefalas, tenor; Jordan Hall, Sunday evening. (Operatic airs; German lider; Greek folk-pieces.

Further On

Week, March 30-April 5—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Serge Rakhmaninov pianist (miscellaneous pieces from Chopin and Liszt only). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, James Byars, tenor (pieces from Handel and Schubert, Negro Spirituals). . . . Tuesday evening, Paine Hall (Harvard), Harvard University Orchestra, Wallace Woodworth conductor; Dorothy Comstock, violinist, George Brown, violoncellist, assisting, Pieces from Gluck, Bach Bruch, Dvorák). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard), Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Frances Gettys, soprano. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall, twenty-first pair of Symphony Concerts.

Week, April 6-12—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Handel and Haydn Society, Thompson Stone conductor; Mmes. Guilford, Alcock, Messrs. Althouse, Simmons, solo-singers (Verdi's Requiem, Kodály's "Psalmus Hungaricus") . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, Raffaele Martino conductor, and Betty Bird Higginson, soprano; (Fugue by Frescobaldi, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony); . . . Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale, and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square, London String Quartet (Quartets of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms), Free. . . . Monday evening, Jordan Hall, Jacobus Langendoen, violoncellist, Alice Armstrong Kimball,, soprano (Breval's Sonata and fresh miscellany for violoncello; airs and songs) . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Dorothy George, soprano. . . . Thursday evening, Alumnae Hall (Wellesley), Albert Spalding, violinist.

Week, April 13-19—Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square; London String Quartet (Quartets of Chalkovsky, Debussy, Hindemith). Free . . . Tuesday evening, Jordan Hall; Maxim Schapiro, pianist (Schumann's Sonata in F-sharp minor; Balakirev's "Islamey"; Russian miscellany). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard); Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; twenty-second pair of Symphony Concerts.

Dance Calendar

Agnes de Mille—Symphony Hall, Friday evening, April 4—a new dancer of skill, charm and fresh inventions; Warren Leonard, her partner, variously accomplished; Frank Parker, diseur of lively humor and mocking wit. The three together provide the entertainment of an intimate review in miniature.

to the instrument. Consider[ing] time he had for practice, h[is] playing was wonderful. There thing sublime about his conc[ep]t his attitude toward the compo[sition] was utterly oblivious to the a[udience] was concerened only with the tion of the music; and his rea[ding] all the more interesting beca[use] discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile p[arts] fully, proclaiming the themes individual manner, with gre[at] and feeling, and he lingered certain details that particula[rly] him. I was struck by the fi[ne] which he played and by his rhythm and elasticity of tem[po] trio Brahms paid no attentio[n] to his partners, Richard Mue[ller] net, and Robert Hausmann, had to follow him, and th[eir] manner in which they watch[ed] the way they yielded to his whim and modification of nuance bespoke the awe in stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms hard. He strove for orches and the Berlin critic of th[e] Warte who wrote "Brahms like touch" (Brahms hat ein maessigen Anschlag) was quit[e] famous composer at times drowned but the 'cello and although Muehfeld had a tone of remarkable carrying Notwithstanding his tech comings, to which even Brahms enthusiast could not If he was at all discrimina[ting] inspiring and uplifting to his own works, for there w[as] spark in his playing as we compositions. I was twenty old in 1891, when I first he[ard] so I was old enough to ap[pre]greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms opportunity to discuss his him, but two years later, i[n] the help of Joachim I succee[ded] ing him into a musical Brahms was very touchy points, as I had meanwhile and I drew him out by brin[ging] of his hobbies for which l[ater] much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utt[erly] ent to what the critics wro[te] compositions, but when I to[ld] censure of professional p[ianists] called his piano pieces "unm[usical] warmed up and made with asperity the following rema[rk] noted down immediately a[fter] cause I realized their great

I have no patience with ists, who growl because of technical difficulties. Sha stop because of a few ha crack? All my life I deeply interested in piano and I have endeavored in works to combine good m[usic] with new idioms. You w[ill] new technique more part my Paganini variations a Capriccii. I admit that m passages lie awkwardly hands. This new kind of seems inconvenient ("u was the word he used) be[cause] hands and fingers are use way. The new idiom requi strength, freedom and in of fingers than the traditi[onal] ical piano technique. But reason why my innovation called unpianistic. I know are some very mean pla Paganini Variations, but n intention in writing the tw that they should be tech cises for practice only. until later that I decide them published as concert that was partly because v Clara Schumann and Tau me to do so. Musically, my Handel Variations portant.

In later years, when virtuosi as Joseffy, Pachm and Godowsky began to Paganini Variations and to in the new kinds of pianist I recalled the famous com and realized how wisely he h himself on this point.

When I asked Brahms i tended to compose a secon certo, he replied with grea "under no circumstances w being questioned as to his quoted scripture, Matthew V I told him I could not see tion of the passage to a ne certo, he replied, "I said 'si the day is the evil there had more than enough trou first and only violin concert circumscribed by the tona of the four strings. I phonically."

It seems strange to me should use the term "tona instead of "technical limita the violinists were up in the new kind of difficulties i violin concerto. Even as as Otto Neitzel of Cologne "The Brahms concerto is for it is written against th spoke of this to Brahms he said in a very impatien

I don't understand why ists make such a fuss passages in my concerto. worse than the pianists.

harsh," "red for years, ahms was there was pproachable with whom —"His topsly remote, atmosphere the plains" sic," 1905).
descends to on his pin-ur level; if to him by and slow."
on Brahms nd followed observation of human his "Mod-906), "It is his severe of person-minds the a similar ly heights, rever, with s feet.
no other val, which Century
r Wagner hed forth
, however, as never n shores).
ed above,
part the Time and l enigmas thrown a places of see, and rshnesses.
In this in the roud the he atmos-hese four legends ung over

ient, has doubtful listening ourth, is austere,
n. One
"pain"
st move-melodi-nes, the splendor vord the ost in a ay—and graver ow only pressive-

some-ess of se pas-und too dity of id end-
d him mantic
e qual-ile the lustre e fully ed by taken Boston

en the escape hannes prom-as not ns, but
"mod-ne the giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 28. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

> One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms's Symphonies at concerts here? By no manner of means! There is not an inconsiderable portion of our public to whom the announcement of a Brahms symphony is a promise of unspeakable delight; people who look at their programs with anxious solicitude to see if there be not something by Brahms on it. Let them have their Brahms now and then, and let the rest of the public go hang, if it objects.

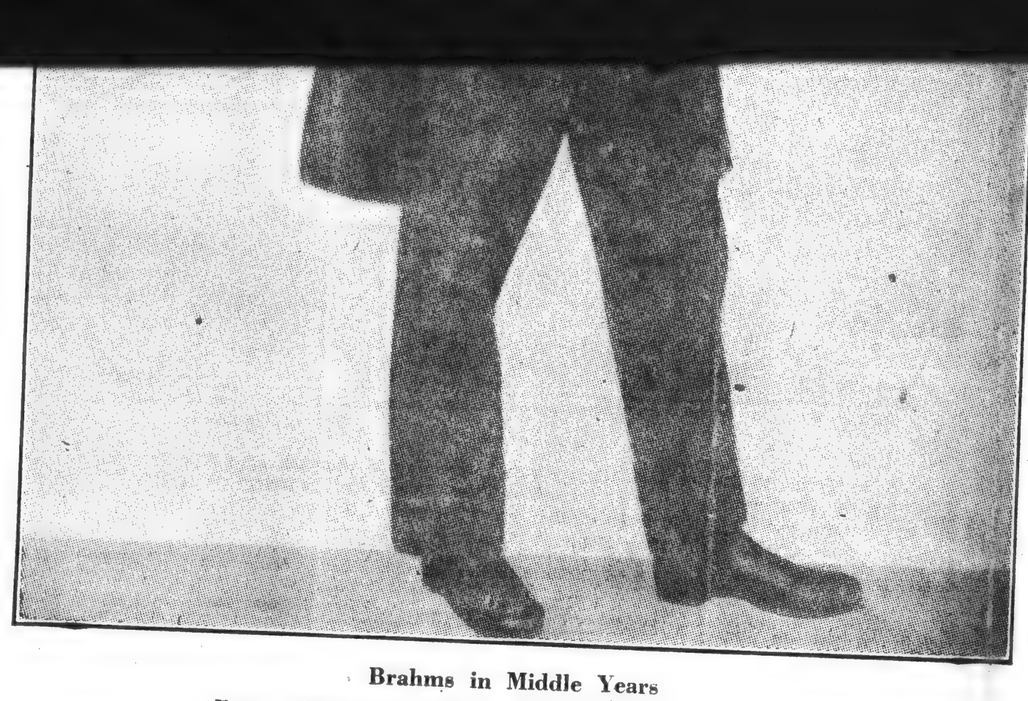
This "not inconsiderable portion of our public" did grow apace, and when Arthur Nikisch became the conductor in 1889, Boston was astonished to discover that the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry, were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance. This was the magician who also startled the hidebound and wary public of the Leipzig Gewandhaus into an appreciation of Brahms, the melodist, colorist and poet. Under the eloquent apostle there bloomed a flourishing faction. It became a cult, with its fringe of priggishness and other accompanying phenomena. Ere long Boston was spoken of as a Brahms center.

At the news of Brahms's death (April 3, 1897) Emil Paur, who was then conductor, arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10, the following appropriate and impressive, if decidedly sombre, program. Tragic Overture, Op. 81; Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Op. 102; Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98. Soloists were: Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

It would be interesting to know who first referred to the Brahms Symphonies as "classics," and when the remark was made. It was probably in the first years of this century. In any case, Emil Paur must have done his admirable part in giving them this label of permanence and universal respect. Boston, fortunate in its Brahms conductors had surely one of the very finest of them in Dr. Karl Muck, in whose artist's nature the style of the composer seems closely ingrained. He combined the precision of a Gericke with the romance of a Nikisch in performances which are cherished memories.

This retrospect is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town.

JOHN N. BURK



Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

The Bachelor With Ways of His Own

Brahms as He Came and Went Among a Friendly Circle In His Prime

IN order to know Brahms as a man," says Walter Niemann in his recently published life of the composer, "we must pay a visit to him in his home"; so, following this hopeful suggestion, we have exhibited in part the carefully reconstructed picture of Brahms at home which Herr Niemann offers us in his book. Let us now complete, so far as space permits, the German author's graphic portrayal of Brahms the man, as Vienna knew him in the last two decades of his life.

The beardless Johannes of the '60s, "a blond, lean figure of a decidedly professorial type," according to Richard Heuberger, astonished his friends at Zurich by his robust health. He was able to take a nap at any moment in the day time, in the open air as easily as in his rooms, and even at night it did not trouble him in the least if at times he was forced to camp out on the sofa in a friend's house, or even under the piano. The summer which he spent at Portschach in 1878 turned this beardless Brahms into a sturdy, mature man with luxuriant hair—which became silver with advancing years—and a voluminous beard and mustache. "With a shaven chin one is taken for an actor or a parson," he said to Widmann at Pressbaum in 1881.

Portraits of Brahms dating from the '80s show us the well known imposing fine, idealistic German artist's head; later the full beard, in contrast with the mustache—half-sandy, half-gray—took on a more and more silver hue, while a comfortable embonpoint gained upon him. Thus, at Leipzig in 1887 Brahms already appeared to Jenner as a "rotund little gentleman," and in 1894, to Clara Schumann's grandson, Ferdinand, who was still quite young, as "a short, corpulent gentleman with full beard, already gray."

In the streets of Vienna, during his later years, he was often seen trotting about in an overcoat, with "trousers that were always too short, a black alpaca jacket and bright colored shirts without any collar," according to Eugenie Schumann. He wore, or carried in his hand, a stiff, round black hat or a soft, broad-brimmed one, with the inevitable huge cigar in his mouth, and pince-nez on his nose (he was extremely short-sighted) taking short, brisk, light steps, always walking on his heels, breathing rather hard, his arms often crossed behind his back, while his eyes looked piercingly forward into the distance.

"Brahms was fond of strong, black Mocha coffee, which he prepared himself and breakfast was his favorite and most important meal. He could drink this coffee at any hour of the day; indeed, he maintained that he could sleep well, no matter how heavy his supper had been, provided only that he accompanied it with a cup of very strong coffee." His recipe for this was simple—as many coffee-beans as would ordinarily make ten cupfuls.

The routine of his day was simple and regular. He rose early; during the summer holidays, often as early as five o'clock—"You have no idea what you are missing if you don't go into the woods at five in the morning," he once said to Eugenie Schumann. He then worked without stopping until midday. At half past twelve he would go for his luncheon to the "Roter Igel." He would take his coffee either there, or below in the Stadtpark, and would then go for a long walk, usually in the Prater, but often out into the country or in the Wiener Wald. He was particularly fond of the Prater as a focus of Viennese life: "Nowhere else does one enjoy the amiable and gay character of the Viennese," he said, "as in one's strolls through the Prater."

In the evening, often after a visit to a concert or opera, he would take his evening drink at his regular table in the little low-ceiled back room of the "Roter Igel"—which was, he maintained, the best and cheapest of the old inns of Vienna between Wildpretmarkt and Tuchlauben. It is sacred in the eyes of musicians because of a tradition that Beethoven had visited it. Here Brahms would meet his few but carefully chosen intimates: Hanslick, Kalbeck, Door, Pohl, Brull, Rottenberg, Nottebohm and others. If he was not to be found at the "Roter Igel," he would be sitting—at least between 1875 and 1881—at the habitués' table at Gause's Prüsener Bierhalle in the Johnannisgasse. Though Brahms had a good appetite and stood his drink well, he was moderate and frugal both in what he ate and what he

Continued on Page Six

The Concert-Crier

Next Week

Brahms Festival—Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 23. Fourth Symphony, "Song of Destiny," Second Piano-Concerto; Monday evening, March 24, "German Requiem"; Tuesday evening, "Liebeslieder," Quintet for Piano and Strings, Intermezzi and Rhapsody for Piano (Op. 119); familiar songs; Wednesday evening, First Symphony, First Piano-Concerto, Rhapsody for Male Chorus, Alto and Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Artur Schnabel, pianist; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses; Burgin String Quartet; Margarete Matzenauer, Jeannette Vreeland, Fraser Gange, singers.

Orchestral—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (Haydn's Symphony "with the horn-call," new Suite for Orchestra by Walter Piston, Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ.)

In Ensemble—London String Quartet; Branch Library, Roslindale, Sunday afternoon, Central Library, Copley Square, Sunday evening (Quartets, Op. 59, No. 2 and Op. 130, by Beethoven). Free

Eminences—Sigrid Onegin, contralto Hotel Statler, Wednesday morning (Airs from Meyerbeer and Rossini; songs of Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Loewe. . . . Georges Enesco, violinist, Paine Hall (Harvard University), Friday evening (Concerto of Vivaldi, Concert-Piece by Saint-Saëns; Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Ravel's "Tzigane"; miscellany.)

Violinist—Baldassare Ferlazzo; Jordan Hall, Thursday evening (Brahms's Sonata in D minor, Op. 108; Saint-Saëns's "Havanaise"; miscellany).

Singers—Stanley Lichtenstein, tenor; Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon (Airs and songs from Scarlatti, Schubert, Brahms, Berlioz, Ravel, Delius). . . . Tiante Kefalas, tenor; Jordan Hall, Sunday evening. (Operatic airs; German lider; Greek folk-pieces.

Further On

Week, March 30-April 5—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Serge Rakhmaninoff, pianist (miscellaneous pieces from Chopin and Liszt only). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, James Byars, tenor (pieces from Handel and Schubert, Negro Spirituals). . . . Tuesday evening, Paine Hall (Harvard), Harvard University Orchestra, Wallace Woodworth conductor; Dorothy Comstock, violinist, George Brown, violoncellist, assisting. Pieces from Gluck, Bach Bauch, Dvorák). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard), Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Frances Gettys, soprano. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall, twenty-first pair of Symphony Concerts.

Week, April 6-12—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Handel and Haydn Society, Thompson Stone conductor; Mmes. Guilford, Alcock, Messrs. Althouse, Simmons, solo-singers (Verdi's Requiem, Kodály's "Psalmus Hungaricus"). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall, Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, Rafaele Martino conductor, and Betty Bird Higginson, soprano; (Fugue by Frescobaldi, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony); . . . Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale, and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square, London String Quartet (Quartets of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms), Free. . . . Monday evening, Jordan Hall, Jacobus Langenegger violoncellist; Alice Armstrong Kimball, soprano (Breval's Sonata and fresh miscellany for violoncello; airs and songs) . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall, Dorothy Gegay evening, prano. . . . Thursday evening, Aeolian Hall (Wellesley), Albert Spalding, violinist.

Week, April 13-19—Sunday afternoon, Branch Library, Roslindale and Sunday evening, Central Library, Copley Square; London String Quartet (Quartets of Chaikovsky, Debussy, Hindemith). Free . . . Tuesday evening, Jordan Hall; Maxim Schapiro, pianist (Schumann's Sonata in F-sharp minor; Balakirev's "Islamey"; Russian miscellany). . . . Thursday evening, Sanders Theater (Harvard); Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; twenty-second pair of Symphony Concerts.

Dance Calendar

Agnes de Mille—Symphony Hall, Friday evening, April 4—a new dancer of skill, charm and fresh inventions; Warren Leonard, her partner, variously accomplished; Frank Parker, diseur of lively humor and mocking wit. The three together provide the entertainment of an intimate review in miniature.

gained the impression that he never would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how little time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conceptions and his attitude toward the compositions. He was utterly oblivious to the audience and was concerened only with the interpretation of the music; and his readings were all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts beautifully, proclaiming the themes in a very individual manner, with great warmth and feeling, and he lingered lovingly on certain details that particularly pleased him. I was struck by the freedom with which he played and by his precision of rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld, clarinet, and Robert Hausmann, 'cello. They had to follow him, and the hawk-like manner in which they watched him, and the way they yielded to his every mood, whim and modification of tempo and nuance bespoke the awe in which they stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms's tone was hard. He strove for orchestral effects and the Berlin critic of the Deutsche Warte who wrote "Brahms has a bear-like touch" (Brahms hat einen baerenmaessigen Anschlag) was quite right. The famous composer at times completely drowned out the 'cello and the clarinet although Muehfeld had a voluminous tone of remarkable carrying power.

Notwithstanding his technical shortcomings, to which even the greatest Brahms enthusiast could not be oblivious, if he was at all discriminating, it was inspiring and uplifting to hear him in his own works, for there was a divine spark in his playing as well as in his compositions. I was twenty-three years old in 1891, when I first heard Brahms, so I was old enough to appreciate the greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms, I had no opportunity to discuss his music with him, but two years later, in 1893, with the help of Joachim I succeeded in drawing him into a musical discussion. Brahms was very touchy on certain points, as I had meanwhile ascertained, and I drew him out by bringing up one of his hobbies for which he had been much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utterly indifferent to what the critics wrote about his compositions, but when I touched on the censure of professional pianists who called his piano pieces "unpianistic," he warmed up and made with considerable asperity the following remarks, which I noted down immediately afterward because I realized their great significance:

> I have no patience with the pianists, who growl because of a few new technical difficulties. Shall progress stop because of a few hard nuts to crack? All my life I have been deeply interested in piano technique, and I have endeavored in my piano works to combine good musical ideas with new idioms. You will find the new technique more particularly in my Paganini variations and in my Capriccii. I admit that many of the passages lie awkwardly for the hands. This new kind of technique seems inconvenient ("unbequem," was the word he used) because arms, hands and fingers are used in a new way. The new idiom requires greater strength, freedom and independence of fingers than the traditional classical piano technique. But this is no reason why my innovations should be called unpianistic. I know that there are some very mean places in the Paganini Variations, but my original intention in writing the two sets was that they should be technical exercises for practice only. It was not until later that I decided to have them published as concert pieces, and that was partly because von Buelow, Clara Schumann and Tausig advised me to do so. Musically, I consider my Handel Variations more important.

In later years, when such great virtuosi as Joseffy, Pachmann, Busoni, and Godowsky began to play the Paganini Variations and to take delight in the new kinds of pianistic difficulties, I recalled the famous composer's words and realized how wisely he had expressed himself on this point.

When I asked Brahms if he ever intended to compose a second violin concerto, he replied with great vehemence, "under no circumstances whatever." On being questioned as to his reasons, he quoted scripture, Matthew VI, 34. When I told him I could not see the application of the passage to a new violin concerto, he replied, "I said 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' because I had more than enough trouble with my first and only violin concerto. I feel too circumscribed by the tonal limitations of the four strings. I think symphonically."

It seems strange to me that Brahms should use the term "tonal limitations" instead of "technical limitations," for all the violinists were up in arms against the new kind of difficulties in the Brahms violin concerto. Even as great a critic as Otto Neitzel of Cologne had written, "The Brahms concerto is not written for it is written against the violin." I spoke of this to Brahms, whereupon he said in a very impatient manner:

> I don't understand why the violinists make such a fuss over the passages in my concerto. They are worse than the pianists. Why are

He had cancer of the liver, of which he died in April of the following year.

The first thing Brahms said to me on this occasion was, "You are an American, do you play the banjo?"

Astonished at such a question from him, I replied "No, I am sorry to say I do not, but why do you ask?"

"Because I met an American girl in Leipzig," he replied, "who played the banjo for me. It was the first and only time I ever heard the instrument and I was much interested in the rhythm of ragtime which she played very cleverly."

Ragtime was then all the rage in America, and Brahms seemed so interested in it that I asked him if he intended to utilize the rhythm in one of his own compositions. A far-away look came into his expressive blue eyes while he said, "I had thought of doing so but I doubt if I shall ever get to it. My ideas no longer flow as easily as they used to."

There have been in the Brahms biographies contradictory reports concerning his transposing a Beethoven Sonata half a tone higher when playing in public with Eduard Remenyi, with whom he made a tour of northern Germany in 1853. In the sketch of Brahms's life, for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were playing the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. I questioned Brahms concerning this and he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was not the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Minor Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Brahms at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and that Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the piano was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Celle, the composer said, "The piano was half a tone flat and as Remenyi had absolute pitch, he could not possibly play with it as it was, so he tuned his violin to the B flat of the piano, which was really A, and I transposed the program half a tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this historic affair seemed to me to be altogether too modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist in our day would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C sharp minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and derived some interesting information about his meeting with the great pianist at Weimar.

Further conversation revealed the interesting news that Brahms was Liszt's guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Peter Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

In speaking of that memorable visit Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave him for that. The story is a true one as Carl Klindworth, who was present, assured me in later years.

Brahms like Schumann was a great Bible student and on the occasion of my first meeting with him in 1891, he at first paid no attention to me whatever, although I was introduced to him by Joachim. It was not until I quoted John III, 3, to him that he really looked at me. He then finished the quotation by quoting John III, 5, which is a continuation, and then we quoted both the old and the new Testament to each other until his interest was aroused.

ARTHUR M. ABELL

"Molto Marcato"

Brahms Conducting

THE BRAHMS FESTIVAL

In villages of Western Massachusetts and no doubt in villages throughout New England in the Sixties and for some years later where there was a monthly Communion service in the Congregational churches on a Sunday, there was a "preparatory lecture" on the preceding Friday afternoon. The bell in the Old Church at Northampton, for example, would summon the faithful.

Many who are looking forward to the Brahms Festival to be held with pomp and ceremony in Symphony Hall will not be contented with the biographical sketches of Johannes in the music encyclopedias and will wish to know more about him as a man, rather than to be able to talk knowingly about the history of the works then to be performed. Kalbeck's huge biography is forbidding even to those willing to wade in its verbal torrent. Florence May, a pupil of Brahms, has little to say about the man himself. She vies with Kalbeck in indiscriminate flaming eulogy.

"Brahms" by Walter Niemann has been translated into English by Catherine Alison Phillips. Published by Alfred A. Knopf of New York, it is as readable as it is informing and sanely critical. The first part deals with Brahms's life. The second with his works. There is a bibliography of the principal German and English books concerning Brahms. There is a catalogue of his compositions arranged in order of opus number with names of publishers, year of composition and year of publication; also a list of Brhams's arrangements of his own works. An index of names is followed by an index of references to the works in the text.

The leading events in the artistic life of Brahms are more or less familiar to the Brahmsites in Boston. But what was his boyhood? What were his personal habits?

His father was an amiable, humorous man of the lower middle class, of limited intellect, a capable double-bass player, having a knowledge of the horn and the violoncello, who began by playing in the lowest taverns for sailors at Hamburg, and finally held a position as double-bass at the Stadt Theatre and in the Philharmonic orchestra. Once when a conductor told him to play a little louder, he answered: "Herr Kapellmeister, this is my double-bass; so I can play on it as loud as I like."

The mother was upright, of no education, with more mother-wit than her husband, a good housekeeper, a clever needlewoman. There were three children. The parents lived apart in later years. Young Johannes was a stocky, tough, healthy boy. He studied faithfully what the schools had to offer, he even learned a little French. The Bible made a deep impression on him. It was during the early years that his "Austerely North German and Protestant view of life and art were firmly laid together with his deep-rooted love for the true Protestant chorale and Protestant church music." He had a long hard struggle to obtain a good education. What he acquired later in life was due to his own efforts and self-discipline.

When he was 15 he had finished his musical studies with his father and could play the violin, violoncello and horn well enough to act as a stop-gap when necessary. His father made him play his first attempt at a composition to friends, but the father found composition of secondary importance; there was no money to be earned by it. Johannes told Widman that he was always composing. "My finest songs would come to me early in the morning when I was cleaning the boots," that he composed only in great secrecy and in the earliest hours. "All day long I was arranging marches for brass bands, and at night I would be seated at the piano in taverns." The father obliged him to help him earn money. He would play second violin in private orchestras and at dances. Late one night there was a knock at the door. Johannes was dragged from bed to play at a ball for two thalers and drink unlimited. He would take walks with a young piano teacher; "as a rule he did not speak a word, but walked along humming to himself, usually carrying his hat in his hand, as he loved to do throughout his whole life." He bid fair to end his days as a ball-room player "in the same narrow, middle-class surroundings, both material and artistic, as his parents." To them and to many talented musicians of Germany art was a business, a practical matter, a means of earning money to ensure good living.

But the father was quick to realize that his Johannes had more than ordinary talent, and impelled by the pressure of other musicians he did what he could to develop the boy musically. So he entrusted the 7-year-old to a pianist, Cossel, who was bound to make him a pianist. "It's a pity," he once said. "He might be such a good pianist, but he will not leave this everlasting composition alone." The boy studied Czerny, Clementi, Cramer, Kalkbrenner, Hummel, but Cossel now and then let him try his hand at a piece by J. S. Bach. He wisely protected him from being exploited as a child prodigy. When he was 10 he played at a subscription concert where an agent heard him and wanted the boy with his father to make a concert tour in America. The parents were tempted, but Cossel put his foot down, for which Johannes was grateful all his life.

Johannes during childhood and adolescence had a deep love of nature as "the fount of all sound human and artistic endeavor"; and he had an overmastering bent towards knowledge and culture. There were times when he could not be torn from the harbor. He read "Robinson Crusoe," but while the harbor drove his brother Fritz westward across the ocean, Johannes was drawn more towards the south. He was proud of the city's history: he became acquainted with the writings of Mattheson and C. P. E. Bach; with the plays of Lessing; he haunted the shops of second-hand book dealers. Thus he laid the foundations of wide reading in music, literature and art, betraying what a passionate collector he was to become—"at that time quite a rare thing for a German musician." Books were his favorite presents to his friends of both sexes.

When Johannes was 10 years old Edward Marxen, an excellent man, admirable musician, a man of erudition, a composer in the greater forms, became his teacher. Marxen was pleased with the boy's acuteness of mind. Though the first compositions were insignificant Marxen saw that an exceptional, great, profound talent was dormant in his pupil. "I therefore shrank from no effort or work in order to awaken and form it, that I might one day rear a priest of art, who should preach in new accents what was sublime, true, and externally incorruptible in art, and that by acts as well as words." This idealistic attitude toward life and art had a great influence on Brahms. It won him over to the "moral in music, and the classical in art." He was initiated into Bach, Beethoven, Weber, though that was a Philistine period in Hamburg of uninspired virtuosity. But Marxen thought more of form than color, more of the contrapuntal and polyphonic than of the homophonic. Thus it was he who gave Brahms the firm foundations of this conception of art, though his own outlook on life was "quite as gentle, sentimental and sleek as that of any Philistine of his day."

Even while he was studying with Marxen, Brahms was anxious about earning a livelihood. He had given lessons, he said in after life, ever since he was 12 years old. Naturally his own pupils gave him little pleasure. He acted as conductor of a male voice chorus; gave his first concert arranged by himself when he was 14, including his own variations on a folk-theme in the program. At his first concerts he followed the taste of the period which "tended toward superficial 'tunyness,' sentimental gush, 'pluies de perles' and the fireworks of virtuosi, and so he rarely gave concerts of his own; he taught the piano for a mark a lesson, played at dances, played entr'actes behind the scenes at the Stadt Theatre, accompanied virtuosi on the platform; made transcriptions and arrangements—signed "G. W. Marks"—for publishers, signing his own free compositions "Karl Wuerth." He composed some 150 fantasias on waltz airs and some serious works.

When Brahms was 50 years old, he said to Gustave Jenner, "Few can have had so hard a time as I."

In 1849 some political refugees from Hungary appeared in Hamburg. Among them was Eduard Remenyi, the violinist, who long afterwards gave concerts in the United States and died in San Francisco in 1898. He said on his arrival in Hamburg that he was then on his way to America, but giving a "farewell" concert he met with so great pecuniary success by his playing of national dances that he decided to remain. Brahms was so dazzled by Remenyi's brilliant playing, his wandering, gypsy-like romantic life, that he offered to be his accompanist. Remenyi engaged him for a short concert tour, intending to take him to Joachim. There was the meeting that led to the friendship and artistic bond that lasted through life. The meeting was at Joachim's house in Hanover.

Remenyi was of importance to Brahms as a composer by directing his attention to Hungarian folk music, which led to the composition of the Hungarian dances for piano; for the finales of many of his chamber works; an influence that is seen in the finale of the second piano concerto.

The brilliant, erratic Remenyi, who would now play like a god even in his later years, sometimes like a pig, to use his own words when he once talked with us at the lodgings of an Austrian at Albany, N. Y., accused Brahms of making free with Remenyi's own compositions, unpublished, rhapsodies for concert use. He was a singular, fascinating man, this Hungarian virtuoso, entertaining in conversation by his reminiscences, his original views on life and art his sudden changes from devotion—he had his superstitions—to scepticism, his wit not free from malice. When we knew him he reminded one of a snuff-taking French abbe of the 18th century as described in books of anecdotes and gossip. He would grow enthusiastic over the classic works for the violin; and show the same enthusiasm for his own "Hymn to Mount Shasta." Edward MacDowell once said that there was the suggestion of a rope-dancer in every great virtuoso; this was true of Remenyi—whose name was Hoffmann—but when he was wholly in the vein he played like an inspired musician reverencing his art, as well as a brilliant virtuoso.

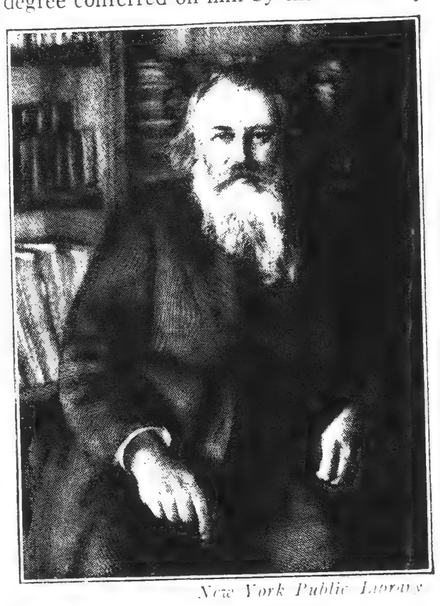
Behold our Johannes fairly launched on his career. Next Sunday let us consider him as a human being in Vienna.

MUSIC

Time March 31/30

Brahms for Brahmins

Boston last week had six days of music by great Johannes Brahms. The first program began rather pompously with the Academic Festival Overture, a symphonic composite of German student songs written by Brahms as a thank-you for the Ph. D. degree conferred on him by the University



New York Public Library

JOHANNES BRAHMS

In his case, no longer "This Way Out."

of Breslau. There followed, during the Festival's course, the four symphonies—the impassioned First, the pastoral Second, the heroic Third, the peaceful, elegiac Fourth; then the Variations on a theme by Haydn—cold, sparkling music for Brahms to have written; then the two piano concertos, Song of Destiny and A German Requiem; then more piano pieces, songs, the piano quintet with its conflicting themes and moods; and the Alto Rhapsody, sombrely inspired by Goethe's Harzreise im Winter. Soloists were Pianist Arthur Schnabel, famed in Europe as a Brahms interpreter and come especially for the Festival; Soprano Jeannette Vreeland, Contralto Margaret Matzenauer, Baritone Fraser Gange; members of Richard Burgin's String Quartet (Burgin is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony), and members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Head man of all was Conductor Serge Koussevitzky who conceived and planned the Festival, gave it the flair which raises all his performances far above the commonplace.

The Composer. Not always would Boston have deemed the music of Brahms worthy of festival performance by its celebrated symphony orchestra. Just as Boston's Brahmins have always been conservative in their choice of acquaintances, so (until the arrival of Conductor Koussevitzky six years ago) have Bostonians been reluctant to hear unfamiliar music. Brahms they long ago dismissed as "austere," "obscure," "dull." Even wise Philip Hale, septuagenarian critic of the Boston Herald, once wrote: "Over the exit doors of Symphony Hall could well be written 'This way out in case of Brahms!'"

Europe, too, was slow in accepting the simple, lower-middle-class German who disdained to be a showman. Save as it involved the making of music, there was little in Brahms' career to attract attention. He had no sensational love-life, no ravaging disease, could usually afford to eat. But on his first concert tour, when accompanying the Hungarian violinist, Eduard Reményi, he was confronted with a piano a halftone off pitch. From memory and without the violinist's knowledge Brahms transposed the entire Kreutzer Sonata. This feat won him the attention of Violinist Joseph Joachim through whom he met Liszt and the Schumanns. Robert Schumann publicly recommended him as the genius of the day. Schumann's pianist-wife, Clara, became Brahms' great and life-long friend, the one to whom he submitted all his compositions, whose suggestions he invariably accepted. His devotion to her was the outstanding feature of his life. For the rest, he held teaching positions in Detmold, Hamburg, and Vienna. In Vienna, his headquarters for 35 years, everyone came to recognize the great bearded head, the colored shirts worn without collars, the little alpaca coat, the trousers too short, the long, black cigars. Appearances meant nothing to Johannes Brahms. On rainy days he wore an old-fashioned bluish-green shawl fastened in front with an enormous pin. His concern was music—molding deep, original ideas to fit established forms, thus earning the title of the last of the great classical composers. He wrote for the piano, the voice, for chamber and symphony orchestra; never for the theatre, never in any way for acoustical effect. Death came to him at 63, the immediate result of a cold contracted at Clara Schumann's funeral.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Romantic on the Volga, magnetic on the Charles.

The Conductor. In the 33 years since his death, Brahms has achieved an immense popularity, especially with the musically meticulous. Perhaps for this reason Boston let itself wax particularly enthusiastic over last week's Festival. But there was another reason: Conductor Koussevitzky. For he is the Boston Brahmins' high priest and can do no wrong. He is handsome, distinguished in appearance, voted by many the Best-Dressed Man in Boston. He is an excellent musician, the world's greatest virtuoso on the double bass as well as one of the great conductors. His past has been romantic: in Russia before the Revolution he used to sail with his orchestra up and down the Volga, giving concerts in all the basin towns, introducing much new music. He has great personal magnetism—the kind that makes female hearts beat fast at every concert, although his matronly-looking wife is always present, sitting well back on the right. Surest sign of his Boston success is the fact that he has been admitted to the Somerset Club, a Beacon Hill institution so exclusive that little Brahmins are usually registered for it immediately after birth.

THE BRAHMS FESTIVAL

In villages of Western Massachusetts and no doubt in villages throughout New England in the Sixties and for some years later where there was a monthly Communion service in the Congregational churches on a Sunday, there was a "preparatory lecture" on the preceding Friday afternoon. The bell in the Old Church at Northampton, for example, would summon the faithful.

Many who are looking forward to the Brahms Festival to be held with pomp and ceremony in Symphony Hall will not be contented with the biographical sketches of Johannes in the music encyclopedias, and will wish to know more about him as a man, rather than to be able to talk knowingly about the history of the works then to be performed. Kalbeck's huge biography is forbidding even to those willing to wade in its verbal torrent. Florence May, a pupil of Brahms, has little to say about the man himself. She vies with Kalbeck in indiscriminate flaming eulogy.

"Brahms" by Walter Niemann has been translated into English by Catherine Alison Phillips. Published by Alfred A. Knopf of New York, it is as readable as it is informing and sanely critical. The first part deals with Brahms's life. The second with his works. There is a bibliography of the principal German and English books concerning Brahms. There is a catalogue of his compositions arranged in order of opus number with names of publishers, year of composition and year of publication; also a list of Brhams's arrangements of his own works. An index of names is followed by an index of references to the works in the text.

The leading events in the artistic life of Brahms are more or less familiar to the Brahmsites in Boston. But what was his boyhood? What were his personal habits?

His father was an amiable, humorous man of the lower middle class, of limited intellect, a capable double-bass player, having a knowledge of the horn and the violoncello, who began by playing in the lowest taverns for sailors at Hamburg, and finally held a position as double-bass at the Stadt Theatre and in the Philharmonic orchestra. Once when a conductor told him to play a little louder, he answered: "Herr Kapellmeister, this is my double-bass; so I can play on it as loud as I like."

The mother was upright, of no education, with more mother-wit than her husband, a good housekeeper, a clever needlewoman. There were three children. The parents lived apart in later years. Young Johannes was a stocky, tough, healthy boy. He studied faithfully what the schools had to offer, he even learned a little French. The Bible made a deep impression on him. It was during the early years that his "Austerely North German and Protestant view of life and art were firmly laid together with his deep-rooted love for the true Protestant chorale and Protestant church music." He had a long hard struggle to obtain a good education. What he acquired later in life was due to his own efforts and self-discipline.

When he was 15 he had finished his musical studies with his father and could play the violin, violoncello and horn well enough to act as a stop-gap when necessary. His father made him play his first attempt at a composition to friends, but the father found composition of secondary importance; there was no money to be earned by it. Johannes told Widman that he was always composing. "My finest songs would come to me early in the morning when I was cleaning the boots," that he composed only in great secrecy and in the earliest hours. "All day long I was arranging marches for brass bands, and at night I would be seated at the piano in taverns." The father obliged him to help him earn money. He would play second violin in private orchestras and at dances. Late one night there was a knock at the door. Johannes was dragged from bed to play at a ball for two thalers and drink unlimited. He would take walks with a young piano teacher; "as a rule he did not speak a word, but walked along humming to himself, usually carrying his hat in his hand, as he loved to do throughout his whole life." He bid fair to end his days as a ball-room player "in the same narrow, middle-class surroundings, both material and artistic, as his parents." To them and to many talented musicians of Germany art was a business, a practical matter, a means of earning money to ensure good living.

But the father was quick to realize that his Johannes had more than ordinary talent, and impelled by the pressure of other musicians he did what he could to develop the boy musically. So he entrusted the 7-year-old to a pianist, Cossel, who was bound to make him a pianist. "It's a pity," he once said. "He might be such a good pianist, but he will not leave this everlasting composition alone." The boy studied Czerny, Clementi, Cramer, Kalkbrenner, Hummel, but Cossel now and then let him try his hand at a piece by J. S. Bach. He wisely protected him from being exploited as a child prodigy. When he was 10 he played at a subscription concert where an agent heard him and wanted the boy with his father to make a concert tour in America. The parents were tempted, but Cossel put his foot down, for which Johannes was grateful all his life.

Johannes during childhood and adolescence had a deep love of nature as "the fount of all sound human and artistic endeavor"; and he had an overmastering bent towards knowledge and culture. There were times when he could not be torn from the harbor. He read "Robinson Crusoe," but while the harbor drove his brother Fritz westward across the ocean, Johannes was drawn more towards the south. He was proud of the city's history; he became acquainted with the writings of Mattheson and C. P. E. Bach; with the plays of Lessing; he haunted the shops of second-hand book dealers. Thus he laid the foundations of wide reading in music, literature and art, betraying what a passionate collector he was to become—"at that time quite a rare thing for a German musician." Books were his favorite presents to his friends of both sexes.

When Johannes was 10 years old, Edward Marxen, an excellent man, admirable musician, a man of erudition, a composer in the greater forms, became his teacher. Marxen was pleased with the boy's acuteness of mind. Though the first compositions were insignificant Marxen saw that an exceptional, great, profound talent was dormant in his pupil. "I therefore shrank from no effort or work in order to awaken and form it, that I might one day rear a priest of art, who should preach in new accents what was sublime, true, and externally incorruptible in art, and that by acts as well as words." This idealistic attitude toward life and art had a great influence on Brahms. It won him over to the "moral in music, and the classical in art." He was initiated into Bach, Beethoven, Weber, though that was a Philistine period in Hamburg of uninspired virtuosity. But Marxen thought more of form than color, more of the contrapuntal and polyphonic than of the homophonic. Thus it was he who gave Brahms the firm foundations of this conception of art, though his own outlook on life was "quite as gentle, sentimental and sleek as that of any Philistine of his day."

Even while he was studying with Marxen, Brahms was anxious about earning a livelihood. He had given lessons, he said in after life, ever since he was 12 years old. Naturally his own pupils gave him little pleasure. He acted as conductor of a male voice chorus; gave his first concert arranged by himself when he was 14, including his own variations on a folk-theme in the program. At his first concerts he followed the taste of the period which "tended toward superficial 'tunyness,' sentimental gush, 'pluies de perles' and the fireworks of virtuosi, and so he rarely gave concerts of his own; he taught the piano for a mark a lesson, played at dances, played entr'actes behind the scenes at the Stadt Theatre, accompanied virtuosi on the platform; made transcriptions and arrangements—signed "G. W. Marks"—for publishers, signing his own free compositions "Karl Wuerth." He composed some 150 fantasias on waltz airs and some serious works.

When Brahms was 50 years old, he said to Gustave Jenner, "Few can have had so hard a time as I."

In 1849 some political refugees from Hungary appeared in Hamburg. Among them was Eduard Remenyi, the violinist, who long afterwards gave concerts in the United States and died in San Francisco in 1898. He said on his arrival in Hamburg that he was then on his way to America, but giving a "farewell" concert he met with so great pecuniary success by his playing of national dances that he decided to remain. Brahms was so dazzled by Remenyi's brilliant playing, his wandering, gypsy-like romantic life, that he offered to be his accompanist. Remenyi engaged him for a short concert tour, intending to take him to Joachim. There was the meeting that led to the friendship and artistic bond that lasted through life. The meeting was at Joachim's house in Hanover.

Remenyi was of importance to Brahms as a composer by directing his attention to Hungarian folk music, which led to the composition of the Hungarian dances for piano; for the finales of many of his chamber works; an influence that is seen in the finale of the second piano concerto.

The brilliant, erratic Remenyi, who would now play like a god even in his later years, sometimes like a pig, to use his own words when he once talked with us at the lodgings of an Austrian at Albany, N. Y., accused Brahms of making free with Remenyi's own compositions, unpublished, rhapsodies for concert use. He was a singular, fascinating man, this Hungarian virtuoso, entertaining in conversation by his reminiscences, his original views on life and art his sudden changes from devotion—he had his superstitions—to scepticism, his wit not free from malice. When we knew him he reminded one of a snuff-taking French abbe of the 18th century as described in books of anecdotes and gossip. He would grow enthusiastic over the classic works for the violin; and show the same enthusiasm for his own "Hymn to Mount Shasta." Edward MacDowell once said that there was the suggestion of a rope-dancer in every great virtuoso; this was true of Remenyi—whose name was Hoffmann—but when he was wholly in the vein he played like an inspired musician reverencing his art, as well as a brilliant virtuoso.

Behold our Johannes fairly launched on his career. Next Sunday let us consider him as a human being in Vienna.

MUSIC

"Time" March 31/30

Brahms for Brahmins

Boston last week had six days of music by great Johannes Brahms. The first program began rather pompously with the Academic Festival Overture, a symphonic composite of German student songs written by Brahms as a thank-you for the Ph. D. degree conferred on him by the University of Breslau. There followed, during the Festival's course, the four symphonies—the impassioned First, the pastoral Second, the heroic Third, the peaceful, elegiac Fourth; then the Variations on a theme by Haydn—cold, sparkling music for Brahms to have written; then the two piano concertos, Song of Destiny and A German Requiem; then more piano pieces, songs, the piano quintet with its conflicting themes and moods; and the Alto Rhapsody, sombrely inspired by Goethe's Harzreise im Winter. Soloists were Pianist Arthur Schnabel, famed in Europe as a Brahms interpreter and come especially for the Festival; Soprano Jeannette Vreeland, Contralto Margaret Matzenauer, Baritone Fraser Gange; members of Richard Burgin's String Quartet (Burgin is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony), and members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Head man of all was Conductor Serge Koussevitzky who conceived and planned the Festival, gave it the flair which raises all his performances far above the commonplace.

New York Public Library

JOHANNES BRAHMS

In his case, no longer "This Way Out."

The Composer. Not always would Boston have deemed the music of Brahms worthy of festival performance by its celebrated symphony orchestra. Just as Boston's Brahmins have always been conservative in their choice of acquaintances, so (until the arrival of Conductor Koussevitzky six years ago) have Bostonians been reluctant to hear unfamiliar music. Brahms they long ago dismissed as "austere," "obscure," "dull." Even wise Philip Hale, septuagenarian critic of the Boston Herald, once wrote: "Over the exit doors of Symphony Hall could well be written 'This way out in case of Brahms!'"

Europe, too, was slow in accepting the simple, lower-middle-class German who disdained to be a showman. Save as it involved the making of music, there was little in Brahms' career to attract attention. He had no sensational love-life, no ravaging disease, could usually afford to eat. But on his first concert tour, when accompanying the Hungarian violinist, Eduard Reményi, he was confronted with a piano a halftone off pitch. From memory and without the violinist's knowledge Brahms transposed the entire Kreutzer Sonata. This feat won him the attention of Violinist Joseph Joachim through whom he met Liszt and the Schumanns. Robert Schumann publicly recommended him as the genius of the day. Schumann's pianist-wife, Clara, became Brahms' great and life-long friend, the one to whom he submitted all his compositions, whose suggestions he invariably accepted. His devotion to her was the outstanding feature of his life. For the rest, he held teaching positions in Detmold, Hamburg, and Vienna. In Vienna, his headquarters for 35 years, everyone came to recognize the great bearded head, the colored shirts worn without collars, the little alpaca coat, the trousers too short, the long, black cigars. Appearances meant nothing to Johannes Brahms. On rainy days he wore an old-fashioned bluish-green shawl fastened in front with an enormous pin. His concern was music—molding deep, original ideas to fit established forms, thus earning the title of the last of the great classical composers. He wrote for the piano, the voice, for chamber and symphony orchestra; never for the theatre, never in any way for acoustical effect. Death came to him at 63, the immediate result of a cold contracted at Clara Schumann's funeral.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Romantic on the Volga, magnetic on the Charles.

The Conductor. In the 33 years since his death, Brahms has achieved an immense popularity, especially with the musically meticulous. Perhaps for this reason Boston let itself wax particularly enthusiastic over last week's Festival. But there was another reason: Conductor Koussevitzky. For he is the Boston Brahmins' high priest and can do no wrong. He is handsome, distinguished in appearance, voted by many the Best-Dressed Man in Boston. He is an excellent musician, the world's greatest virtuoso on the double bass as well as one of the great conductors. His past has been romantic: in Russia before the Revolution he used to sail with his orchestra up and down the Volga, giving concerts in all the basin towns, introducing much new music. He has great personal magnetism—the kind that makes female hearts beat fast at every concert, although his matronly-looking wife is always present, sitting well back on the right. Surest sign of his Boston success is the fact that he has been admitted to the Somerset Club, a Beacon Hill institution so exclusive that little Brahmins are usually registered for it immediately after birth.

BRAHMS IN SLIPPERS

The audiences at the Brahms Festival would no doubt like to know something about the man in private life. They already rejoice in the knowledge that Beethoven was irascible, the despair of his landladies, given to rough joking; that Haydn was nagged by his shrew of a wife and fell in love with a woman in London; that Mozart was fond of punch and billiards; that Cesar Franck's trousers were too short. There are many anecdotes about the great, some of them no doubt apochryphal.

In the excellent biography of Brahms by Walter Niemann, to which we referred last Sunday, there is an entertaining chapter entitled "Brahms as a Man."

He was not fussy in his dress. At home he went about in a flannel shirt, trousers, a detachable white collar, no cravat, slippers. In the country he was happy in a flannel shirt and alpaca jacket, carrying a soft felt hat in his hand, and in bad weather wearing on his shoulders an old-fashioned bluish-green shawl, fastened in front by a huge pin. (We remember that in the sixties many New Englanders on their perilous journeys to Boston or New York wore a shawl.) He preferred a modest restaurant to hotel table d'hotes. In his music room were pictures of a few composers, engravings—the Sistine Madonna among them—the portrait of Cherubini, by Ingres, with a veiled Muse crowning the composer.—"I cannot stand that female," Brahms said to his landlady—a bronze relief of Bismarck, always crowned with laurel. There was a square piano supposed to have been Haydn's, also a grand piano, on which a volume of Bach was usually standing open. On the cover lay note books, writing tablets, calendars, cigar cases, spectacles, purses, watches, keys, portfolios, recently published books and music, also souvenirs of his travels. He was passionately patriotic, interested in politics, a firm believer in German unity. He deeply regretted that he had not done military service as a young man. Prussia should be the North German predominant power.

His library occupied the whole of a long wall of the room. The shelves held rare old books on music, autographs, engravings, etchings, etc. Among his favorite writers were Freytag, Heyse, Keller (the Swiss poet) Alexis, Grillparzer, Kleist, Hebbel, E. T. A. Hoffmann, Arnim, Auerbach, Luther (the translation of the Bible and the "Table Talk"). Folk poetry, fairy tales, sagas, delighted him. Books of travel were dear to him, as was Grimm's German dictionary. A man, he kept his boyish love for "Robinson Crusoe." "Gil Blas" was on the shelf, as were historical works on Germany's wars. For 24 years he subscribed to the satirical Kladderadatsch—the numbers were piled in a wardrobe. Well acquainted with modern literature, he was a zealous first-nighter at the Burgtheatre. He had little patience with the hysteria and unrest of the contemporary literary tendencies. "Passions," he wrote to Clara Schumann, "do not pertain to man as a natural thing. They are always exceptions or excrescences."

His traveling trunk and valise were always packed ready for instant use. The windows of the music room and library were always shut; those of his bedroom open day and night.

As a young man he was shy, awkward; this awkwardness had its origin "chiefly in his oppressive consciousness of his lack of ease in the forms of polite society, which he tried, as a rule, to conceal behind an apparently rough manner." He was then slender, walking with an uncertain gait, body bowed a little forward. His voice was then as gentle as his hair was long. He was a good athlete. As a boy he had a pure soprano voice, which he ruined by singing when it was breaking. Forty years later this voice was gruff; he was portly; the once clean shaven face gave way to a great full beard. At the age of thirty his figure was short and squat, his under lip protruded, but "his whole appearance was steeped in force . . . there was something confidently triumphant in his face, the radiant serenity of a mind happy in the exercise of his art," wrote Widmann, observing him playing the piano.

He could take a nap at any time in the day; in the open as in a room, he could sleep at a friend's house on a sofa or under a grand piano. Breakfast was his favorite meal. Coffee and cigars could not be too strong for him. No matter how heavy his supper, he drank coffee for which his recipe was as many coffee beans as would ordinarily make 10 cups. He seldom composed at Vienna; when he did, it was standing, never at the piano. Out of bed very early—in summer holiday, at 5—he worked without stopping till noon. At 12:30 he would lunch at the "Roter Igel"; take his coffee, then a long walk. At night after a concert or an opera he would take his drink at the same restaurant, where he would meet carefully chosen friends Though he carried his liquor well, he was moderate and simple in what he ate and drank, demanding no delicacies, preferring a solid, middle-class meal. At midday he drank a half-pint of red wine or a small glass of Pilsener beer.

As a young man he had a rough exterior. This roughness grew on him, was noticeable even in his jesting, his physical behavior. Yet his friends said his nature was gentle; that he would weep before certain pictures, or at a performance—especially of his own works. His eyes would brim with tears as he farewelled intimate friends. As soon as there was talk about music he would become silent. Interested in a subject, he would speak vivaciously but with few words and little gesturing. With close friends he was lively and witty. He would often be curt, abrupt in speech. He could be jovial with men, gallant to beautiful women. The curiosity of professional journalists, reporters, autograph hunters, he detested; also dedications, painters and sculptors after a commission. He made innumerable enemies among critics and journalists by his rudeness "These petty scribblers are nothing but skirmishers; they delay matters a bit. Only a creative genius can be convincing in art." (What would he have said to Oscar Wilde's theory that the critic is the true creative artist; that the excuse for a work or a performance is the critical article about it?) He let himself be photographed fairly often. Amateur photographs and snap-shots amused him greatly.

"All these are but small things and characteristic trifles. But they spring from the very depths of Brahms's native Low German character, which hated nothing so much as false solemnity, spurious pathos and stilted theatrical pomposity, and show us his simple, modest side." This quality caused him to be grossly misunderstood. Niemann, in a diatribe against some of Brahms's contemporaries, admits that his hero in his relations with his fellow-artists was often "far too prone to follow the impulse of the moment and say hasty, spiteful, disagreeable and stinging things; indeed, he felt he simply must say them, though nobody had less desire to be nasty, and nobody repented of them more sincerely."

Here are a couple of the many illustrative anecdotes that might be told here:

When Bruch, sweating, had played him the whole of his "Odysseus," all that Brahms said at the end was: "Tell me, where do you get your beautiful manuscript paper?"

Seeing some compositions by Reinecke on a friend's piano, he said to the old composer's wife, who was standing by: "What, does your husband compose, too?"

He asked Gura, the singer, in Goldmark's presence: "Do you not think it extraordinary that a Jew should compose a setting of Martin Luther's words?"

No wonder that Brahms, growing more reserved, harsher, ruder, suffered from his incapacity for "getting outside himself." He told Clara Schumann he longed for affection. He loved his parents, step-family, brothers and sisters, children and animals. Loyal to his friends, he was genuinely religious. He was generous, in secret, to those in need. "Brahms was a convinced and believing member of the Lutheran Protestant church; not as regards dogma, not in the letter, but in the spirit." "We North Germans," he once said, "long for the Bible every day and do not let a day go by without it. In my study I can lay my hand on my Bible even in the dark."

Niemann asks whether Brahms's celibacy was voluntary or not. He bases his answer, in the negative, on occasional remarks of Brahms. As a young man he was secretly in love with Clara Schumann. He was devoted to her till her death. Though he had a youthful passion for Agathe von Siebold, he let it cool, for his future was not assured. A girl at Oldenburg pleased him when he was in his thirties. He told Widmann years later he had waited too long. He made an unsuccessful attempt to marry Clara Schumann's daughter Julie. When a young woman asked him why he had not married, he answered, "None of them would have me; and if there had been one who would, I could not have stood her on account of her bad taste."

Not that, to use Sir Thomas Browne's phrase, he was "averse from that sweet sex." Dwellers in Vienna who knew Brahms have told us that like Sainte-Beuve, like Hazlitt, he looked with a favoring eye on bonnes.

There is a short chapter in Niemann's indispensable book on Brahms as a composer as well as a man—a book as remarkable for the sanity of his criticism as for the orderly information—a chapter about Brahms as a pianist, conductor and teacher, in which Niemann says that as a pianist and conductor Johannes must above all be judged as the interpreter of Brahms the composer. We heard him play in the season of 1883-84 at Berlin his D-minor concerto, and found his performance rough and uninspiring. In that season he conducted the first performance in Berlin of his Symphony No. 3. The orchestra was respectfully obedient to his baton. The testimony of three piano pupils is singularly contradictory. He thought a pupil should never be encouraged with words of praise. He said to Richard Strauss after Strauss's F-minor symphony: "Young man, look at Schubert's dances and practise inventing simple, eight bar melodies." Niemann ends this chapter by saying: "Even during his lifetime Brahms's achievements as a composer by far overshadowed his activity as pianist, conductor and teacher."

Then follow nearly 300 pages in which Niemann has much to say about the compositions. The book is published by Alfred A. Knopf of New York.

The Festival Adds Brahms's Master Work

In Full-Rounded Performance The "German Requiem" for Choral Concert

THIS generation of the concert-hall knows Brahms best, honors him most, as composer of symphonic music. A glance around Symphony Hall last evening affirmed as much. For the "German Requiem" not every seat was taken; whereas for the Concerto and the Symphony of Sunday afternoon hardly a place stood empty. Next, for most of us, stands Brahms the composer of songs. Publicly, we hear him as such in too standard a repertory. Privately, we cultivate him according to our own choice. Third, place the composer of chamber-music. The pianists and the violinists have their favorite Sonatas; the foursomes (as Mr. Grainger likes to call them) their favorite Quartets; the virtuosi-musicians risk on their programs even the later Intermezzi, Caprices, Rhapsodies. We shall hear Mr. Schnabel play four of them this evening. Fourth and last, in the general ear, sounds Brahms the composer of choral music. The catalogues of his "collected works" list a page or two of such pieces; but, outside Germany and Austria, we are fortunate if we hear aught else than the "German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny"—and them not too often. To these two at the current festival, by happy exception, the Rhapsody for Alto and Men's Chorus will be added.

Every one of the Symphonies bears marks of the labor that Brahms spent upon it. They were conceived and accomplished in mental and spiritual travail. The choral vein flows more freely, more amply. By instinct, predilection and habit, Brahms is composer of music for choirs variously constituted and variously accompanied. He read of a morning in Hölderlin's eighteenth-century poetry and that same afternoon began the making of the "Song of Destiny." Composers nowadays, unless like Stravinsky, they throw back to Handel, achieve their choral pieces by will and application, as part of their duty to the whole art of music. Only Holst comes readily to mind as possessed, like Brahms, of the choral instinct.

Mozart wrote a Requiem Mass because the dread of death and of the undiscovered country haunted him, and he would dispel it. Berlioz wrote another because he would transform the Roman office into a grandiose spectacle in tones. Verdi wrote a third that he might clothe that office in Italian fervors, infuse into it the tradition that he honored and would practise of Italian song descending out of liturgy and madrigal. Small blame to him if the theater in which he had worked a lifetime occasionally had the better of it. The venerable editor of the program-sheet noted last evening the "abundant proof" that Brahms intended the "German Requiem" as "a last great funeral rite for Schumann." In the text and the music themselves, the "proof" seems quite as "abundant" that Brahms looked in the Scriptures, looked in his heart, and wrote.

In spite of the learned discourse—page and chapter and book of it—about the Protestantism, the Germanism, the backgrounds and environment of the "German Requiem," the years resolve it more and more into the meditation of Johannes Brahms, a devout mind and a believing spirit, upon the life of this world and of the world to come, of the death and resurrection and judgment that may be bridge between. Brahms put together his text out of a Bible that he read and knew in the faith of a truly religious and Christian man. Run through it hastily and it seems a congeries of detached verses awkwardly thrown together. Conned more closely, it becomes a carefully matched mosaic not only to serve a musical design but to bear witness to an inner continuity, contrast, significance. "Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted." . . . "All flesh is as the grass; but the redeemed of the Lord shall come rejoicing into Zion." . . . "Lord, make me know the measure of my days; but the righteous souls are in the hand of God." . . . "Here on earth have we no continuing place; but blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. . . . They rest from their labors." Pervasive these contrasts, yet with two intermezzi and one masterful transition. The first intermezzo sings "the courts of the Lord"; the second expatiates on sorrow and solace. The transition traverses death and resurrection. Brahms's poetry dwells usually in his tones. In itself the verse of his songs seldom engages the mind or quickens the heart. Yet into this text for the "German Requiem," he has infused a veritable poetry of scheme and word.

And what a text for such a music as Brahms would make! Earthly sorrow and woe and lamentation, the brevity and the emptiness of human living, touched his imagination—and he wrote the anguished pages, yet not without a recurring undernote of compassion. He saw in vision the tribulation and the struggle of men and the sight evoked the tortured music that falls to the baritone with chorus. This human fate was inexorable—in the Christian Brahms, composing, there lurked often the fatalist—and he wrote the rigid march of the second chorus to be as the endless stream of human suffering. He meditated upon death and resurrection, upon the trumpets of the Judgment Day—and rose to the close-packed, darksome imagery of the sixth division. The light came upon him and he saw the "courts of the Lord" in a music in which the evening stars sing as well as the human voices. Deep pity possessed him and he added the measures in which the soprano voice forgets grief in consolation. He heard the great hosts of "the redeemed of the Lord" and he wrote the upswelling choral fugues, one above a vast pedal-point, that end three movements. Before his eyes swam the majesty and the mercy of God, the celestial peace and healing. Toward them mounts the final chorus.

Continued on Page Fourteen

Brahms Festival

Continued from Page Eleven

Under such inspiration—for it is nothing less—Brahms's invention runs ready and full; the musical thought glows into musical emotion; the achieving hand seldom flags. The books say that Brahms worked at the score through five years. Yet of his larger works none sounds more spontaneous; none seems more nearly accomplished in a long, white heat of creation. His melodies unfold in breadth, warmth and vitalized motion. Each goes charactered. At one end of the range set the tortured song of the baritone; at the other the suffused compassion of the soprano's measures. Or array the black tense-rhythmed march of the human souls against the luminous harmonies that clothe the house of the Lord. In surge and power the fugues descend from Bach and Handel.

When he will, Brahms can infuse into his measures either the exaltation which is never mere eloquence or the tenderness which is seldom mere sentiment. And these are his own attributes. The heavens open and he declares the mercy of God. The earth is outspread and he comforts the sorrows of men. The glow within him burns away any thickness, any awkwardness in the orchestral voices. For once they do his imaginative bidding. The designing, the uprearing of the choruses seem less a studious technical mastery than an ardor of accomplishment. The symphonies and the concertos are the symphonies and the concertos; but here in the Requiem is the masterpiece in which Brahms sloughed his inhibitions away. As long as nineteenth-century music sounds in the ears of men, it will hold them fast.

Boston Spring Flower Show, by M

The performance last evening came nearer to the full accomplishment of the music and text than any within Bostonian memory. It fell short conspicuously only in Miss Vreeland's singing of the soprano part which was both superficial and marred by technical shortcoming; whereas the large, bold, graphic style, the rough-textured tones of Mr. Gange were the very medium for the baritone measures. The clear timbre of the Radcliffe women-chorus released Brahms's notes from the bondage of the printed page. The clean thrust of its singing gave them life. There were tenor tones to be heard from the Harvard choir; no sluggishness in the deeper voices stayed the rhythmic movement. Once the first chorus had steadied the full choir, the unity of attack and release, of phrasing and accent were but the outer expression of an inner unity of understanding and of feeling. In the antiphonal passages choir matched choir; while the larger sonorities suffered hardly at all from voices all youthful.

The end indeed crowned the work of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. The youth of Harvard and Radcliffe have at least learned to do one thing well for the sake of the doing, which is rather what makes life worth while. For their elders, the orchestra was alive to Brahms's changeful rhythms; measured its tone to his subdued colorings; darkened in or opened out his instrumental patterns. An elder generation recalls Nikisch as the conductor who first upon their ears released and vitalized Brahms's symphonies. We, their children, will say as much and think as high of Dr. Koussevitzky with the "German Requiem."

H. T. P.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

104 reen

Mar 27

Trans

Regrettable Changes

Two Programs for the Brahms Festival Are Altered

AT this late day two programs for the Brahms Festival next week have been revised. The "Song of Destiny" is removed from the choral concert of Monday evening and inserted in the orchestral concert of Sunday afternoon. To make room for it there, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn—one of the best-known and best-liked of Brahms's symphonic pieces—is dropped altogether. The assigned reason is the discovery that the "Song of Destiny" was ill-mated with the "German Requiem," the other choral piece. Were the Variations retained on Sunday afternoon, a longish concert would be longer.

With allowance for the discovered incongruity, these changes seem mistaken and regrettable. It hardly matters how often or considerably the program for a regular Symphony Concert is changed. The audience goes to that concert as a whole. Usually the substitutions better it. The Brahms Festival, with programs announced long in advance and made an occasion, is another story. Though the newspapers announce these changes, the public seldom notes them. Many will go to the choral concert on Monday expecting to hear two choral pieces—receive but one. Others, on Sunday, with no ear for "A Song of Destiny," will miss the Haydn Variations. Except under emergency, an announced festival should "stay put."

re- of a eld

AUSTRIAN PIANIST TO PLAY HERE SUNDAY

Mar 27

Schabel, Austrian pianist who

MUSIC

Music Notes and Comment

Mar 28

The Brahms Festival now in progress at Symphony Hall is the event by which the present musical season in Boston will be remembered. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for now nearly 49 years this city's chief musical glory, is so much more important than any other local musical enterprise, that when it undertakes anything beyond its usual series of orchestral concerts the attention of the musical public here and everywhere is attracted, as it was by the Beethoven Festival in 1927, and as it will be next Fall by the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. Very large audiences for the four extra concerts devoted to the music of Brahms in the next four days are assured.

Margaret Matzenauer, who will appear at two of the Brahms Festival concerts, is one of the best as well as one of the best known of living contraltos. Her recent resignation from the Metropolitan Opera, of which she has been for 19 years one of the principal singers, called forth many expressions of regret in New York. She has sung in Boston many times in concert and in opera with the former Boston Opera. Her most notable recent appearance here was as soloist with the Boston Symphony and Harvard Glee Club in the first American performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus" two years ago. On that occasion her singing, by common consent, quite outclassed that of the other soloists.

The Burgin String Quartet, composed of four prominent players from the Boston Symphony, is an organization constituted much as the old Kneisel Quartet originally was. Its public appearances here are infrequent. One wonders why in the absence of subscription series of chamber concerts here by first rate string quartets, now that the Flonzaley Quartet has disbanded, some manager does not persuade the Burgin Quartet to step into the vacant place.

Artur Schnabel has come from Germany to be the distinguished soloist at the Brahms Festival in Symphony Hall. The famous pianist was born in Galicia in 1882. Although he exhibited extraordinary talent as a child, he was never exploited as a prodigy. He joined the class of Leschitzky at nine, and graduated with honors at the age of 15. Schnabel's reputation in Europe is of the very highest and of many years standing. He has often been called the greatest interpreter of Brahms among living pianists. He is little known in America except by repute, having made but few appearances here. He was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, in March 30-31, 1923 when Bruno Walter was guest conductor.

Boston's Week of Brahms

By L. A. SLOPER

JOHANNES BRAHMS wrote no music for the theater. Perhaps the fact requires no elaborate explanation. It is difficult to imagine the irreproachable Brahms enriching the lyric stage with the charm of a Mozart, the fervor of a Wagner or the dramatic genius of a Verdi. Mr. Fuller Maitland surmises that Brahms realized at once the sterility of conservative stage music and his own incapacity to write in the style of Wagner. But need we be sad because Brahms paused before the frivolous portals of the theater? There is ample dramatic content in the music he did write. All he needs is a Koussevitzky, a Schnabel or a Matzenauer for interpreter. All these, and more, he had for the six-day festival of his music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course Dr. Koussevitzky, who never can be persuaded that things are well enough as they are, was primarily responsible. Having already directed celebrations for the centenaries of Beethoven and Schubert, he cast about for another composer to honor. There was no centenary of a master in 1930, but that did not deter the conductor. He admires Brahms, and excels as an interpreter of his music, just as Nikisch—as we are told—did. Sufficient reasons for a Brahms Festival. Thus large numbers of Bostonians have listened to a series which included the four symphonies, the two piano concertos, the "German Requiem," the "Song of Destiny," some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Piano Quintet, some songs and the piano pieces of op. 119.

Extraordinary Enthusiasm

As John N. Burk reminded us, in an admirably balanced pamphlet issued by the orchestra in preparation for the festival, Boston has been as slow as other capitals of music to embrace Brahms. His conclusion that "the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town" as at present, was justified by the response to these concerts. As one young person from the middle West remarked: "And they call Boston a cold town!" The enthusiasm at all the concerts was quite extraordinary, and on the final evening (March 26) there was an ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra which has hardly been duplicated during the six years of his Boston seneschalship, unless at the close of the Beethoven Festival. No one, surely, will begrudge the tribute to leader or men. The conductor, who never does anything half-heartedly, labored devotedly in preparation and performance, and the orchestra's work was quite up to its standard.

It was not to be expected that all the results would be equal in value. You can hardly give a Brahms Festival without including some of the chamber pieces. But Symphony Hall holds more than 2500 persons; scarcely the place for intimate music. No one should have been suprised, then, that the Piano Quintet, with Arthur Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet, was not the most successful item in the cycle. Heard in a small hall, this music has the power to stir admiration and emotion; in these vast reaches, the piano overwhelmed the strings and the finest effects were lost.

On the program with the quintet, however, the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of op. 119 came to entrancing utterance at the hands of Mr. Schnabel; who then, with a fine gesture of unselfed artistic devotion, became the unobtrusive accompanist for Margaret Matzenauer in four songs. His superb fellow-artist was heard to better advantage in "Von Ewige Liebe" and "Meine Liebe ist Grüne" than in the "Sapphische Ode" or the "Immer Leiser." Opening this program there was a charming performance of some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with their respesctive conductors. Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, at the piano.

The Collegiate Chorus

These young collegians, by the way, although their personnel changes annually, remain one of the most satisfying choral bodies of our experience. Trained to uncompromising ideals, they place their fresh voices and their inspiring fervor at the service of art. And when their part in the program is finished, they add immeasurably to the volume of applause for the more famous artists, constituting themselves, without in the least being aware of it, a volunteer claque in thralldom to music.

Mme. Matzenauer joined a group of the singers in a moving interpretation of the "Harzreise" Rhapsody. In the Requiem the choruses were augmented by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. They had the choral field to themselves in the "Song of Destiny."

Another acclaimed hero of the series was of course Mr. Schnabel, whose playing of the concertos for piano not only was authoritative but brought these works to pulsing life. Where, by the way, originated the tradition that the first of these concertos is finer exponent whose readings can hardly be challenged, we feel the superiority of the B flat major, pianistically and musically, to be evident.

The Symphonies

Finally the symphonies, played in this order: Nos. 3, 2, 4 and 1. Under this test the F major seemed clearly entitled to less and the D major to more consideration than is usually accorded. We shall not presume to sit as judge upon the merits of the other two. Nor shall we seize upon the occasion to pronounce a conclusive estimate of the music of Johannes Brahms, nor to forecast the effect of the six-day examination upon his reputation. Attention no doubt has been drawn by it to his learning. His romantic characteristics have been set forth in the most persuasive manner. In retrospect of the six days he seems more a romanticist than a classicist, closer to Beethoven and to Schumann than to Bach or Mozart. Further, from this fresh review, we are impressed less by his material than by his handling of it, and we find even in the handling more cerebration than inspiration. It seems to us, too, that there is wisdom in those who say that the Brahms of the songs, the piano pieces and the chamber ensembles is greater than he of the symphonies and of the bigger choral compositions. After so protracted a bout, we see Brahms as a big fellow who, not realizing his own strength, should not be allowed too heavy implements to play with.

Is it possible that Brahms, like Wagner, is doomed, after a struggle of long years for recognition, to fall back at last to a plane below that of the greatest masters? At all events, we render thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates for the opportunity to survey his work.

A Novelty From Harvard

After so busy a week, it was natural that the orchestra's program on March 28 should consist for the most part of pieces recently introduced—Haydn's Symphony in D (with the Horn Call), Sibelius's Sixth and the Bach-Schoenberg Prelude and the Fugue in E flat.

Yet there was a novelty, too; a Suite by Walter Piston, of the Harvard musical faculty, which received its first performance under the composer's baton. It consists of an Allegro, an Andante and a fugal Finale. The first movement, the composer had confided to the editor of the program notes, "contains some 'Americanisms' but is in no sense an attempt to write jazz." It is, however jazzier than this statement would lead you to believe. In fact, it is one of the most successful experiments we recall in applying the jazz idiom to classical forms. A nostalgic Andante and a lively fugue complete the suite.

If this music does not open "new paths," it is well made, contains good writing for the instruments and is pleasant to listen to. It marks a advance upon Mr. Piston's "Symphonic Piece," heard two years ago. It is less obviously derivative, possesses a more individual flavor. Its composer obtained an excellent performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the orchestra played, the remainder of the program as if they had never heard of Brahms. All the items were well worth an early second hearing. The Sibelius in particular impressed us afresh with its vitality, its richness and its characteristic emotional quality. After hearing this concert if we do not love Brahms less, we certainly love Haydn, Sibelius and Bach more.

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony Concert

A First Day For Brahms Thrice Over

Dr. Koussevitzky Assembles The Middle Symphonies And an Overture

Mar 22 Trans.

IN the largest type upon the page of the program-book labelled the occasion "Opening Concert of the Brahms Festival"; but to the practised eye it resembled a Friday matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon which an "All-Brahms" program had descended. A glance around, before the concert began, noted the usual audience; others, while the concert was proceeding, its customary tranquil listening. Politely it hailed and farewelled Dr. Koussevitzky whenever he came to the stage or departed from it. Politely it clapped Brahms's kettle-drums, bass-drum and cymbals at the end of the "Academic Overture." His Symphony in F major passed without excitement; but at the close of the Second, which ended the concert, a gust of applause came quick and warm. Seemingly, few demurred to two Symphonies of Brahms in a single afternoon; while hardly more were impressed.

Plainly enough, an "All-Brahms" program does not alter the habitual detachment—in the auditorium—at these Friday matinées. No more, probably, would a whole Brahms Festival, were that same audience exposed to it. Perhaps the company this evening will warm more to a special occasion; but it will be just as well to date the festival from the concert of Sunday afternoon. Then begin the four days of Brahms, the Brahmsians, and his prophets at Symphony Hall assembled. And "we are all Brahmsians now"—except possibly that audience of Friday afternoon which prefers, with the best grace in the world, to remain its normal self.

The "Academic Festival Overture," as the full title runs, was obviously the proper opening piece. Brahms wrote but two concert-overtures, and neither by mood, matter, nor good report would the "Tragic Overture" have suited the occasion. Except the Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, no symphonic piece by the mature Brahms is less often played in America. Reasonably, the present Festival ignores it. Since two Symphonies were to follow, the sticklers for logic might have preferred, as natural introduction, the Variations upon a Theme by Haydn. They are altogether Brahmsian; time has not dimmed them; the learned say they are the source book of all four Symphonies. From a subsequent program Dr. Koussevitzky had also banished them. The more the regret, but there was only to listen to the Overture in which Brahms, after his manner, returns thanks for the doctorate from Breslau.

A few pages made plain that the conductor was sparing no pains. For a festival that justly stirs his ambition, he had restudied the "Academic Overture" and the two subsequent Symphonies, rehearsed them until the orchestra knew his every wish and was itself "on edge." A living Brahms might have lately handed him the three manuscripts for first performance. Dr. Koussevitzky plays every music as though for the time he believed in it and there were nothing else in the world. Give him a composer that touches him nearly as does Brahms, and he excels in the joining of heat to light. Sensitively and faithfully he kept throughout the afternoon to the true Brahmsian orchestra with its subdued scale of tonal color, its open and running rather than massed voices, choir upon choir. As sensitively he caught the mood of Brahms with the student-songs from which he generates this Academic Overture.

It pleased the composer, self-deprecating and jocular, to call the piece a "potpourri" of such tunes, his jolly "thesis" in return for the doctorate. Actually it is only such in the sonorous tumult of the close—and there with stately rather than sportive accent. Elsewhere Brahms turns over these student-songs rather wistfully. At middle age he could look back at them as to symbols of vanished youth. As he looked, he both smiled and sighed—the melancholy that Dr. Koussevitzky draws from at least half the Overture. More than is native custom he also polishes it. For the most part, German conductors will have it hearty, homely, even heavy; make out a good case for such a "reading." Hereabouts these are the days of cosmopolitan Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky out of Russia and Paris plays him; so also does Mr. Toscanini of Milan and New York. What connoisseurs ask is a personal divination. Therefore an "Academic Overture" melancholy and with artifice.

At no haste when he sat at his writing table, Brahms put to paper compact symphonies. Two of them in an afternoon do not imply two hours of listening. The Third and the Second—to name them in the order in which they were played—make effective contrast; out of them souhds the symphonic Brahms when he is nearest to common humanity. The labellers, ever busy with a word and a paste-pot, will have this Third Symphony in F major Brahms's "Eroica." The first movement and, in degree, the finale, give them reason. The first lacks neither spaciousness nor strength nor Brahmsian passion. There are outflung phrases; motives in clamorous and striving ascent and descent. The mental and the musical energy of the whole is irresistable. As nearly as it was in him to be dramatic, Brahms writes a music of strenuous conflict; but always in that measure which is thought tempering emotion. Even the motto-motiv shall not shout too loud. It is token of inward and spiritual resistance.

After the first movement, these heroic accents are stilled. The slow movement strikes unmistakably the note of Brahms's autumnal song. The phrases soften; the rhythms are gentle; the progress musing; the coloring clear and pale. Out of strength is born sweetness; but into sentimentality, thanks to Brahms's mind, it never lapses. Continuing, the lyrical Brahms writes the succeeding Allegretto. Those that disliked man and music reproached him with a North-German, not to say Prussian, hardness. Now, he reminds them, he can write as tenderly and poignantly as Schumann. If the hearer wishes, find again in the finale the strenuous, striving, quasi-dramatic Brahms, calling back that heroic motto-motiv. Before the end, however, the autumnal mood again prevails. Restlessness stills into calm; the sombre coloring warms into golden glow. These are the days of a songful Brahms. Through the second and the third movements Dr. Koussevitzky intensified the lyrical mood; through the first and the finale released the latent passion. But, true Brahmsian, he kept the song clear of sensuous note; preferred, with the passion, an inner energy; for coloring deepened the shadows beneath the high lights. For him Brahms writes an introspective symphony.

For the labellers, the Second Symphony in D major is Brahms's "Pastoral." For the conductor, it was rather a music that should charm by freshness and animation, yet not quite escape the Brahmsian contemplation, the Brahmsian melancholy. Quick-coming invention must have sped it. None of Brahms's larger works is so free from the moments in which calculation rather than impulse chooses the notes. None exhibits so seldom the turns of expression, the tricks of manner, inseparable from those who write much and in a characteristic idiom. The first movement is the lyrical Brahms, fertile in melody, lively in rhythm, ready with expedient, warm of mood. The spacing is open, the coloring bright, the movement flexible—a music of cheerful ease. The slow division begins and melancholy creeps in—not the carking melancholy of the Russian and other intensive temperaments; but the pensive mood, proper to an idyllic Symphony. It is like the misty lights, the sunshine out of cloud, over Brahms's native plain.

The scherzo—for Brahms—touches gayety. Twice over he must have the quicker measures; for before and between them the oboe is still piping a pensive note. Brahms was at his middle forties when he wrote this Second Symphony and the autumnal mood was already upon him. The finale outpaces it; brushes it away. The idyll shines clear again. Brahms knew and loved Italian skies and airs. There are Mediterranian warmths in this Second Symphony. Not for long may melancholy Northern mists overcloud them. The detractors will doubtless have it that Dr. Koussevitzky tries to "dramatize" a music in which there is no tonal drama. More truly, he would set clear and keep bright, or pensive, each songful mood; open out the lyric flow; make each fine sonority sound or suggest. The orchestral tone was glamorous; as in the Third Symphony, it glossed the measures that say nothing and darken progress. . . . There was no dramatist in Brahms; but out of this Second Symphony speaks a tone-poet.

H. T. P.

BRAHMS WEEK BEGINS AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH Mar 22

THE current pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitutes the beginning of the Brahms Festival. Brahms was born in 1833 and died in 1897. So far as we know there is no special occasion for this festival. It was simply Koussevitzky's own idea.

And a good idea, too. Brahm's music, far from repelling the present generation as it did the preceding one — they thought it "unmelodic"—occupies the position of a best-seller. An all-one-composer program, to say nothing of a festival, is risky for the general concert-going public. Aside from Brahms, perhaps only Beethoven, Wagner and Chopin can stand the test.

Listening to the present program, consisting of the "Academic" Overture and the Second and Third Symphonies, we were not conscious of that fearful spectre—monotony. So far as we could observe, the audience was having a perfectly splendid time. True, the music of Brahms is characteristic, it has earmarks, it displays idiosyncrasies. But so it is true of any music or art worth its weight in salt.

You hear a Brahms theme and are perhaps "reminded" of a similar theme in another work of his. It is not idle repetition; but an opportunity has arisen for saying the same or similar thing in a new context. And there is no talking for effect; the speech is germane to the discussion, to continue the metaphor. Music is here genuinely a language.

The greatness of these works is now generally acknowledged. This is well, for it would be foolhardy to attempt to discuss their merits in a few paragraphs. It is interesting to note, however, the freshness which these essentially romantic—as well as classic—works have for the jazz-ridden, speed-worshipping, and sophisticated audience of 1930.

The performance in each case, at yesterday's concert, attested to the enthusiasm and care of Mr. Koussevitzky and to the virtosity of the orchestra. Of course there is ground for difference of opinion—not mere quibbling, either—as to his choice of tempt and dynamics. But the spirit, the romantic glow, the apparently effervescent spontaneity are present. Those are the things that count.

104

reen

Mar 21

Trans

Regrettable Changes

Two Programs for the Brahms Festival Are Altered

AT this late day two programs for the Brahms Festival next week have been revised. The "Song of Destiny" is removed from the choral concert of Monday evening and inserted in the orchestral concert of Sunday afternoon. To make room for it there, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn—one of the best-known and best-liked of Brahms's symphonic pieces—is dropped altogether. The assigned reason is the discovery that the "Song of Destiny" was ill-mated with the "German Requiem," the other choral piece. Were the Variations retained on Sunday afternoon, a longish concert would be longer.

With allowance for the discovered incongruity, these changes seem mistaken and regrettable. It hardly matters how often or considerably the program for a regular Symphony Concert is changed. The audience goes to that concert as a whole. Usually the substitutions better it. The Brahms Festival, with programs announced long in advance and made an occasion, is another story. Though the newspapers announce these changes, the public seldom notes them. Many will go to the choral concert on Monday expecting to hear two choral pieces—receive but one. Others, on Sunday, with no ear for "A Song of Destiny," will miss the Haydn Variations. Except under emergency, an announced festival should "stay put."

reof a said ich illy his ve nd is 't le or s. s
-
-
n

AUSTRIAN PIANIST TO PLAY HERE SUNDAY

Mar 21

Arthur Schabel, Austrian pianist who arrived in Boston last night, completing his journey from Europe to take part in the Brahms festival, will rehearse with the Boston Symphony orchestra this morning and appear in the Festival performances Sunday. He will also play a group of solo pieces Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and take part in the piano quartet.

Schabel is regarded in Europe as one of the greatest living pianists, and one of the finest interpreters of Brahms's music. He played in Boston in 1923. He will also appear in the closing concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York next month.

Classic Pia
Attentio
This W

...uer, who will ap-
...of the Brahms Festival
...certs, is one of the best as well as one of the best known of living contraltos. Her recent resignation from the Metropolitan Opera, of which she has been for 19 years one of the principal singers, called forth many expressions of regret in New York. She has sung in Boston many times in concert and in opera with the former Boston Opera. Her most notable recent appearance here was as soloist with the Boston Symphony and Harvard Glee Club in the first American performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus" two years ago. On that occasion her singing, by common consent, quite outclassed that of the other soloists.

The Burgin String Quartet, composed of four prominent players from the Boston Symphony, is an organization constituted much as the old Kneisel Quartet originally was. Its public appearances here are infrequent. One wonders why in the absence of subscription series of chamber concerts here by first rate string quartets, now that the Flonzaley Quartet has disbanded, some manager does not persuade the Burgin Quartet to step into the vacant place.

Artur Schnabel has come from Germany to be the distinguished soloist at the Brahms Festival in Symphony Hall. The famous pianist was born in Galicia in 1882. Although he exhibited extraordinary talent as a child, he was never exploited as a prodigy. He joined the class of Leschitzky at nine, and graduated with honors at the age of 15. Schnabel's reputation in Europe is of the very highest and of many years standing. He has often been called the greatest interpreter of Brahms among living pianists. He is little known in America except by repute, having made but few appearances here. He was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, in March 30-31, 1923 when Bruno Walter was guest conductor.

Boston's Week of Brahms

By L. A. SLOPER

JOHANNES BRAHMS wrote no music for the theater. Perhaps the fact requires no elaborate explanation. It is difficult to imagine the irreproachable Brahms enriching the lyric stage with the charm of a Mozart, the fervor of a Wagner or the dramatic genius of a Verdi. Mr. Fuller Maitland surmises that Brahms realized at once the sterility of conservative stage music and his own incapacity to write in the style of Wagner. But need we be sad because Brahms paused before the frivolous portals of the theater? There is ample dramatic content in the music he did write. All he needs is a Koussevitzky, a Schnabel or a Matzenauer for interpreter. All these, and more, he had for the six-day festival of his music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course Dr. Koussevitzky, who never can be persuaded that things are well enough as they are, was primarily responsible. Having already directed celebrations for the centenaries of Beethoven and Schubert, he cast about for another composer to honor. There was no centenary of a master in 1930, but that did not deter the conductor. He admires Brahms, and excels as an interpreter of his music, just as Nikisch—as we are told—did. Sufficient reasons for a Brahms Festival. Thus large numbers of Bostonians have listened to a series which included the four symphonies, the two piano concertos, the "German Requiem," the "Song of Destiny," some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Piano Quintet, some songs and the piano pieces of op. 119.

Extraordinary Enthusiasm

As John N. Burk reminded us, in an admirably balanced pamphlet issued by the orchestra in preparation for the festival, Boston has been as slow as other capitals of music to embrace Brahms. His conclusion that "the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town" as at present, was justified by the response to these concerts. As one young person from the middle West remarked: "And they call Boston a cold town!" The enthusiasm at all the concerts was quite extraordinary, and on the final evening (March 26) there was an ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra which has hardly been duplicated during the six years of his Boston seneschalship, unless at the close of the Beethoven Festival. No one, surely, will begrudge the tribute to leader or men. The conductor, who never does anything half-heartedly, labored devotedly in preparation and performance, and the orchestra's work was quite up to its standard.

It was not to be expected that all the results would be equal in value. You can hardly give a Brahms Festival without including some of the chamber pieces. But Symphony Hall holds more than 2500 persons; scarcely the place for intimate music. No one should have been suprised, then, that the Piano Quintet, with Arthur Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet, was not the most successful item in the cycle. Heard in a small hall, this music has the power to stir admiration and emotion; in these vast reaches, the piano overwhelmed the strings and the finest effects were lost.

On the program with the quintet, however, the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of op. 119 came to entrancing utterance at the hands of Mr. Schnabel; who then, with a fine gesture of unselfed artistic devotion, became the unobtrusive accompanist for Margaret Matzenauer in four songs. His superb fellow-artist was heard to better advantage in "Von Ewige Liebe" and "Meine Liebe ist Grüne" than in the "Sapphische Ode" or the "Immer Leiser." Opening this program there was a charming performance of some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with their respective conductors. Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, at the piano.

The Collegiate Chorus

These young collegians, by the way, although their personnel changes annually, remain one of the most satisfying choral bodies of our experience. Trained to uncompromising ideals, they place their fresh voices and their inspiring fervor at the service of art. And when their part in the program is finished, they add immeasurably to the volume of applause for the more famous artists, constituting themselves, without in the least being aware of it, a volunteer claque in thralldom to music.

Mme. Matzenauer joined a group of the singers in a moving interpretation of the "Harzreise" Rhapsody. In the Requiem the choruses were augmented by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. They had the choral field to themselves in the "Song of Destiny."

Another acclaimed hero of the series was of course Mr. Schnabel, whose playing of the concertos for piano not only was authoritative but brought these works to pulsing life. Where, by the way, originated the tradition that the first of these concertos is finer exponent whose readings can hardly be challenged, we feel the superiority of the B flat major, pianistically and musically, to be evident.

The Symphonies

Finally the symphonies, played in this order: Nos. 3, 2, 4 and 1. Under this test the F major seemed clearly entitled to less and the D major to more consideration than is usually accorded. We shall not presume to sit as judge upon the merits of the other two. Nor shall we seize upon the occasion to pronounce a conclusive estimate of the music of Johannes Brahms, nor to forecast the effect of the six-day examination upon his reputation. Attention no doubt has been drawn by it to his learning. His romantic characteristics have been set forth in the most persuasive manner. In retrospect of the six days he seems more a romanticist than a classicist, closer to Beethoven and to Schumann than to Bach or Mozart. Further, from this fresh review, we are impressed less by his material than by his handling of it, and we find even in the handling more cerebration than inspiration. It seems to us, too, that there is wisdom in those who say that the Brahms of the songs, the piano pieces and the chamber ensembles is greater than he of the symphonies and of the bigger choral compositions. After so protracted a bout, we see Brahms as a big fellow who, not realizing his own strength, should not be allowed too heavy implements to play with.

Is it possible that Brahms, like Wagner, is doomed, after a struggle of long years for recognition, to fall back at last to a plane below that of the greatest masters? At all events, we render thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates for the opportunity to survey his work.

A Novelty From Harvard

After so busy a week, it was natural that the orchestra's program on March 28 should consist for the most part of pieces recently introduced—Haydn's Symphony in D (with the Horn Call), Sibelius's Sixth and the Bach-Schoenberg Prelude and the Fugue in E flat.

Yet there was a novelty, too; a Suite by Walter Piston, of the Harvard musical faculty, which received its first performance under the composer's baton. It consists of an Allegro, an Andante and a fugal Finale. The first movement, the composer had confided to the editor of the program notes, "contains some 'Americanisms' but is in no sense an attempt to write jazz." It is, however, jazzier than this statement would lead you to believe. In fact, it is one of the most successful experiments we recall in applying the jazz idiom to classical forms. A nostalgic Andante and a lively fugue complete the suite.

If this music does not open "new paths," it is well made, contains good writing for the instruments and is pleasant to listen to. It marks a advance upon Mr. Piston's "Symphonic Piece," heard two years ago. It is less obviously derivative; possesses a more individual flavor. Its composer obtained an excellent performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the orchestra played, the remainder of the program as if they had never heard of Brahms. All the items were well worth an early second hearing. The Sibelius in particular impressed us afresh with its vitality, its richness and its characteristic emotional quality. After hearing this concert if we do not love Brahms less, we certainly love Haydn, Sibelius and Bach more.

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony Concert

A First Day For Brahms Thrice Over

Dr. Koussevitzky Assembles The Middle Symphonies And an Overture

Mar 22 Trans,

IN the largest type upon the page of the program-book labelled the occasion "Opening Concert of the Brahms Festival"; but to the practised eye it resembled a Friday matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon which an "All-Brahms" program had descended. A glance around, before the concert began, noted the usual audience; others, while the concert was proceeding, its customary tranquil listening. Politely it hailed and farewelled Dr. Koussevitzky whenever he came to the stage or departed from it. Politely it clapped Brahms's kettle-drums, bass-drum and cymbals at the end of the "Academic Overture." His Symphony in F major passed without excitement; but at the close of the Second, which ended the concert, a gust of applause came quick and warm. Seemingly, few demurred to two Symphonies of Brahms in a single afternoon; while hardly more were impressed.

Plainly enough, an "All-Brahms" program does not alter the habitual detachment—in the auditorium—at these Friday matinées. No more, probably, would a whole Brahms Festival, were that same audience exposed to it. Perhaps the company this evening will warm more to a special occasion; but it will be just as well to date the festival from the concert of Sunday afternoon. Then begin the four days of Brahms, the Brahmsians, and his prophets at Symphony Hall assembled. And "we are all Brahmsians now"—except possibly that audience of Friday afternoon which prefers, with the best grace in the world, to remain its normal self.

The "Academic Festival Overture," as the full title runs, was obviously the proper opening piece. Brahms wrote but two concert-overtures, and neither by mood, matter, nor good report would the "Tragic Overture" have suited the occasion. Except the Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, no symphonic piece by the mature Brahms is less often played in America. Reasonably, the present Festival ignores it. Since two Symphonies were to follow, the sticklers for logic might have preferred, as natural introduction, the Variations upon a Theme by Haydn. They are altogether Brahmsian; time has not dimmed them; the learned say they are the source book of all four Symphonies. From a subsequent program Dr. Koussevitzky had also banished them. The more the regret, but there was only to listen to the Overture in which Brahms, after his manner, returns thanks for the doctorate from Breslau.

A few pages made plain that the conductor was sparing no pains. For a festival that justly stirs his ambition, he had restudied the "Academic Overture" and the two subsequent Symphonies, rehearsed them until the orchestra knew his every wish and was itself "on edge." A living Brahms might have lately handed him the three manuscripts for first performance. Dr. Koussevitzky plays every music as though for the time he believed in it and there were nothing else in the world. Give him a composer that [illegible] he excels in the joining of heat to light. Sensitively and faithfully he kept throughout the afternoon to the true Brahmsian orchestra with its subdued scale of tonal color, its open and running rather than massed voices, choir upon choir. As sensitively he caught the mood of Brahms with the student-songs from which he generates this Academic Overture.

It pleased the composer, self-deprecating and jocular, to call the piece a "potpourri" of such tunes, his jolly "thesis" in return for the doctorate. Actually it is only such in the sonorous tumult of the close—and there with stately rather than sportive accent. Elsewhere Brahms turns over these student-songs rather wistfully. At middle age he could look back at them as to symbols of vanished youth. As he looked, he both smiled and sighed—the melancholy that Dr. Koussevitzky draws from at least half the Overture. More than is native custom he also polishes it. For the most part, German conductors will have it hearty, homely, even heavy; make out a good case for such a "reading." Hereabouts these are the days of cosmopolitan Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky out of Russia and Paris plays him; so also does Mr. Toscanini of Milan and New York. What connoisseurs ask is a personal divination. Therefore an "Academic Overture" melancholy and with artifice.

At no haste when he sat at his writing table, Brahms put to paper compact symphonies. Two of them in an afternoon do not imply two hours of listening. The Third and the Second—to name them in the order in which they were played—make effective contrast; out of them sounds the symphonic Brahms when he is nearest to common humanity. The labellers, ever busy with a word and a paste-pot, will have this Third Symphony in F major Brahms's "Eroica." The first movement and, in degree, the finale, give them reason. The first lacks neither spaciousness nor strength nor Brahmsian passion. There are outflung phrases; motives in clamorous and striving ascent and descent. The mental and the musical energy of the whole is irresistable. As nearly as it was in him to be dramatic, Brahms writes a music of strenuous conflict; but always in that measure which is thought tempering emotion. Even the motto-motiv shall not shout too loud. It is token of inward and spiritual resistance.

After the first movement, these heroic accents are stilled. The slow movement strikes unmistakably the note of Brahms's autumnal song. The phrases soften; the rhythms are gentle; the progress musing; the coloring clear and pale. Out of strength is born sweetness; but into sentimentality, thanks to Brahms's mind, it never lapses. Continuing, the lyrical Brahms writes the succeeding Allegretto. Those that disliked man and music reproached him with a North-German, not to say Prussian, hardness. Now, he reminds them, he can write as tenderly and poignantly as Schumann. If the hearer wishes, find again in the finale the strenuous, striving, quasi-dramatic Brahms, calling back that heroic motto-motiv. Before the end, however, the autumnal mood again prevails. Restlessness stills into calm; the sombre coloring warms into golden glow. These are the days of a songful Brahms. Through the second and the third movements Dr. Koussevitzky intensified the lyrical mood; through the first and the finale released the latent passion. But, true Brahmsian, he kept the song clear of sensuous note; preferred, with the passion, an inner energy; for coloring deepened the shadows beneath the high lights. For him Brahms writes an introspective symphony.

For the labellers, the Second Symphony in D major is Brahms's "Pastoral." For the conductor, it was rather a music that should charm by freshness and animation, yet not quite escape the Brahmsian contemplation, the Brahmsian melancholy. Quick-coming invention must have sped it. None of Brahms's larger works is so free from the moments in which calculation rather than impulse chooses the notes. None exhibits so seldom the turns of expression, the tricks of manner, inseparable from those who write much and in a characteristic idiom. The first movement is the lyrical Brahms, fertile in melody, lively in rhythm, ready with expedient, warm of mood. The spacing is open, the coloring bright, the movement flexible—a music of cheerful ease. The slow division begins and melancholy creeps in—not the carking melancholy of the Russian and other intensive temperaments; but the pensive mood, proper to an idyllic Symphony. It is like the misty lights, the sunshine out of cloud, over Brahms's native plain.

The scherzo—for Brahms—touches gayety. Twice over he must have the quicker measures; for before and between them the oboe is still piping a pensive note. Brahms was at his middle forties when he wrote this Second Symphony and the autumnal mood was already upon him. The finale outpaces it; brushes it away. The idyll shines clear again. Brahms knew and loved Italian skies and airs. There are Mediterranian warmths in this Second Symphony. Not for long may melancholy Northern mists overcloud them. The detractors will doubtless have it that Dr. Koussevitzky tries to "dramatize" a music in which there is no tonal drama. More truly, he would set clear and keep bright, or pensive, each songful mood; open out the lyric flow; make each fine sonority sound or suggest. The orchestral tone was glamorous; as in the Third Symphony, it glossed the measures that say nothing and darken progress. . . . There was no dramatist in Brahms; but out of this Second Symphony speaks a tone-poet.

H. T. P.

BRAHMS WEEK BEGINS AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH Mar 22

THE current pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitutes the beginning of the Brahms Festival. Brahms was born in 1833 and died in 1897. So far as we know there is no special occasion for this festival. It was simply Koussevitzky's own idea.

And a good idea, too. Brahm's music, far from repelling the present generation as it did the preceding one — they thought it "unmelodic"—occupies the position of a best-seller. An all-one-composer program, to say nothing of a festival, is risky for the general concert-going public. Aside from Brahms, perhaps only Beethoven, Wagner and Chopin can stand the test.

Listening to the present program, consisting of the "Academic" Overture and the Second and Third Symphonies, we were not conscious of that fearful spectre—monotony. So far as we could observe, the audience was having a perfectly splendid time. True, the music of Brahms is characteristic, it has earmarks, it displays idiosyncrasies. But so it is true of any music or art worth its weight in salt.

You hear a Brahms theme and pare perhaps "reminded" of a similar theme in another work of his. It is not idle repetition; but an opportunity has arisen for saying the same or similar thing in a new context. And there is no talking for effect; the speech is germane to the discussion, to continue the metaphor. Music is here genuinely a language.

The greatness of these works is now generally acknowledged. This is well, for it would be foolhardy to attempt to discuss their merits in a few paragraphs. It is interesting to note, however, the freshness which these essentially romantic—as well as classic—works have for the jazz-ridden, speed-worshipping, and sophisticated audience of 1930.

The performance in each case, at yesterday's concert, attested to the enthusiasm and care of Mr. Koussevitzky and to the virtosity of the orchestra. Of course there is ground for difference of opinion—not mere quibbling, either—as to his choice of tempt and dynamics. But the spirit, the romantic glow, the apparently effervescent spontaneity are present. Those are the things that count.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

105

Post. March 22

SATURDAY MORNING

SYMPHONY IN BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Opens Series With His Second and Third

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall has begun. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as he will again this evening, Dr. Koussevitzky offered that composer's Second and Third Symphonies, with the Academic Festival Overture for cheerful and sonorous preface. On Sunday afternoon and the evenings of the three succeeding days will follow four more concerts, presenting music for chorus, for orchestra, for piano with orchestra, and music in the smaller forms.

THE FESTIVAL IDEA

In this country, although not in those of Europe, one-composer festivals are generally of a commemorative nature. But since Brahms was born 97 years ago and has been dead but 33, there is no hundredth or other convenient anniversary to be celebrated at this time. Rather the current festival represents an intention on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky to carry to our shores a European custom, for festivals devoted to various and sundry composers are of common occurrence on the continent, and also to indulge to the full his own fondness for the music of Brahms.

The history of Brahms in Boston is one of gradual change from indifference and hostility to genuine popularity, and from the standpoint of the box-office the Brahms Festival bids fair to be a complete success. Granted that in the natural course of events the music of Brahms was due to become popular here, as it has become popular elsewhere, it cannot be gainsaid that Dr. Koussevitzky, by his ardently romantic interpretations of the symphonies, the concertos, the shorter orchestral pieces and the "German Requiem," has won many converts to the music of Brahms.

Audience Responsive

To the one-composer festival there is commonly one of two reactions on the part of the listener. In one hearer there will be inspired an attitude of reverence; another will put himself upon the defensive, become hyper-critical and even antagonistic. A is blind to any defects in the music; B begins to search for them and to decide that the popular idol has, after all, feet of clay. But the temper of yesterday's audience as a whole was one of steadily waxing enthusiasm.

There was abundant applause for the overture, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gives a highly individual reading, more for the Third Symphony, and most of all for the Second, wisely placed at the conclusion of the concert, since it finishes in a blaze of glory while its successor ends in calm and quiet.

Stresses Lyrical Side

Festival or no festival, an entire programme devoted to the music of one composer is seldom of flattering effect. And Brahms' range was not unlimited; his well-marked mannerisms and tricks of style become more than ever noticeable when, as was the case yesterday, his music is heard continuously for close on two hours. Moreover, Dr. Kousesevitzky, by his very ardor with this music, his inclination to stress its lyrical side, to sing all of its melodies con passione, emphasized yesterday the similarities of the two symphonies rather than their differences.

The First and Fourth Symphonies, both greater, more robust works than the Second and Third, are happily separated in the concert to come.

WON'T CUT PRICES OF COAL VERY EARLY

BRAHMS PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Festival Performances of His Music Begun

Second and Third Symphonies and "Academic Festival" Overture

Globe Mar 22

The program of this week's Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday subscription series marks the beginning of the Brahms Festival, the outstanding event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 49th season. Four extra concerts, beginning tomorrow, will complete this festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers applauded the "Academic Festival" overture, the Third Symphony, and the Second Symphony, which the Saturday audience will hear this evening.

The Beethoven Festival in 1927 marked the centenary of the composer's death. The Brahms Festival does not commemorate any anniversary. It signalizes Dr Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for the composer's music. The fact that the Beethoven Festival three years ago reduced the season's deficit by more than $20,000 supplies a practical justification for the present enterprise. Its receipts will be so much clear gain for the orchestra's finances.

But the artistic worth of such a series of performances as we are to enjoy during the Brahms Festival is so great that there is no need to dwell upon these money matters. If the audiences are as numerous and as enthusiastic as seems probable, one hopes the success of the present venture will encourage Dr Koussevitzky and the trustees to offer Boston some such unusual treat every year henceforth.

Detractors of Brahms, of whom there are still many among musicians the world over, like to emphasize the ponderous and priggish quality of his music. They would have it that he was a pedantic and clumsy composer, ultra serious, with no gaiety of heart, no sprightliness of mood. The "Academic Festival" overture, written, to be sure, in gratitude for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy awarded him "honoris causa" by the University of Breslau, is indisputably free from priggishness and pedantry. The composer himself called it "a very jolly potpourri on student songs, a la Suppe." This description is perfectly accurate.

German student songs have, as a rule, better tunes than American college songs, but the words are no more sedate or sober than those sung by undergraduates at Harvard or Yale. If Brahms had really been a pedant, he would have sent the Breslau University a double fugue, or an interminable set of variations, on themes of the utmost musical propriety and dullness, free from ribald connotations.

Yesterday's spirited performance, in which Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best, won delighted applause from the audience. This overture, though slighter in substance than the great "Tragic Overture," published with it, and unfortunately omitted from the programs of the present festival, is of its kind an indubitable masterpiece.

Of the two symphonies heard yesterday, one greatly prefers the Second to the Third. This D major Symphony is almost as full of graceful and freely flowing melody as are those of Mozart. For once Brahms escapes the shadow of Beethoven, reflections of whose tremendous figure obscure and constrict so much of his work. For once the thing one notices first in a symphony by Brahms is the originality and beauty of its melody and rhythm rather than the solidity of its musical structure.

The Third Symphony, in F major, is, on the other hand, the least satisfying of the four Brahms wrote. It is a piece of musical architecture carefully built on a grand scale of materials too often poor and barren The scoring for orchestra is thick and muddy. The characteristic mannerisms of the composer obtrude themselves in almost every measure.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did well in the Second Symphony. His romantic and intense interpretation, stressing the dramatic element in the piece at the expense of its lyricism, does not, however, efface from memory the marvelous interpretation Dr Muck used to give, or the beautifully wrought version Mr Toscanini offered a Boston audience in 1921.

The Third Symphony was, relatively speaking, badly played yesterday. Attacks lacked precision other details were muddled, but one might have overlooked these defects had Dr Koussevitzky not so utterly misconceived the style of the music. It is no use trying to make a Tchaikovsky out of Brahms.

Next week's Symphony concerts will bring repetitions of Haydn's "Horn Call" Symphony, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and Schoenberg's arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, also the first performance of a new suite by Walter Piston, now instructor in music at Harvard.

P. R.

30

MUSIC

Herald Mar 22

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Academic Festival overture; Symphony, F major, No. 3; Symphony, D major, No. 2. The audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert.

One had supposed that Brahms knew what he was about when he described his overture, the Academic Festival, as "a very jolly potpourri on students' songs" music written in the manner of Franz Suppe, of "Fatinitza" fame. Brahms was to receive a degree from the University of Breslau and it was natural that he chose student songs for themes. It was also natural that he should describe the work as a "jolly" potpourri. But we are now told that he spoke "flippantly;" that there is a vein of sadness in the music; that the lively chatter at the beginning is really gloomy comment on the fleeting joys of university life. Why should Brahms have thus been a "Dismal Jemmy"? Because he had not enjoyed what are called the advantages of a collegiate education? Because the degree would put him in a class with some no doubt estimable persons who had written respectably dull music?

No. One likes to think that Brahms meant exactly what he said; that he wrote a jolly potpourri for a joyous occasion.

Surely this light-hearted work should be played in a light-hearted manner as students would sing the tunes. The music does not admit of dramatization for the interpretation. Nor does it admit of an infinite number of nuances: of changes in tempi other than those indicated. In this music eloquence is out of place. Whatever may be said against Brahms he was never bombastic.

It is the tendency in these days to find pessimism in works of Brahms that to Philistines, enjoying them, are conspicuous for serenity, sunshine and courage. There are works of his that are charged with a sadness akin to despair; a melancholy that is black with the blackness of darkness. He was often obsessed by the thought of death. So was Tchaikovsky. If Tchaikovsky groaned lustily, shrieked, as a strong man in agony, Brahms would often whine. It is as if he had said with Brachiano in John Webster's tragedy:

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me: it is a word infinitely terrible."

But how can recent biographers find the symphony in D major a work of epic grandeur? It has hitherto been regarded as agreeable in the Mendelssohnian manner, tuneful, with a piquant Scherzo, and a reassuring Finale, music that is free from storm, stress and passion; music that almost as a quotation pays a graceful compliment to Mendelssohn in flowing measures, as there is a tribute to Wagner in the first movement of the Third Symphony, a glimpse of Venus and her voluptuous train, refreshing after the crashing, defiant opening measures.

There is also a wide-spread tendency in performing the orchestral music of Brahms to make it more dramatic than the contents suggest. This comes from the wish to avoid the academic, respectful, perfunctory, one might say portance given to episodes so that there is no continuous musical flow. The latter course appeals to the great majority. The music is, then, exciting: the dynamic contrasts hold the attention; the composer in the minds of the hearers is glorified; they might exclaim: "Is this Brahms? Who would have thought the old man to have so much blood in him?"

After all, whatever the purist may say, it is better to be pleasurably excited at a concert than to be lulled to sleep. In all probability the magnificent performance by the orchestra and the roaring applause of the audience would have delighted Johannes, for he was mortal, and all mortals like appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (with the horn call); Piston, Suite for orchestra (first performance); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat major, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

The second concert of the Brahms festival will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall. Song of Destiny. Piano Concerto, B-flat, No. 2 (Arthur Schnabel, pianist); Symphony, E-minor, No. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.

SUN

BrahmsMusic Festival

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents A Comprehensive Survey Of Composer's Works

AMONG the important music festivals arranged for this spring is the Brahms Festival now under way at Symphony Hall, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The celebration began last Friday and will continue until Wednesday. Dr. Koussevitzky has assumed a leading role in the presenting of music on a large scale.

The programs will include a comprehensive survey of the Brahms music literature, with emphasis on the choral works. All four of the composer's symphonies will be performed. The Concerto No. 2 in B Flat, given

H 23, 1930 Mar

Brahms Festival Features Week In Boston Music

Tribune NY

Koussevitzky Offers Major Works; Artur Schnabel, Mme. Matzenauer Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, is holding a Brahms festival at Symphony Hall, which began last Friday and Saturday in the orchestra's regular subscription with a program of the Academic Festival Overture and the third and second symphonies.

The first special festival concert takes place this afternoon with a program including Haydn variations, the B flat piano concerto and the fourth symphony. Artur Schnabel will be the soloist.

Tomorrow evening's program is choral, with the "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied), Op. 54, and the German Requiem, sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses. The soloists in the Requiem will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. On Tuesday evening the Liebeslieder Waltzes will be sung by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, with Dr. A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth at the pianos. Mr. Schnabel will play the Intermezzi in B minor, E minor and C major and the E flat rhapsody. Mme. Matzenauer will sing "Sapphische Ode," "Von ewiger Liebe," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Meine Liebe ist grün," and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin Quartet will play the F minor piano quintet, Op. 34a

The closing festival concert will be Wednesday evening, when the Harvard Glee Club and orchestra will take part in the rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist; Mr. Schnabel will play the D minor piano concerto, and the final number will be the first symphony.

Notes in the announcing pamphlet compare the present popularity of Brahms with the somewhat hostile reception his music received in Boston in the late '70s and early '80s. But conductors were indefatigable, nevertheless. Carl Zerrahn and the Harvard Musical Society introduced the first two symphonies to Boston in 1878 and 1879. The Boston Symphony, under George (now Sir George) Henschel, gave the first two symphonies, the "Tragic" Overture and Alto Rhaapsody in its first season. Wilhelm Gericke introduced the third to Boston in 1884. He planned the American premiere of the fourth for November 29, 1886, but, not satisfied with the performance at the public rehearsal, postponed the formal concert premiere to December 23. During the interval, Leopold Damrosch and the Symphony Society had played it in New York.

By 1885 the "Transcript" critic noted that Brahms was gaining with the Boston public, although many still walked out from his symphonies, and the Nikisch regime of 1889-'93 made Boston known as a Brahms center.

105

Post. March 22
SATURDAY MORNING

SYMPHONY IN BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Opens Series With His Second and Third

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall has begun. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as he will again this evening, Dr. Koussevitzky offered that composer's Second and Third Symphonies, with the Academic Festival Overture for cheerful and sonorous preface. On Sunday afternoon and the evenings of the three succeeding days will follow four more concerts, presenting music for chorus, for orchestra, for piano with orchestra, and music in the smaller forms.

THE FESTIVAL IDEA

In this country, although not in those of Europe, one-composer festivals are generally of a commemorative nature. But since Brahms was born 97 years ago and has been dead but 33, there is no hundredth or other convenient anniversary to be celebrated at this time. Rather the current festival represents an intention on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky to carry to our shores a European custom, for festivals devoted to various and sundry composers are of common occurrence on the continent, and also to indulge to the full his own fondness for the music of Brahms.

The history of Brahms in Boston is one of gradual change from indifference and hostility to genuine popularity, and from the standpoint of the box-office the Brahms Festival bids fair to be a complete success. Granted that in the natural course of events the music of Brahms was due to become popular here, as it has become popular elsewhere, it cannot be gainsaid that Dr. Koussevitzky, by his ardently romantic interpretations of the symphonies, the concertos, the shorter orchestral pieces and the "German Requiem," has won many converts to the music of Brahms.

Audience Responsive

To the one-composer festival there is commonly one of two reactions on the part of the listener. In one hearer there will be inspired an attitude of reverence; another will put himself upon the defensive, become hyper-critical and even antagonistic. A is blind to any defects in the music; B begins to search for them and to decide that the popular idol has, after all, feet of clay. But the temper of yesterday's audience as a whole was one of steadily waxing enthusiasm.

There was abundant applause for the overture, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gives a highly individual reading, more for the Third Symphony, and most of all for the Second, wisely placed at the conclusion of the concert, since it finishes in a blaze of glory while its successor ends in calm and quiet.

Stresses Lyrical Side

Festival or no festival, an entire programme devoted to the music of one composer is seldom of flattering effect. And Brahms' range was not unlimited; his well-marked mannerisms and tricks of style become more than ever noticeable when, as was the case yesterday, his music is heard continuously for close on two hours. Moreover, Dr. Kousesevitzky, by his very ardor with this music, his inclination to stress its lyrical side, to sing all of its melodies con passione, emphasized yesterday the similarities of the two symphonies rather than their differences.

The First and Fourth Symphonies, both greater, more robust works than the Second and Third, are happily separated in the concert to come.

WON'T CUT PRICES OF COAL VERY EARLY

BRAHMS PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Festival Performances of His Music Begun

Second and Third Symphonies and "Academic Festival" Overture

Globe March 22

The program of this week's Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday subscription series marks the beginning of the Brahms Festival, the outstanding event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 49th season. Four extra concerts, beginning tomorrow, will complete this festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers applauded the "Academic Festival" overture, the Third Symphony, and the Second Symphony, which the Saturday audience will hear this evening.

The Beethoven Festival in 1927 marked the centenary of the composer's death. The Brahms Festival does not commemorate any anniversary. It signalizes Dr Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for the composer's music. The fact that the Beethoven Festival three years ago reduced the season's deficit by more than $20,000 supplies a practical justification for the present enterprise. Its receipts will be so much clear gain for the orchestra's finances.

But the artistic worth of such a series of performances as we are to enjoy during the Brahms Festival is so great that there is no need to dwell upon these money matters. If the audiences are as numerous and as enthusiastic as seems probable, one hopes the success of the present venture will encourage Dr Koussevitzky and the trustees to offer Boston some such unusual treat every year henceforth.

Detractors of Brahms, of whom there still many among musicians the world over, like to emphasize the ponderous and priggish quality of his music. They would have it that he was a pedantic and clumsy composer, ultra serious, with no gaiety of heart, no sprightliness of mood. The "Academic Festival" overture, written, to be sure, in gratitude for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy awarded him "honoris causa" by the University of Breslau, is indisputably free from priggishness and pedantry. The composer himself called it "a very jolly potpourri on student songs, a la Suppe." This description is perfectly accurate.

German student songs have, as a rule, better tunes than American college songs, but the words are no more sedate or sober than those sung by undergraduates at Harvard or Yale. If Brahms had really been a pedant, he would have sent the Breslau University a double fugue, or an interminable set of variations, on themes of the utmost musical propriety and dullness, free from ribald connotations.

Yesterday's spirited performance, in which Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best, won delighted applause from the audience. This overture, though slighter in substance than the great "Tragic Overture," published with it, and unfortunately omitted from the programs of the present festival, is of its kind an indubitable masterpiece.

Of the two symphonies heard yesterday, one greatly prefers the Second to the Third. This D major Symphony is almost as full of graceful and freely flowing melody as are those of Mozart. For once Brahms escapes the shadow of Beethoven, reflections of whose tremendous figure obscure and constrict so much of his work. For once the thing one notices first in a symphony by Brahms is the originality and beauty of its melody and rhythm rather than the solidity of its musical structure.

The Third Symphony, in F major, is, on the other hand, the least satisfying of the four Brahms wrote. It is a piece of musical architecture carefully built on a grand scale of materials too often poor and barren The scoring for orchestra is thick and muddy. The characteristic mannerisms of the composer obtrude themselves in almost every measure.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did well in the Second Symphony. His romantic and intense interpretation, stressing the dramatic element in the piece at the expense of its lyricism, does not, however, efface from memory the marvelous interpretation Dr Muck used to give, or the beautifully wrought version Mr Toscanini offered a Boston audience in 1921.

The Third Symphony was, relatively speaking, badly played yesterday. Attacks lacked precision other details were muddled, but one might have overlooked these defects had Dr Koussevitzky not so utterly misconceived the style of the music. It is no use trying to make a Tchaikovsky out of Brahms.

Next week's Symphony concerts will bring repetitions of Haydn's "Horn Call" Symphony, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and Schoenberg's arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, also the first performance of a new suite by Walter Piston, now instructor in music at Harvard.

P. R.

30

MUSIC

Herald March 22

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Academic Festival overture; Symphony, F major, No. 3; Symphony, D major, No. 2. The audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert.

One had supposed that Brahms knew what he was about when he described his overture, the Academic Festival, as "a very jolly potpourri on students' songs" music written in the manner of Franz Suppe, of "Fatinitza" fame. Brahms was to receive a degree from the University of Breslau and it was natural that he chose student songs for themes. It was also natural that he should describe the work as a "jolly" potpourri. But we are now told that he spoke "flippantly;" that there is a vein of sadness in the music; that the lively chatter at the beginning is really gloomy comment on the fleeting joys of university life. Why should Brahms have thus been a "Dismal Jemmy"? Because he had not enjoyed what are called the advantages of a collegiate education? Because the degree would put him in a class with some no doubt estimable persons who had written respectably dull music?

No. One likes to think that Brahms meant exactly what he said; that he wrote a jolly potpourri for a joyous occasion.

Surely this light-hearted work should be played in a light-hearted manner as students would sing the tunes. The music does not admit of dramatization for the interpretation. Nor does it admit of an infinite number of nuances; of changes in tempi other than those indicated. In this music eloquence is out of place. Whatever may be said against Brahms he was never bombastic.

It is the tendency in these days to find pessimism in works of Brahms that to Philistines, enjoying them, are conspicuous for serenity, sunshine and courage. There are works of his that are charged with a sadness akin to despair; a melancholy that is black with the blackness of darkness. He was often obsessed by the thought of death. So was Tchaikovsky. If Tchaikovsky groaned lustily, shrieked, as a strong man in agony, Brahms would often whine. It is as if he had said with Brachiano in John Webster's tragedy:

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me: it is a word infinitely terrible."

But how can recent biographers find the symphony in D major a work of epic grandeur? It has hitherto been regarded as agreeable in the Mendelssohnian manner, tuneful, with a piquant Scherzo, and a reassuring Finale, music that is free from storm, stress and passion; music that almost as a quotation pays a graceful compliment to Mendelssohn in flowing measures, as there is a tribute to Wagner in the first movement of the Third Symphony, a glimpse of Venus and her voluptuous train, refreshing after the crashing, defiant opening measures.

There is also a wide-spread tendency in performing the orchestral music of Brahms to make it more dramatic than the contents suggest. This comes from the wish to avoid the academic, respectful, perfunctory, one might say obsequious readings that in times past led many to find the symphonies too sober, it not dull. If jog-trot interpreters thought to reveal "the spirit of Brahms"—meaningless phrase to apply to any composer, but one that sounds well and impresses some—contemporary interpreters are often tempted to treat Brahms as if he were possessed with a demon; as if he were a daring innovation, with fire, not celestial ichor in his veins. Or in order to make the music more intense, there is undue importance given to episodes so that there is no continuous musical flow. The latter course appeals to the great majority. The music is, then, exciting; the dynamic contrasts hold the attention; the composer in the minds of the hearers is glorified; they might exclaim: "Is this Brahms? Who would have thought the old man to have so much blood in him?"

After all, whatever the purist may say, it is better to be pleasurably excited at a concert than to be lulled to sleep. In all probability the magnificent performance by the orchestra and the roaring applause of the audience would have delighted Johannes, for he was mortal, and all mortals like appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (with the horn call); Piston, Suite for orchestra (first performance); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat major, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

The second concert of the Brahms festival will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall. Song of Destiny, Piano Concerto, B-flat, No. 2 (Arthur Schnabel, pianist); Symphony, E-minor, No. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

H 23, 1930 Mail

Brahms Festival Features Week In Boston Music

Journal NY

Koussevitzky Offers Major Works; Artur Schnabel, Mme. Matzenauer Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, is holding a Brahms festival at Symphony Hall, which began last Friday and Saturday in the orchestra's regular subscription with a program of the Academic Festival Overture and the third and second symphonies.

The first special festival concert takes place this afternoon with a program including Haydn variations, the B flat piano concerto and the fourth symphony. Artur Schnabel will be the soloist.

Tomorrow evening's program is choral, with the "Song of Destiny" (Schicksalslied), Op. 54, and the German Requiem, sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses. The soloists in the Requiem will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. On Tuesday evening the Liebeslieder Waltzes will be sung by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, with Dr. A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth at the pianos. Mr. Schnabel will play the Intermezzi in B minor, E minor and C major and the E flat rhapsody. Mme. Matzenauer will sing "Sapphische Ode," "Von ewiger Liebe," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Meine Liebe ist grün," and Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin Quartet will play the F minor piano quintet, Op. 34a

The closing festival concert will be Wednesday evening, when the Harvard Glee Club and orchestra will take part in the rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist; Mr. Schnabel will play the D minor piano concerto, and the final number will be the first symphony.

Notes in the announcing pamphlet compare the present popularity of Brahms with the somewhat hostile reception his music received in Boston in the late '70s and early '80s. But conductors were indefatigable, nevertheless. Carl Zerrahn and the Harvard Musical Society introduced the first two symphonies to Boston in 1878 and 1879. The Boston Symphony, under George (now Sir George) Henschel, gave the first two symphonies, the "Tragic" Overture and Alto Rhapsody in its first season. Wilhelm Gericke introduced the third to Boston in 1884. He planned the American premiere of the fourth for November 29, 1885, but, not satisfied with the performance at the public rehearsal, postponed the formal concert premiere to December 23. During the interval, Leopold Damrosch and the Symphony Society had played it in New York.

By 1885 the "Transcript" critic noted that Brahms was gaining with the Boston public, although many still walked out from his symphonies, and the Nikisch regime of 1889-93 made Boston known as a Brahms-

Symphony Hall, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The celebration began last Friday and will continue until Wednesday. Dr. Koussevitzky has assumed a leading role in the presenting of music on a large scale.

The programs will include a comprehensive survey of the Brahms music literature, with emphasis on the choral works. All four of the composer's symphonies will be performed. The Concerto No. 2 in B Flat, given

BRAHMS, STARKIE AND NEWMAN

Herald Mar 22

Mr. John N. Burk in his interesting pamphlet published by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the Brahms Festival, which began last Friday afternoon and will end next Wednesday night, devotes two pages to the early years of Brahms in Boston. These pages are not only entertaining, they should lead the ultra-conservatives who are "agin" all contemporary symphonic music the idiom of which is not thrice familiar, to sit up and consider the error of their ways.

When Carl Zerrahn, conducting the Harvard Musical Society, brought out early in 1878 Brahms's First Symphony, the work was called "morbid, strained, unnatural, ugly." Even Mr. Apthorp, who later became a warm admirer of Brahms, and wrote in glowing terms about the Finale of the symphony, found the work in 1878 "on the whole a disappointment," but Zerrahn, nothing daunted, gave the symphony again in the same month. Producing the Second Symphony a year later, he again met with opposition. John S. Dwight, whose musical opinions then had weight in certain quarters, made the astonishing statement that Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

When Henschel began to learn the trade of conducting, having been appointed the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, the public, to quote Mr. Burk, "realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful 'modern'—(the word seems to have borne the same dread implications which it has for many today towards composers correspondingly advanced)." Henschel put the "Tragic" overture and the Alto Rhapsody on his programs, also the two symphonies, and heeded not the indignant letters in the newspapers.

When Gericke brought out the Third Symphony, it was remarked in print that "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." According to another newspaper, the Variations on a theme by Haydn were "twenty minutes wasted."

On one occasion when Gericke gave a performance of the Second Symphony, a newspaper reported that "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." In November, 1885, the Evening Transcript (Mr. Apthorp?) reporting that many had walked out during a performance of the First Symphony, said: "In one way or another Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours."

It should be remembered that the attitude of European, even German and Austrian critics and public, was no more friendly during the earlier years of Brahms's symphonic works. Hanslick, as a rule a blind and fanatical admirer of the composer, more than once shook his head and hummed and hawed in his reviews. Nietzsche declared that Brahms wrote for Viennese elderly ladies with suppressed desires, while a Frenchman the Sar Peladan likened the music of Brahms to Hungarian gypsy women dancing in tight-fitting corsets.

Some one in Boston suggested that in the old Music Hall there should be a red light with a sign, "This way in case of Brahms." Edward MacDowell taught his dog to drop dead at the mention of Brahms's name.

For many were irritated by the unmusical suddenly taking it into their heads to speak enthusiastically of this music, though some of them were in doubt as to whether the name was Brahm or Brahms—regarding the "s" as an apostrophe.

Little by little the Boston public became more tolerant, more accustomed, more, one might say, acclimatized. Not that fair ladies now swoon at the mere mention of the composer's name; but it is considered to be the thing, quite the Stilton, to speak knowingly about his music, dismissing other names with "Yes, perhaps—but Brahms, ah, Brahms."

The present widespread interest in the music of Brahms that has led to this festival is largely if not wholly due to Dr. Koussevitzky, the first of the conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra who has humanized the music of Brahms, made it vital, dramatic, poetic, and not emphasized, from a belief in its plenary inspiration, the weaknesses, the padding, the treading-water occasionally found in the symphonic works. What is more, Dr. Koussevitzky does not arrogantly claim, as some, to be a "specialist in Brahms," only to be a conductor who realizes the strength and melancholy beauty that the austerity of expression would often conceal.

SINGERS, PIANO AND ORCHESTRA

Schnabel Outstanding Artist at Brahms Festival

Postman Mar 24

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Officially, the Brahms Festival, now occupying the attention of musical Bostonians, began with the Symphony concerts of last week, at which Dr. Koussevitzky offered an all-Brahms programme. So far as the general public and the true festival spirit is concerned, these rites had their commencement yesterday, when, at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and Arthur Schnabel, pianist, presented the "Song of Destiny," the Second Pianoforte Concerto and the Fourth Symphony.

LIST CHANGED FOR BETTER

The change in yesterday's programme which substituted the "Song of Destiny" for the originally announced orchestral Variations on a Theme by Haydn was a fortunate one, the three media: chorus and orchestra, piano and orchestra and orchestra alone, offsetting the monotony that might arise—and on Friday did arise—in an entire concert devoted to the music of one composer. Yesterday's concert was full long, but few indeed must have been the members of the large and exceedingly enthusiastic audience who found a single moment of it dull, a circumstance for which the performances as well as the pieces performed were responsible.

The "Song of Destiny," to discuss the music in the order in which it was played or sung, is one of Brahms' finest compositions, although its finest pages are not those in which the chorus is used but the serene opening and the postlude in which this initial mood is renewed and prolonged. Here Brahms sounded a note of other-worldly serenity that has seldom enough been sounded in music with such felicity. The only parallel instances which come readily to mind are the final movement of Beethoven's last piano sonata and the closing pages of Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

Schnabel a Brahms Master

The participation in this Festival of Mr. Schnabel, who came to this country especially for that purpose, had caused a deal of anticipatory interest. Since his appearance at a pair of Symphony Concerts here seven years ago Mr. Schnabel's European fame has waxed and there are many who do not hesitate to call him the greatest living master of his instrument. In the music of Brahms, too, Mr. Schnabel has been known as something of a specialist. Thus was his performance yesterday of the B-flat major Concerto eagerly awaited, nor did the result occasion disappointment.

To call Mr. Schnabel's performance masterly is to understand the case. Mere technique was subordinated in his playing to the demands of musicianship and interpretation, yet the remarkable nature of Mr. Schnabel's technical equipment could be noted. But what chiefly impressed the listener was the loftiness joined to fervor in the pianist's conception of the music, the greatness of soul as well as the clarity of vision that marked his interpretation. Deservedly was Mr. Schnabel applauded to the echo. There were many who stamped their feet as well as clapped their hands, and the recalls were many.

The Great Fourth

Finally there came the Symphony that disputes with the first the title of the greatest of Brahms' four. Yesterday it seemed to hold that proud place without serious rivalry, so eloquent in both the larger and the lesser details was the performance of it.

From a conductor and orchestra clearly lifted above themselves came this music yesterday, every measure, so it seemed, glowing with the flame of inspiration.

SPEED TEST IS

106

Symphony Festival Enshrines Brahms Among Immortals

Adv Mar 1[illegible]

By Morris Hastings

BRAHMS' day is come at last. The most conclusive sign is at Symphony Hall where the Brahms Festival is now in full swing.

As he is so firmly ensconced on his lofty throne, it is diverting to look back into those years when Brahms' music was little understood. It takes no great amount of delving to detect musicians, even, who regarded his orchestral scores as austere mountains, admirably proportioned but quite unapproachable. The great public shied away from his symphonies, treating them as they would a learned, but heartlessly boring discourse by Prof. Dry-as-Dust.

* * *

JAMES HUNEKER, discerning critic though he was, spoke of the tremendous remoteness of Brahms' compositions for orchestra. "Yet," he continued, "how intimate, how full of charm, of graciousness, are his lyrics!" And, to give the public its due, it has always held the German composer as a master of song. The lyric is ever more comprehensible than the symphonic form.

* * *

VOYAGERS to the country of Brahms' songs find it a serene, twilight land. It is peopled with romantic knights. There are sorrowful maidens who wander through darkling forests as they weep over the faithlessness of their beloved ones. Country lasses naively tell of the strength of their sweethearts. Occasionally the melancholy song of a nightingale pierces the heart of a sadly pensive human. Ivied walls, stern castles, deep pools, purling streams add to the grave beauty of this countryside.

* * *

THE question might well arise as to how the composer of these tender and noble songs fashioned them. A friend of Brahms, aware that the musician took Schubert as his model, inquired if the songs flowed as easily from Brahms' pen as they did from Schubert's. Brahms hastily answered: "I have the deuce of a time with them! When I think I have hold of a perfect idea, I take a walk in the woods. And inevitably, I find that it was but the extremely imperfect seed of a fine idea."

* * *

IT was the answer to be expected from a man endowed with such unflinching devotion to art and with such searching self-criticism. We know that when he was impressed with a poem—and if was a worthy one every time—he first probed the depths of the poet's thought. Then, the melody carefully conceived, he calmly and unerringly blended the poetry and the music into one perfect whole. The musical accent had to agree with the metrical accent of the verse; the music could not drown the beauties of the word, and the accompaniment and melody had to maintain and enhance the atmosphere created by the poet.

* * *

SO these lovely songs serve as an excellent introduction to the work of the composer whose greatness so many recitalists are celebrating nowadays. The better we know these lyrics the more prepared we are to understand his more gigantic utterances. And with an understanding of these latter there comes the realization that he was as profound a Titan as ever set pen to paper.

Herald Mar 24

MUSIC

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall. The amended program contained the Song of Destiny (Schicksalslied), op. 54, for chorus and orchestra; the 2d pianoforte concerto, op. 83, in B flat major, and the 4th symphony, op. 98, in E minor. Arthur Schnabel, the eminent pianist who has not been heard here since 1923, appeared as soloist in the concerto; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society joined forces with the orchestra in the Song of Destiny.

The highwater mark of an afternoon which gave evident pleasure throughout to a numerous and vigorous plauditory audience was Mr. Schnabel's magnificently virile and intelligent performance of the concerto. The great length of this work, the number of its movements, and the relative subordination of the exceedingly difficult piano part, have caused it to be called "a symphony with piano obbligato." It has also been remarked that the strenuousness of its piano part is out of all proportion to the result achieved. Certainly there is less than usual here either of the placid cantilena in which a pianist may revel in beauty of tone and elegance of phrase or of the artfully disposed bravura by which he may easily delight and astonish his hearers. The pianist has too often to work like a demon with the unpleasing knowledge that the results of his toil, however excellent, are covered up by the orchestra. So it has been said. But Mr. Schnabel demonstrated yesterday that it is possible to play this music respectfully, with full sense of its unity and of his own inglorious function as part of the orchestra (though this view of the B flat concerto is a greatly exaggerated one) and still astonish an audience by brilliant virtuosity, stir it to excitement by urgently impelling rhythm, arouse it to admiration by finely sensitive phrasing and tasteful musicianship. Yesterday's audience applauded loud and long, banged the seats, and shouted in token of its enthusiasm.

A careful but not emotionally convincing performance of the Schicksalslied had left the impression that in 1868 Brahms was more successful in depicting the bliss of the inhabitants of the celestial regions than the distress of mortal men. The serene and uplifting beauty of the orchestral prelude and epilogue, and of the earlier choral portions of the work, are what remain in the memory.

Mr. Koussevitzky's well-known interpretation of the E minor symphony, perhaps a shade too stressful and vigorous a performance for music so purely musical (despite its elegiac or tragic feeling), music which relies so little on emotional cliches for its effect. Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly applauded.

Tomorrow's program will be devoted to the German Requiem. S. S.

England.

SCHNABEL HEARD AT BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Great Pianist Receives an Ovation

Globe Mar 24

Arthur Schnabel, the celebrated pianist, who has come to this country from Berlin especially to play at three of the Brahms Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given an ovation yesterday at the end of a remarkably fine performance of the Second concerto of Brahms. An audience, which crowded Symphnoy Hall, clapped for many minutes. People stamped their feet, and there were shouts of 'bravo!" Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra shared in the applause, but most of the very unusual demonstration was plainly meant for Mr Schnabel. In recent seasons Horowitz and Iturbi have been the only pianists similarly applauded by Symphony Hall audiences.

Yesterday did not mark Mr Schnabel's Boston debut. He was soloist at a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in 1923, conducted by Bruno Walter.

Born in 1882, he studied with Leschetizky at Vienna from 1888 to 1897. His reputation as a virtuoso pianist, and as a teacher has long been world wide among musicians.

If his name is not familiar to the general public in the United States, it is merely because he has visited this country but once before. In Europe he is particularly noted as an interpreter of Brahms, more of whose piano music he is to play at the concerts of the current Brahms Festival Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

Mr Schnabel's playing must compel the admiration of those who care for technical virtuosity. The difficulties of Brahms' B flat major concerto are considerable. For this pianist they do not appear to exist. More important to the majority of listeners than his technique is Mr Schnabel's subtle and powerful musical imagination. He is a musician of the first rank, as well as a remarkable pianist. One doubts whether anyone else has ever played his concerto with as complete a comprehension of its musical meaning. Certainly it never before sounded to one listener as noble and as soul-satisfying as it did yesterday.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did their best to second Mr Schnabel, though their feeling for the rhythm and melodic line of Brahms seemed at times less sensitive than his.

Yesterday's concert, the second program of the Brahms Festival, began with the "Song of Destiny," one of the most beautiful of Brahms' choral pieces, in which the orchestra was, as so often, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. This brief setting of a pessimistic poem by Hoelderlin is distinguished by the txtraordinary beauty of an important and oft-repeated melodic phrase, recurring in the orchestral postlude to dispel the gloom of the last lines of the poem.

Dr Koussevitzky's conception of this music is Byronic, but its true spirit seems closer to Milton than to Byron. Brahms, like Milton, would dismiss his audience feeling that "All is best, though we oft doubt."

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms, the last number on the lengthy program, attains in its first two movements the same dignity and power one finds in the "Song of Destiny," and in much of the B flat major concerto. This music has the "high seriousness" which to such 19th century critics as Matthew Arnold was the distinguishing quality of all really great art. Beethoven had in fuller measure than Brahms this same moral earnestness. Our own age, war weary and disillusioned, too often, perhaps, turns from Beethoven and from Brahms to geniuses less obsessed by "eternal verities," and less intent on giving them noble and ponderous utterance.

But after all, even if Rossini and Stravinsky are cleverer and less exacting than Beethoven and Brahms, the 19th century was certainly right in preferring the "high serious" music to the merely entertaining.

Tonight the Brahms Festival will continue with a performance of "A German Requiem." P., R.

[illegible] CHRISTIANITY

BRAHMS, STARKIE AND NEWMAN

Herald Mar 22

Mr. John N. Burk in his interesting pamphlet published by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the Brahms Festival, which began last Friday afternoon and will end next Wednesday night, devotes two pages to the early years of Brahms in Boston. These pages are not only entertaining, they should lead the ultra-conservatives who are "agin" all contemporary symphonic music the idiom of which is not thrice familiar, to sit up and consider the error of their ways.

When Carl Zerrahn, conducting the Harvard Musical Society, brought out early in 1878 Brahms's First Symphony, the work was called "morbid, strained, unnatural, ugly." Even Mr. Apthorp, who later became a warm admirer of Brahms, and wrote in glowing terms about the Finale of the symphony, found the work in 1878 "on the whole a disappointment," but Zerrahn, nothing daunted, gave the symphony again in the same month. Producing the Second Symphony a year later, he again met with opposition. John S. Dwight, whose musical opinions then had weight in certain quarters, made the astonishing statement that Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

When Henschel began to learn the trade of conducting, having been appointed the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, the public, to quote Mr. Burk, "realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful 'modern'—(the word seems to have borne the same dread implications which it has for many today towards composers correspondingly advanced)." Henschel put the "Tragic" overture and the Alto Rhapsody on his programs, also the two symphonies, and heeded not the indignant letters in the newspapers.

When Gericke brought out the Third Symphony, it was remarked in print that "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." According to another newspaper, the Variations on a theme by Haydn were "twenty minutes wasted."

On one occasion when Gericke gave a performance of the Second Symphony, a newspaper reported that "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." In November, 1885, the Evening Transcript (Mr. Apthorp?) reporting that many had walked out during a performance of the First Symphony, said: "In one way or another Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours."

It should be remembered that the attitude of European, even German and Austrian critics and public, was no more friendly during the earlier years of Brahms's symphonic works. Hanslick, as a rule a blind and fanatical admirer of the composer, more than once shook his head and hummed and hawed in his reviews. Nietzsche declared that Brahms wrote for Viennese elderly ladies with suppressed desires, while a Frenchman the Sar Peladan likened the music of Brahms to Hungarian gypsy women dancing in tight-fitting corsets.

Some one in Boston suggested that in the old Music Hall there should be a red light with a sign, "This way in case of Brahms." Edward MacDowell taught his dog to drop dead at the mention of Brahms's name.

For many were irritated by the unmusical suddenly taking it into their heads to speak enthusiastically of this music, though some of them were in doubt as to whether the name was Brahm or Brahms—regarding the "s" as an apostrophe.

Little by little the Boston public became more tolerant, more accustomed, more, one might say, acclimatized. Not that fair ladies now swoon at the mere mention of the composer's name; but it is considered to be the thing, quite the Stilton, to speak knowingly about his music, dismissing other names with "Yes, perhaps—but Brahms, ah, Brahms."

The present widespread interest in the music of Brahms that has led to this festival is largely if not wholly due to Dr. Koussevitzky, the first of the conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra who has humanized the music of Brahms, made it vital, dramatic, poetic, and not emphasized, from a belief in its plenary inspiration, the weaknesses, the padding, the treading-water occasionally found in the symphonic works. What is more, Dr. Koussevitzky does not arrogantly claim, as some, to be a "specialist in Brahms," only to be a conductor who realizes the strength and melancholy beauty that the austerity of expression would often conceal.

SINGERS, PIANO AND ORCHESTRA

Schnabel Outstanding Artist at Brahms Festival

Post Mar 24

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Officially, the Brahms Festival, now occupying the attention of musical Bostonians, began with the Symphony concerts of last week, at which Dr. Koussevitzky offered an all-Brahms programme. So far as the general public and the true festival spirit is concerned, these rites had their commencement yesterday, when, at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and Arthur Schnabel, pianist, presented the "Song of Destiny," the Second Pianoforte Concerto and the Fourth Symphony.

LIST CHANGED FOR BETTER

The change in yesterday's programme which substituted the "Song of Destiny" for the originally announced orchestral Variations on a Theme by Haydn was a fortunate one, the three media: chorus and orchestra, piano and orchestra and orchestra alone, offsetting the monotony that might arise—and on Friday did arise—in an entire concert devoted to the music of one composer. Yesterday's concert was full long, but few indeed must have been the members of the large and exceedingly enthusiastic audience who found a single moment of it dull, a circumstance for which the performances as well as the pieces performed were responsible.

The "Song of Destiny," to discuss the music in the order in which it was played or sung, is one of Brahms' finest compositions, although its finest pages are not those in which the chorus is used but the serene opening and the postlude in which this initial mood is renewed and prolonged. Here Brahms sounded a note of other-worldly serenity that has seldom enough been sounded in music with such felicity. The only parallel instances which come readily to mind are the final movement of Beethoven's last piano sonata and the closing pages of Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

Schnabel a Brahms Master

The participation in this Festival of Mr. Schnabel, who came to this country especially for that purpose, had caused a deal of anticipatory interest. Since his appearance at a pair of Symphony Concerts here seven years ago Mr. Schnabel's European fame has waxed and there are many who do not hesitate to call him the greatest living master of his instrument. In the music of Brahms, too, Mr. Schnabel has been known as something of a specialist. Thus was his performance yesterday of the B-flat major Concerto eagerly awaited, nor did the result occasion disappointment.

To call Mr. Schnabel's performance masterly is to understand the case. Mere technique was subordinated in his playing to the demands of musicianship and interpretation, yet the remarkable nature of Mr. Schnabel's technical equipment could be noted. But what chiefly impressed the listener was the loftiness joined to fervor in the pianist's conception of the music, the greatness of soul as well as the clarity of vision that marked his interpretation. Deservedly was Mr. Schnabel applauded to the echo. There were many who stamped their feet as well as clapped their hands, and the recalls were many.

The Great Fourth

Finally there came the Symphony that disputes with the first the title of the greatest of Brahms' four. Yesterday it seemed to hold that proud place without serious rivalry, so eloquent in both the larger and the lesser details was the performance of it.

From a conductor and orchestra clearly lifted above themselves came this music yesterday, every measure, so it seemed, glowing with the flame of inspiration.

SPEED TEST IS

106

Symphony Festival Enshrines Brahms Among Immortals

Adv Mar 18

By Morris Hastings

BRAHMS' day is come at last. The most conclusive sign is at Symphony Hall where the Brahms Festival is now in full swing.

As he is so firmly ensconced on his lofty throne, it is diverting to look back into those years when Brahms' music was little understood. It takes no great amount of delving to detect musicians, even, who regarded his orchestral scores as austere mountains, admirably proportioned but quite unapproachable. The great public shied away from his symphonies, treating them as they would a learned, but heartlessly boring discourse by Prof. Dry-as-Dust.

* * *

JAMES HUNEKER, discerning critic though he was, spoke of the tremendous remoteness of Brahms' compositions for orchestra. "Yet," he continued, "how intimate, how full of charm, of graciousness, are his lyrics!" And, to give the public its due, it has always held the German composer as a master of song. The lyric is ever more comprehensible than the symphonic form.

* * *

VOYAGERS to the country of Brahms' songs find it a serene, twilight land. It is peopled with romantic knights. There are sorrowful maidens who wander through darkling forests as they weep over the faithlessness of their beloved ones. Country lasses naively tell of the strength of their sweethearts. Occasionally the melancholy song of a nightingale pierces the heart of a sadly pensive human. Ivied walls, stern castles, deep pools, purling streams add to the grave beauty of this countryside.

* * *

THE question might well arise as to how the composer of these tender and noble songs fashioned them. A friend of Brahms, aware that the musician took Schubert as his model, inquired if the songs flowed as easily from Brahms' pen as they did from Schubert's. Brahms hastily answered: "I have the deuce of a time with them! When I think I have hold of a perfect idea, I take a walk in the woods. And inevitably, I find that it was but the extremely imperfect seed of a fine idea."

* * *

IT was the answer to be expected from a man endowed with such unflinching devotion to art and with such searching self-criticism. We know that when he was impressed with a poem—and if was a worthy one every time—he first probed the depths of the poet's thought. Then, the melody carefully conceived, he calmly and unerringly blended the poetry and the music into one perfect whole. The musical accent had to agree with the metrical accent of the verse; the music could not drown the beauties of the word, and the accompaniment and melody had to maintain and enhance the atmosphere created by the poet.

* * *

SO these lovely songs serve as an excellent introduction to the work of the composer whose greatness so many recitalists are celebrating nowadays. The better we know these lyrics the more prepared we are to understand his more gigantic utterances. And with an understanding of these latter there comes the realization that he was as profound a Titan as ever set pen to paper.

Herald Mar 24

MUSIC

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall. The amended program contained the Song of Destiny (Schicksalslied), op. 54, for chorus and orchestra; the 2d pianoforte concerto, op. 83, in B flat major, and the 4th symphony, op. 98, in E minor. Arthur Schnabel, the eminent pianist who has not been heard here since 1923, appeared as soloist in the concerto; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society joined forces with the orchestra in the Song of Destiny.

The highwater mark of an afternoon which gave evident pleasure throughout to a numerous and vigorously plauditory audience was Mr. Schnabel's magnificently virile and intelligent performance of the concerto. The great length of this work, the number of its movements, and the relative subordination of the exceedingly difficult piano part, have caused it to be called "a symphony with piano obbligato." It has also been remarked that the strenuousness of its piano part is out of all proportion to the result achieved. Certainly there is less than usual here either of the placid cantilena in which a pianist may revel in beauty of tone and elegance of phrase or of the artfully disposed bravura by which he may easily delight and astonish his hearers. The pianist has too often to work like a demon with the unpleasing knowledge that the results of his toil, however excellent, are covered up by the orchestra. So it has been said. But Mr. Schnabel demonstrated yesterday that it is possible to play this music respectfully, with full sense of its unity and of his own inglorious function as part of the orchestra (though this view of the B flat concerto is a greatly exaggerated one) and still astonish an audience by brilliant virtuosity, stir it to excitement by urgently impelling rhythm, arouse its admiration by finely sensitive phrasing and tasteful musicianship. Yesterday's audience applauded loud and long, banged the seats, and shouted in token of its enthusiasm.

A careful but not emotionally convincing performance of the Schicksalslied had left the impression that in 1868 Brahms was more successful in depicting the bliss of the inhabitants of the celestial regions than the distress of mortal men. The serene and uplifting beauty of the orchestral prelude and epilogue, and of the earlier choral portions of the work, are what remain in the memory.

Mr. Koussevitzky's well-known interpretation of the E minor symphony, perhaps a shade too stressful and vigorous a performance for music so purely musical (despite its elegiac or tragic feeling), music which relies so little on emotional cliches for its effect. Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly applauded.

Tomorrow's program will be devoted to the German Requiem. S. S.

England.

SCHNABEL HEARD AT BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Great Pianist Receives an Ovation

Globe Mar 24

Arthur Schnabel, the celebrated pianist, who has come to this country from Berlin especially to play at three of the Brahms Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given an ovation yesterday at the end of a remarkably fine performance of the Second concerto of Brahms. An audience, which crowded Symphnoy Hall, clapped for many minutes. People stamped their feet, and there were shouts of 'bravo!" Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra shared in the applause, but most of the very unusual demonstration was plainly meant for Mr Schnabel. In recent seasons Horowitz and Iturbi have been the only pianists similarly applauded by Symphony Hall audiences.

Yesterday did not mark Mr Schnabel's Boston debut. He was soloist at a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in 1923, conducted by Bruno Walter.

Born in 1882, he studied with Leschetizky at Vienna from 1888 to 1897. His reputation as a virtuoso pianist, and as a teacher has long been world wide among musicians.

If his name is not familiar to the general public in the United States, it is merely because he has visited this country but once before. In Europe he is particularly noted as an interpreter of Brahms, more of whose music he is to play at the concerts of the current Brahms Festival today and Wednesday evenings.

Mr Schnabel's playing must compel admiration of those who care for technical virtuosity. The difficulties of Brahms' B flat major concerto are formidable. For this pianist they do not appear to exist. More important than the majority of listeners than his technique is Mr Schnabel's subtle and powerful musical imagination. He is a pianist of the first rank, as well as a remarkable pianist. One doubts whether anyone else has ever played the concerto with as complete a comprehension of its musical meaning. Rarely it never before sounded to the listener as noble and as soul-stirring as it did yesterday.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did their best to second Mr Schnabel, and their feeling for the rhythm and melodic line of Brahms seemed at times less sensitive than his.

Yesterday's concert, the second program of the Brahms Festival, began with the "Song of Destiny," one of the most beautiful of Brahms' choral works in which the orchestra was, at times, often, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. This brief setting of a pessimistic poem by Hoelderlin is distinguished by extraordinary beauty of an impressive and oft-repeated melodic theme, recurring in the orchestral interludes to dispel the gloom of the sombre lines of the poem.

Dr Koussevitzky's conception of this work is Byronic, but its true spirit is much closer to Milton than to Byron. Brahms, like Milton, would dismiss with the audience feeling that "All is best, though we oft doubt."

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms, last number on the lengthy program, attains in its first two movements the same dignity and power one finds in the "Song of Destiny," and much of the B flat major concerto. The music has the "high seriousness" which to such 19th century critics as Matthew Arnold was the distinguishing quality of all really great music. Beethoven had in fuller measure than Brahms this same moral earnestness.

Our own age, war weary and disillusioned, too often, perhaps, turns from Beethoven and from Brahms to composers less obsessed by "eternal verities" and less intent on giving them weighty and ponderous utterance.

But after all, even if Rossini and Offenbach are cleverer and less exciting than Beethoven and Brahms, the 19th century was certainly right in preferring the "high serious" music to be merely entertaining.

Tonight the Brahms Festival will continue with a performance of "A German Requiem." P. R.

OPERATIVE CHRISTIANITY

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians -

Afternoon of Brahms and Of Schnabel

The Remarkable Pianist and Three Pieces in Signal Performance

THE Brahms Festival, properly so-called, began yesterday afternoon, with sufficient evidence of a sustaining public. It filled Symphony Hall. It remained steadfast through a concert two hours and a quarter long. It was too engrossed even to applaud. It distributed applause both generously and justly. For some of us who believe that symphonic music can endure in Boston only as the younger generation goes to hear it, this audience was rather too middle-aged and elderly. Probably, the youngsters take Brahms for granted, as they took Beethoven three years ago through a similar festival. So much the better if they deceive themselves; for there was new-found pleasure to be had from hearing the joined hands of Mr. Schnabel and Dr. Koussevitzky in the Concerto, the conductor and orchestra in the symphony.

Our overt conservatives were also present in a using numbers. "This is old music," they said at opportune moments, then looked around to mark the impression of this saying. It made none because most within earshot were absorbed in Brahms and were giving not a thought to Stravinsky, Honegger and other bêtes noirs of the standpatters. While the long Piano-Concerto in B-flat was proceeding, the youth of Harvard and Radcliffe, released from duty on the stage, lined every foot of standing room, listening eagerly. Yet these same young men and maidens sing the choruses of "Œdipus Rex" and "King David" with gusto because they enjoy them also. Once more in open-mindedness young years kept their fortunate advantage over old.

The figure of the afternoon was unmistakably Mr. Schnabel. Few in the audience could have remembered his earlier appearance at Symphony Hall seven years ago. He was then overshadowed by Bruno Walter who was guest-conductor; but had he gained in 1923 the high and wide European note that he now enjoys. The curious over outer semblances looked upon a stocky gentleman at middle age, whose black hair is graying; whose face is lighted by quiet intelligence; whose bearing is that of a cultivated man of the world; whose dress—to provide the last essential detail—was the jacket of work rather than the formal garb of the concert-hall. Mr. Schnabel has no "audience manner"; practises no platform or pianistic mannerisms. If the applause at the pauses in the Concerto irked him—and in Europe he is averse to it—his response was eminently courteous. More honest than is the custom seemed also his acknowledgments to conductor and orchestra.

Mr. Schnabel's technical resources are ready and inexhaustible. If Brahms wrote his Concerto in B-flat by the sweat of his brow, he took like toll of the pianist; for there are long passages which the piano must fertilize and set into the musical design, or they go for nothing except the composer's mental striving. With them, as with all else, Mr. Schnabel was notably fortunate. He is pianist and musician of intellectual cast and habit. With no mere temperament and technique does he approach the music in hand. He apprehends and assimilates the composer's design; then makes it audible in clarity and logic, proportioning the lesser to the larger matter, setting detail in what seems fore-ordained place, commanding the necessary means to the willed end. He accomplishes these things by a remarkable sense of rhythm—not the rhythm that consists of well-placed and sustained accents; but an underlying and unfailingly plastic rhythm that informs the entire Concerto and binds it together as organic whole. With reason, Dr. Koussevitzky renounced throughout the prerogatives of the conductor and let the masterful pianist-musician beside him take the lead.

Mr. Schnabel achieves this unity and vitality by yet another means. He possesses an uncommon sense of continuity. Each phrase, each note within the phrase, seems to flow out of its predecessor and into its successor. His paragraphing knows no break. Each of the four movements in this B-flat Concerto was all compact of interlaced periods. Each movement had, no less, its place in the whole design. The listener heard that reciprocity and fusion between piano and orchestra sought by Brahms in both Concertos. He also heard this Second in an unfolding unity and a concentrated progress that were new sensations of the concert-hall. Here was Brahms writing a music of sustained substance conducted and animated by intellectual power, interspersed with songful beauty, from first to last unflagging.

More particularly, Mr. Schnabel set free—and also in order—a first movement that often seems overladen with matter and, therefore, in cumbrous progress. Into it he let light and logic, warmth and motion. In the ensuing Scherzo, his tone teemed with Brahmsian quality—rugged yet rounded, elastic yet firm, now suave, again springing into force. From the slow movement, he drew a Brahmsian beauty—sentiment that never declined into sentimentality, that out of tenderness rose into noble fervor; in that exaltation ran deep and glowing. He played the Rondo-Finale with that continent grace and ease, in rhythm and play of motivs, which are token of Brahms in cheerful tranquillity. Measure by measure, with the lightest of hands, this ardor quickened into the exhilaration of the close.

Brahms does not spare development through this Second Concerto. Mr. Schnabel persuaded the dryest of those over-thoughtful and over-labored pages to sound as though they meant something. He played critically and he played imaginatively. Here Brahms must be clarified or intensified, and he found the means. The orchestra itself—as in the song of the clarinet in the Andante—answered to these new warmths. Above all else, and throughout, Mr. Schnabel vitalized the Concerto; while on that score Dr. Koussevitzky met him half way. So—came again and again the thought—Brahms heard this Second Concerto in imagination as he wrote.

The afternoon began with that outcast of the festival, the "Song of Destiny," sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs crowded into scant standing-space behind the orchestra. If, as the conductor believed, it sounded out of place before the "German Requiem," it sounded no more in order before the Second Piano-Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, for which, as originally proposed, the Haydn Variations (which are the whole symphonic Brahms in epitome) would have logically prepared the way. . . . Brahms lived and died in the Protestant faith that is North-German heritage. Within reason he believed and practised. Yet he was haunted by the antique fatalism which imagined the high gods serene, bright, indifferent, while the race of men strove vainly and bitterly with the life those divinities gave them. Brahms was too honest-minded to use this sub-conscious fatalism as composing device and machinery. Rather it was spell laid upon him by his regard and aspiration for the antique beauty.

Out of both the fatalism and the beauty Brahms made this "Song of Destiny." The beauty informs the pages in which chorus and orchestra sing the remote bliss of the gods. The fatalism racks the succeeding pages of the sons of men toiling in blindness, to no purpose tossed and tortured. Then, possibly, the Christian Brahms intervenes, transforming the orchestral prelude of Olympian serenities into an orchestral postlude of solace and of hope. Throughout he fills the musical design, accomplishes the poetizing purpose. For once, for a mortal composer and mortal listeners, there is something very like complete achievement. The clear young voices of the Radcliffe chorus lent a rarified beauty to the music of the Olympians; while the vigorous tone, clean phrasing, incisive rhythms, of the Harvard choir dramatized the vain struggle of men. The performance matched the music in full accomplishment. Such a chorus has become indispensable to the Symphony Orchestra.

The afternoon ended with the Symphony in E minor, last and most Brahms-like of the four. Most Brahms-like because not a little in the First may be referred back to Beethoven; because the Second is cast in variations upon a single mood; because in the Third the obscure and laboring composer sometimes alloys the clear, warm, outspeaking Brahms. Through the Passacaglia that concludes the Fourth strides the Brahms who is man of power with the complexities of rhythm and the fertilities of variation. Here is the classical pattern of the Chaconne—thirty variations upon a persistent, yet hardly to be followed ground bass. It scales heights and sounds depths. It is Brahms writing a music like a Gothic cathedral. The Scherzo, for all the Allegro giocoso written over it, is of the rugged Brahms in counter-motion from strength to strength. He fills the slow movement with the misted, autumnal music of his later years, drawn into slender, open patterns, then woven closer into golden beauty. E minor is no pallid key for the Brahms of the first movement. The rugged Brahms is writing again, driving it into larger and larger shape, firmer and firmer tissue, before the autumnal mood shall descend upon it. Even the pizzicati are plucked with power. A masterpiece of music giving room for every warmth of Dr. Koussevitzky's temperament, for every sensibility of his ear and hand; inviting the orchestra no less to run the gamut from outflung energy to delicate filagree—as in the multifold finale, or the contrasts of the first and the second movements. . . . The assembled forces must look to their mettle or this first concert of the Brahms Festival may prove also its climax.

H. T. P.

Putting Their Backs Into It

Artur Schnabel and Serge Koussevitzky

As Sketched Yesterday Afternoon at Symphony Hall

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Schnabel will play the piano-part in the four songs of Brahms to be sung by Mme. Matzenauer at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening in the chamber-concert of the current festival. He will also be heard at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday of next week.

108

Globe Mar 25

BRAHMS' "REQUIEM" AT SYMPHONY HALL

Choral Masterpiece at Festival Concert

"A German Requiem" filled the third program of the current Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall last evening. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society again assisted the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr Koussevitzky conducted. The assisting solo singers were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Another very large audience seemed greatly pleased. Of the popular success of the Brahms Festival there can be no doubt.

Brahms was, of course, a Protestant. For "A German Requiem" he chose passages from the Bible, which set the work apart from the great requiem masses of Roman Catholic composers. Begun as a tribute to the memory of his dead friend, Schumann, "A German Requiem" was completed by Brahms in the months following his mother's death. It is now everywhere regarded as one of his masterpieces, though outside of Germany performances are infrequent. Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, assisted by the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe students, gave it here in 1926.

Last night's performance afforded further proof of the remarkable and in this country unprecedented success of Dr A. T. Davison in training college students to sing great choral works. The eager and intelligent singing of the Harvard Glee Club, which he had rehearsed, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, one of his many able pupils, reached a standard of artistry few amateur and not many professional choruses attain.

Only those who know the usual attitude of American undergraduates toward what they are accustomed to call "classical music" can fully realize the extent of Dr Davison's and Mr Woodworth's achievement. The fresh, youthful quality of the voices, the unflagging zeal and artistry of the singing were delightful.

Dr Koussevitzky, an enthusiast for the music of Brahms, is not bound down by any pedantic reverence for the composer's printed text. With this "Requiem," as with all the music he conducts, Koussevitzky takes his own way in the details of interpretation. His tempi, for instance, were consistently much slower than one would expect from reading the music or from consulting people fortunate enough to have heard several other conductors in it.

He broadens many phrases, delights at times in tempo rubato, emphasizes beyond the point of exaggeration the contrasts between soft and loud. It is as though he always saw double when he read a "p" or an "f" in the score.

All this, he would claim, is well within the conductor's province. What are conductors for, if not to offer their hearers individual and eloquent readings that lend a personal touch to all music? Yet there are listeners who would very much prefer to hear, for instance, the second chorus in this requiem taken at a more rapid and an unwaveringly steady pace, as it would seem that Brahms himself wished it to be. There is no denying, however, that Dr Koussevitzky's conducting is highly satisfactory to the majority in his audiences.

Miss Vreeland sang the soprano solo competently in a loud, full tone, a trifle forced in quality. Mr Gange's rather rhetorical interpretation of the baritone solos had the curious ring of insincerity one so often detects in oratorio singing these days. One could scarcely believe that it was from the heart that he sang such words as "Lord, make me to know the measure of my days on earth, to consider my frailty that I must perish."

Why, to mention a significant detail, did he use a text different from that sung by the chorus? The Bible passages must, of course, be translated from the German Brahms set, in order to fit the music, but the performers could easily agree on a single version.

The Brahms festival will continue tonight with a chamber concert.

P. R.

YOUTH DIES OF INJURY SUSTAINED IN NIGHTMARE

MALDEN, March 24—Loss of blood from a severe cut on his right hand sustained when he pushed his hand through a window, during a nightmare, caused the death today in Malden Hospital of Ralph Myers of this city.

Myers' stepfather, Thomas Anderson and the latter's wife told the police that the youth had gone to bed about 11 o'clock last night. Soon after midnight, the couple said, they heard the noise of breaking glass and found Myers lying on the floor suffering from a bad cut. Dr Samuel Norman was summoned and the patient was removed to the Malden Hospital where he died.

BRAHMS' REQUIEM FOR THIRD

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Sing With Symphony

Post Mar 25

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The German Requiem is a work that no Brahms Festival of any comprehensiveness could well ignore, and last evening it found place as the third programme of the current rites at Symphony Hall. The chorus was composed, as in past performances under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, of the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soprano and baritone soloists were, respectively, Jeannette Vreeland and Fraser Gange.

GREAT CHORD MUSIC

There is no need at this time to speak at great length of the German Requiem itself. It goes without saying that it is one of Brahms' most considerable efforts, and it needs no great weight of argument to establish it as the chief monument in German choral music after Bach. Granted that the Requiem, for all the loftiness, the beauty, the impressiveness of many pages, is not sustained at an even level throughout, yet compared with most choral pieces of similar dimensions it may almost be said to exhibit plenary inspiration.

It seemed last evening that in the opening number the tone of the chorus was not quite firm and secure, but this timidness, if that it was, soon passed, and from then until the end the singers quite covered themselves with glory. That a student chorus should perform so difficult a work with such artistry and assurance reflects no small credit upon Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who have trained it. And when, at the conclusion of the concert, Dr. Koussevitsky personally escorted these, his able assistants, to the stage, the volume of applause was swelled 10-fold, the singers themselves contributing in large measure to the general enthusiasm.

Great pleasure was afforded last evening by the singing of Mr. Gange, previous performances of the Requiem here had suffered from the lack of a baritone of his calibre. It were difficult last evening to decide which to praise the more, the richness and the resonance of his voice or the earnestness and fervor with which he delivered his measures. Miss Vreeland's opportunity was not so great, but of it she made much.

As for Dr. Koussevitzky, instigator and presiding genius of the festival, it may be added, although almost superfluously, that he conducted last evening with deep devotion to the music in hand and with a communicating ardor to which chorus, orchestra and solo singers alike responded.

MUSIC

Herald Mar 25

BRAHMS'S "GERMAN REQUIEM"

For the third program of the Brahms festival at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra co-operated last night with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a performance of the "German Requiem." The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky, of course, was in command.

If, as is very probable, the "German Requiem" was composed in memory of Robert Schumann (and nothing could be more appropriate, not only by reason of the love, admiration, and gratitude he bore him, but also because it was Schumann who had urged the promising young composer to turn his attention to choral and orchestral forms), nevertheless, last night's performance must have been felt by most of those present as a solemn tribute to Brahms himself. It was on the whole an admirable performance that was given of this great but intensely human and German music, that matches so thoroughly the comfortable and reassuring doctrine of the chosen text. It was a performance lifted to occasional heights of superlative beauty by the superb singing of the soloists (how rarely can such a thing be said!). The powerfully dramatic effort achieved by chorus and orchestra in the second chorus ("Behold, All Flesh Is as the Grass"), the moments of brilliance and expressive beauty in which these young Radcliffe and Harvard singers reminded one of their splendid work in the great Beethoven Mass two years ago, were offset by barren stretches in which the timidity of the sopranos and altos, the gentlemanly restraint of the male singers, a certain lack of movement in the slower tempi, made for an effect lacking in the fullest conviction.

But the vitality and beauty and expressive force of Mr. Gange's singing in the solos "Lord, make me to know the measure of my days" and "Here on earth have we no continuing place," the exquisite charm of Miss Vreeland's beautiful voice and her delightfully modulated and expressive phrasing in "Ye now are sorrowful"—surely one of the loveliest things in the whole "Requiem"—were things to be long remembered. The enthusiasm of the audience was unbounded.

Tonight's program will contain piano pieces played by Mr. Schnabel, songs rendered by Mme. Matzenauer, and the F minor quintet performed by Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin string quartet.

S. S.

'German Requiem' Sung At Festival in Boston

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Included in Brahms Concert

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, March 24.—For the third program of the Brahms festival at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra co-operated tonight with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a performance of the "German Requiem." The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, barytone. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

If, as is probable, the "German Requiem" was composed in memory of Robert Schumann, tonight's performance must have ben regarded by most of those present as a tribute to Brahms himself. It was a performance lifted to occasional heights by the soloists.

The dramatic effect achieved by chorus and orchestra in the second chorus, "Behold all flesh is as the grass," and the moments of brilliance of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers were offset by the timidity of the sopranos and altos, the restraint of the male singers and a certain lack of movement in the slower tempi.

But the vitality of Mr. Gange's singing in the solos, "Lord, Make Me to Know the Measure of My Days," and "Here on Earth Have We No Continuing Place," the charm of Miss Vreeland's voice and her expressive phrasing in "Ye Now Are Sorrowful," were things long to be remembered.

The audience was enthusiastic.

NY Trib Mar 25

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians --- The Scr

To the Brahms Who also Made Chamber-Pieces

The Pre-eminent Mr. Schnabel, Mme. Matzenauer and the Cambridge Choirs

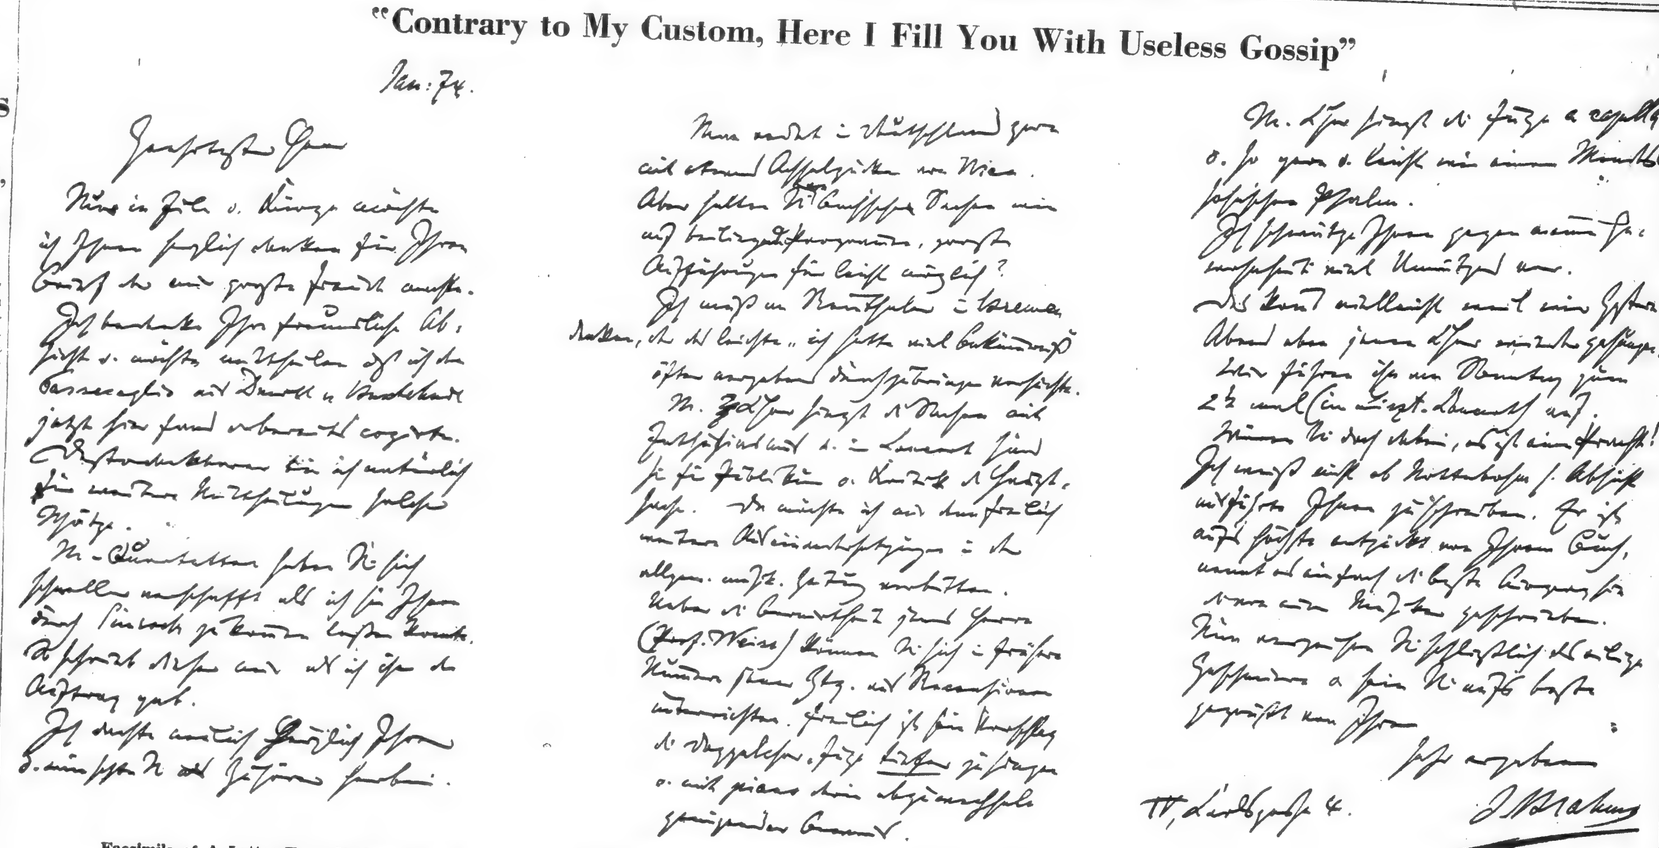
THOUGH Symphony Hall, as every reviewer will say today, is an uninviting room for chamber-music, in a Brahms or a Beethoven Festival there must be a chamber-concert. First, because the master to be honored and exemplified wrote not a little of it; second, because conductor and orchestra must have an evening's surcease from continuous labors. (Audiences forget the rehearsals that, morning after morning, prepare the way.) There can, however, be variations and what the theaters name "added attractions" in such chamber-concerts. Three years ago at the Beethoven Festival, as some may recall, Mr. Ernest Newman diversified the occasion by the reading of an essay about the composer that would have graced any text-book for schools and colleges; Dr. Koussevitzky, to the general pleasure, made the one speech, thus far, of his career in Boston; while upon the platform the musically illustrious of this town were amusingly on view. "We feebly labor; they in glory shine," as the hymn has it.

In the case of Brahms last evening, a small choir picked from the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club sang six numbers out of the two books of "Liebeslieder"; Mme. Matzenauer, in flaming red and at the top of her powers—though the Metropolitan Opera House no longer has need of them—sang four familiar songs; while Mr. Schnabel, though according to his custom he faithfully served the composer, was in general and in particular the figure of the occasion. He played four of Brahms's later piano-pieces; accompanied Mme. Matzenauer in her songs; joined, and led, the Burgin Quartet through the Quintet for Piano and Strings in F minor. An audience that filled the hall—such is the call of Brahms, his prophets and a festival—hailed him with long and hearty applause; renewed it after the solo-pieces until it discovered that he gives no "extras"; recalled Mme. Matzenauer again and again in the expectation that at least once her "accompanist" would join her. Not he, who has a sense of proportion. Decidedly, Mr. Schnabel is the figure of the musical hour in Boston: bids fair to remain such through ten days to come.

The piano-pieces were the last that Brahms wrote—the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of Opus 119, put to paper in a summer at Ischl only four years before his death. The titles are arbitrary, suggesting next to nothing except the necessity of designations. The Intermezzi are not interludes—save in the courses of Brahms's musical thought. The Rhapsody shuns the conventional usage of that word; if a modernist had written it, would be simply "Piece" in E-flat major. The Intermezzi are a wholly subjective music. Brahms sits at the piano—the one instrument that he knew and loved, above even the cherished clarinet and horn—thinks and dreams,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 11

"Contrary to My Custom, Here I Fill You With Useless Gossip"



Facsimile of A Letter From Brahms to His Friend, Philipp Spitta, the Biographer of Bach. The Original, Written on Three Pages of a Double Sheet of Note-Paper, Is in The Collection of Boaz Piller of The Symphony Orchestra, Who Lent It for Reproduction Here in Connection with The Current Brahms Festival. After Fifty-Six Years the Ink Is Little Faded, The Paper Unbroken. Brahms Writes in German Script and Here Follows a Free Translation:

Jan. 7¼ (Postmarked Jan. 6, 1874)

Most Honored Sir:

Only in haste and in brief am I able to thank you heartily for your letter, which gave me great pleasure. Thanks for your friendly intention, and may I inform you that I have just found Buxtehude's Passacaglia in D minor, and already copied it. Naturally, I am all the more grateful for news of such treasures.

You have procured my Quartets sooner than I could have had them sent to you through Simrock [Brahms's publisher]. Which is what he wrote to me when I gave him the order.

I thought cordially of you recently, and wished that you might be here listening.

In Germany people like to shrug their shoulders when they talk of Vienna.

But do you consider grand performances of Bach's compositions, such as those on the accompanying program, easily possible? I can't help thinking of Reinthaler, in Bremen, who frequently tried to perform the easy "Ich hatte viel Bekummernis"—and in vain. My choir [the chorus of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna] sings these things enthusiastically, and in a concert they are, for the public, the chief interest. And here I should like to forbid further comment in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung. As for that gentleman's (Prof. Weiss's) limitations, you may further inform yourself from reviews in earlier issues of his periodical. Happily, his proposal to sing the Double Choir Fugue deeper and to vary it with piano is sufficient proof.

My choir sings the fugue a capella, as lightly and smoothly as a Mendelssohn psalm. But, contrary to my custom, here I fill you with useless gossip. Maybe it's because we sang that selfsame chorus last evening. We perform it for the second time on Sunday (at the Liszt concert). If you could only be there it would be splendid! I don't know whether Nottebohm wrote to you as he intended. He's infinitely delighted with your book and calls it simply the best biography of a composer ever written. Well, in conclusion, forgive me this hasty scribbling and receive the best greetings from your

IV Carlsgasse 4 Very devoted

J. Brahms

1.10 FROM 109

dreams and thinks; falls into a kind of introspective improvisation; gives gentle rein to the autumnal mood that in these final years possessed him. The winding pattern, the soft clang, the wandering thought, now and again pulled together as by a dreamer who remembers that he also is composer, are touching to hear.

Imagination sees the ageing, wasting Brahms at his work-table in the lodging at Ischl, the sunlight streaming through the windows, the mountain-air blowing sweet, the wooded slopes themselves in view, the distant rush of the mountain-river perhaps in his ears. His music-paper lies before him. On it he is setting less black notes and bars and signs than the thoughts in tones of an old man living an inner, tranquil, gentle and submissive life. The thoughts become emotion. A faint golden glow suffuses the tones. From them drop "the tears of things." For Brahms, a cultivated and a reading man, with a taste for classics, may have known also Vergil. . . . The mood changes, he gathers himself; out of the pendant Rhapsody sounds the old heroic note of the first movement of the Third Symphony—sounds and dies away.

In the playing of the four pieces Mr. Schnabel was the technician, the virtuoso, the musician, who is also poetizing interpreter. He summoned a tone limpid, soft and bright, so edgeless, so luminous that it gave no hint, even in the treble, of an instrument of hammers and wires. He used the pedals with an artful economy; for the most part the touch of wrists and fingers sufficed. Again, as on Sunday in the Second Concerto, a music unfolded upon the ear note into note, phrase into phrase, period into period, to make at last full-rounded and self-contained whole. And a music not only accomplished in substance, course and style, but infiltrated with the mood that engendered it. Mr. Schnabel is not content to be clear-minded and imparting expositor, nor to restrict himself to musical thought and structure. Out of both he conjures an atmosphere, like the overtones of his piano, in which the piece goes charac-tered. In it, for the Intermezzi, since Brahms so willed, was autumnal beauty.

Continued on ...

Brahms Festival

Continued from Preceding Page

Master-songs though they are, Mme. Matzenauer's numbers were thrice-familiar: "Sapphische Ode"; Von ewiger Liebe"; "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer"; "Meine Liebe ist grün." As so much Brahms, they recalled the German folk-tunes in which his muse is rooted; the concentration into which he wrought his songs, particularly in the piano-part; his regard for the verse without a mechanized or super-artful elaboration; his feeling for the common life whatever the emotion that touched it. "Meine Liebe ist grün" outflung his lyric ardors. "Von ewiger Liebe" darkened them with his sombrer note. "Immer leiser" is of the brooding, foreboding Brahms by the coming of death secretly haunted. In "Sapphische Ode" writes the classic Brahms who, however sensuous, cherished contour, reticence and poised emotion. Needless to say, Mme. Matzenauer sang all four out of the rich depths and the flowing tide of her contralto tones; enriched them with musical understanding and imaginative response; gave to each its Brahmsian quality and its individual note. As Brahmsian was Mr. Schnabel's playing of the piano-parts. He subordinated them; kept them like to a bass below the voice; held pause and modulation in the justest proportion; gave them uncommon clarity and flow. To his every task Mr. Schnabel measures his playing.

For the other vocal numbers, the picked chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, with Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth to play the four-handed piano-part, repeated the six "Liebeslieder" sung at their own concert last December. Then the choir gained transparent, supple, warm and rounded tone, unanimous phrase and accent, sensitive mood and sensitive shading, pervasive freedom and glow. Therewith the performance became a marvel of choral singing. Yesterday, it was less technically secure, less alert to tone, less generally and particularly in the vein. Perhaps, it might not do twice the same miracle; perhaps circumstance, like the place at the beginning of the concert, embarrassed it. One listened; while one's thoughts drifted away to the strange mating, for Brahms, of subtilized and idealized waltz-rhythms, with miscellaneous folk-song verse and spirit. Yet not so strange, since the Ländler, out of which the slow waltz was born, were peasant dances.

If a Quintet for Piano and Strings may have a conductor, Mr. Schnabel was such through the final number. To him at every turn "The Burgins" deferred; from him took pace and accent; measured their tone by his; as he would have it, upreared the structure, released the thought and the passion; under such stimulus, and through many pages, played above themselves. Mr. Schnabel is all for the Quintet in F minor as a superbly sonorous music. Out of a light and open written score he bids piano and strings to large resonance. He is all, again, for incisive rhythms, full-mouthed phrases, broad and intensive instrumental song. He would release the Brahms of chamber-music, as Nikisch or Toscanini or Koussevitzky has released the symphonic Brahms. He is all, finally, for a rugged and puissant Brahms waxing out of young ardor into maturing strength.

So treated, the huddled musical matter of the first movement gains at last free shape, course and cogency. The slow movement sings as a Schubertian Brahms turned sensuous or a Brahmsian Schubert deepened. The scherzo strides, thunders, swells into the broad exultant melody of the trio. For the instant the finale sways in mystery; then leaps away quick-paced and rough-coated. Possibly Mr. Schnabel finds in the Quintet a Brahms who can be heir to the driving force of Beethoven and the songful splendor of Schubert, thereby lifting chamber music into a new-blended power and beauty. To no other end he seemed to play the piano-part and whip forward the assisting strings. H. T. P.

Around Symphony Hall

Dr. Koussevitzky has put by his projected performance, at the Symphony Concerts in April of Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," unheard since he produced it in America two years ago. Among other reasons for the decision is lack of time to prepare the Harvard chorus.

"Bolero" was lately played, with some excitement, for the first time in London. The reviewer for The Times made this neat comment:

> It is like a cumulative game, every soloist joins the chorus of accompaniment when he has said his say; after the soloists have given out the tune one by one, they do it again in groups. The method is that of simple arithmetic; the effect potent and witty; simplicity and audacity are rewarded.

Mr. Schnabel, the present illustrious guest at Symphony Hall, has a witty tongue. Without a thought of the underlying irony, a London newspaper quotes him as saying: "How different from the warmth of English audiences! What generosity they show! Bad, good, and indifferent performers are equally acclaimed—so, as I tell my pupils, there is a place for everybody." And again: "Some accuse me of being too serious. It is not I that am serious, but Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert."

While the memory of Mr. Bax's Second Symphony lingers in Boston, Sir Henry Wood in London lately produced his Third. It is dated 1928-29, whereas the Second was written six years ago. Says the Daily Telegraph:

> One will not be surprised to hear the new Symphony spoken of as romantic. And this in spite of its no-program basis. For the three movements are full of color and imagination that call out for literary significance. The second subject of the first is a melody that good Victorians would have called a song without words. There is a horn tune in the slow movement that Weber would love to put to good operatic use—or Wagner himself. There is a troll-dance-tune in the finale and an allegro that have the spontaneity of true inspiration. The harmonic texture is as opulent as ever, the rhythm as subtle. The whole is Bax at his best.

COLLEGIAN SINGERS AT SYMPHONY

Appear in Brahms' Festival Fourth Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A well ordered miscellany made last evening the fourth programme of the Brahms' Festival, now in progress at Symphony Hall, and those contributing to it were a small chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, Artur Schnabel, the pianist of the Festival: Margaret Matzenauer, notable contralto, and the Burgin Quartet. The audience, conspicuously enthusiastic, filled every seat.

WALTZES BY CHORUS

From the small chorus aforesaid there came, in excellent performance, certain of the delightful Liebeslieder Waltzes, Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, the two directors of these college choirs, playing in sympathetic fashion the four-hand pianoforte accompaniment.

Followed from Mr. Schnabel the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody that make Brahms' Opus 119, and in the playing of them Mr. Schnabel renewed, and here and there even strengthened the impression that he made last Sunday. Again there was reason to admire the virility of his rhythm, the clarity of his phrasing, the importance that he gave to every note while never sacrificing the larger effect. And it was possible again to note in his attitude an air of reverence, an almost devotional absorption in his task, that surely was not assumed. It is said that in his recitals abroad Mr. Schnabel refuses to play extra pieces, and so last evening he politely declined the audience's insistent and at length noisy demands for an encore.

With Mr. Schnabel to play the accompaniments, Mme. Matznauer sang five of the better known songs of Brahms. If to the frequenter of song recitals these pieces might, under certain circumstances, seem almost hackneyed, so often do they appear on programmes, last evening by singer and accompanist new beauties and new significances were disclosed in each one of them. Always is Mme. Matzenauer a great interpreter of songs, whoever the composer, and last night her magnificent voice was heard at its best. Seldom indeed is the climax of "Von ewige Liebe" of such thrilling effect as it was last evening.

For conclusion from the Burgins and Mr. Schnabel came the Piano Quintet in F minor, a work which, if not all that some of its admirers have claimed it to be, still deserves to be ranked with those of Schumann and Cesar Franck as one of the three outstanding pieces in its particular form. Though Mr. Schnabel did not permit the piano to overpower the other instruments, it was still to be felt that he was the dominating factor in an eloquent performance. There are passages, a few in the first movement and more in the last, where no performance can save the music from a certain perfunctoriness. But always the performers met the composer more than halfway and the charming Andante and the brilliant Scherzo were played with rare persuasiveness.

After all, Mr. Schnabel will be heard at a regular pair of Symphony Concerts—on Friday and Saturday of next week, when he will play the piano-part in an "all-Beethoven" program. The "Pastoral Symphony" will begin the concert; the third "Leonora" overture end it. Yes; the subscribers are to have their share of Mr. Schnabel.

night.

FOURTH CONCERT OF BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Burgin Quartet, Schnabel and Matzenauer Heard

The fourth program of the current Brahms Festival, given last evening to an enthusiastic audience which filled Symphony Hall, was composed of an admirably representative selection of his chamber pieces, in which the Burgin Quartet, Artur Schnabel, pianist, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Dr A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, as accompanists, took part.

Mr Schnabel played four piano pieces from opus 119, accompaniments for four songs sung by Mme Matzenauer, and the piano part in the Quintet, opus 34 a. The chorus sang some of the "Liebeslieder Waltzes."

In the intermezzi in B minor, E minor and C major, Mr Schnabel's remarkably poetic and sympathetic interpretations were memorable. It is doubtful if any pianist has ever played these pieces better than he did. Except for a hardness of tone in the brilliant opening measures of the E flat rhapsody, in fact, Mr Schnabel's playing throughout the evening was wholly admirable.

The audience tried in vain to get him to break the rule against encores which prevails at all concerts given by the Boston Symphony. As the orchestra did not itself appear last night no doubt most people forgot that the rule would prevent encores.

Mme Matzenauer, in four of Brahms' finest songs, "Sapphische Ode," "Von ewiger Liebe," "Immer Leiser" and "Meine Liebe ist Gruen," sang with emotional intensity and musical understanding. Her voice retains its beauty of quality. She nowadays is less often betrayed than of old into using excesssive volume of tone. Nobody nowadays is less often betrayed than of old into using excessive volume of tone. Nobody one can recall has in the past 15 years sung "Immer Leiser wird mein Schlummer" here more poignantly than she. The audience recalled her many times, but she, too, was bound by the no-encore rule.

Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth, both excellent pianists, played the four-hand accompaniment of the "Liebeslieder" well. The chorus carried out skillfully Dr Davison's conception of the music. Instead of treating these pieces as so many simple waltzes he wishes them sung with many nuances of rhythm and phrasing. Interesting as his version of the music is, one wonders whether it is quite what Brahms had in mind.

The Burgin Quartet played so well in the Quintet that one regretted anew the failure of this admirable organization, composed of leading members of the Boston Symphony, to offer a series of quartet concerts here. Now that the Flonzaleys have retired, Boston does not regularly hear any string quartet as good as this one. Surely an opportunity like that so finely taken by the Kneisel Quartet years ago awaits the Burgin Quartet. But it must find a Maj Higginson willing to undertake its concerts, as he did those of the Kneisel Quartet, as the paying public for chamber music concerts in this country is woefully small and undependable.

The Brahms Festival will end tonight with the performance of the Rhapsody for alto and chorus, the first piano concerto and the C minor Symphony.

P. R.

BY MOSES SMITH

The Brahms Festival was brought to a close with its director, Serge Koussevitzky, enveloped in a blaze of glory that took on the aspects of a conflagration. To use plain English, when the last chord of the C minor Symphony had sounded, the audience broke into a demonstration of applause, cheering and stamping that lasted several minutes.

One of the remarkable features of this demonstration was that it came at the close of a very long concert, which had begun 20 minutes late, so that normally the commuters would have made a rush for the last train. But the surge—no pun intended—was entirely spontaneous. It had its origin not in recognition of an especially brilliant performance of a piece (as was the case with Schnabel's magnificent piano-playing), but in the desire to express gratitude to an untiring, imaginative, brilliant leader, who was most responsible for this remarkable festival.

The closing program—to get down to details—included the Symphony as aforesaid, the Rhapsody for Alto, male chorus and orchestra to Goethe's "Aber Abseits Wer Ist's?", and the First Piano Concerto in D minor. The solo singer in the Rhapsody was Mme. Matzenauer, who was even more nobly impressive than in the songs of the preceding evening. With the Harvard Glee Club and the superb orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky she gave a beautiful performance.

The pianist in the Concerto was the indefatigable Mr. Schnabel. As in his previous appearances, he so moved an audience with his artistry and power that the outburst of applause was like a thunderclap.

Nor was the performance of the Symphony a lull after this storm, despite the lateness of the hour, Mr. Koussevitzky's penchant for "dramatizing" Brahms music was here most fitting. A technically brilliant orchestra carried out his every wish.

MUSIC

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Brahms festival took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: "Liebeslieder" waltzes for pianoforte duet (Mr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth), and four vocal parts (small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society). Piano pieces: op. 119—intermezzo, B minor, intermezzo, E minor, intermezzo, C major, rhapsody, E flat major (Arthur Schnabel, pianist). Songs: Sapphische Ode, Von ewige Liebe, Immer leiserwird mein Schlummer, Meine leibe ist gruen (Margaret Matzenauer). Pianoforte quintet, F minor, op. 34a (Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin string quartet).

Again an enthusiastic audience that completely filled the hall, an audience impartial in its distribution of applause, and by its rapt attention during each performance paying, after all, the highest tribute. The waltzes were a revelation to some who had known the composer only by his austere, granitic works. If they expected waltz melodies after the manner of Schubert, Lanner or Johann Strauss, father and son, they could not have been reasonably disappointed, so admirable was the interpretation. Especially noteworthy were the pure, fresh virginal voices of the Radcliffe girls. How admirably, how musically this little chorus had been trained! The varied colors of the girls' costumes, artistically contrasted, delighted the eye.

Some one, and one not ignorant nor unappreciative of Brahms's instrumental works, had the courage to say that the composer would be longest and best remembered by his songs. The management of the Festival was fortunate in securing Mme. Matzenauer to sing the ones selected for the occasion. Her rich, luscious voice and her technical skill were at the service of the composer, not merely for her own glory. Whether the song called for tenderness or passion; whether the spirit of text and music was contemplative or one of wild regret for days that would be no more, the singer gave each sentiment and emotion full expression with an intimacy of appeal. Here was a singer famous in opera, that worked an irresistible spell by her art and womanly feeling as a mistress of the Lied. Mr. Schnabel's sympathetic, beautiful accompaniments emphasized the worth of the music and the rare ability of the singer.

Mr. Schnabel played the Intermezzi and the Rhapsody with a fine understanding that was something more than painstaking dissection of the musical body. He was especially fortunate in the performance of the Intermezzo in E minor. His playing as a whole was more objective than subjective. Perhaps that is what Brahms demands, but could not the individuality of a pianist be fused with that of the composer? If tone did not always carry, but stopped abruptly, if tone did not always sing, that no doubt was due to a condition over which Mr. Schnabel had no control. In the piano quintet, which was for years a stumbling block to many admirers of Brahms, he showed himself again the true artist, regarding himself as one of five, all working together in eloquent preaching. The gospel according to Johanns.

The fifth and last concert of the Festival will take place tonight: The Alto Rhapsody (Mme. Matzenauer, male chorus and orchestra); piano concerto, D minor, No. 1 (Mr. Schnabel, pianist); Symphony C minor, No. 1. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky announces an all-Beethoven program for this week's Symphony concerts, on which the Pastoral Symphony, recently recorded for phonograph by the Boston Symphony, is the chief item. The soloist in the Fourth concerto will be the admirable pianist, Artur Schnabel, whose great artistic and popular success was an outstanding feature of the Brahms Festival last week. Mr Schnabel played this concerto with the Boston Symphony in 1923 under Bruno Walter, guest conductor.

The Brahms Festival, on the conspicuous success of which there is no need to dwell at length, must have added a considerable sum to the receipts of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony. The estimated deficit last Fall was $100,000 on the current season. Toward this sum not quite $84,000 had been pledged up to March 7. It is possible that the Brahms Festival will meet the rest of the deficit, if its receipts had not been calculated upon in announcing the

BRAHMS FEST BRILLIANTLY CONCLUDED

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

The Puissant Brahms Ends The Festival

High-Pitched Performance Brings An Evening Of Excitements

May 27 — Evans

EVENT belied anticipation. Not last Sunday afternoon, with the Second Piano-Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, but last evening with the First Piano-Concerto and the First Symphony, came the climax of the Brahms Festival. For a fourth occasion a notable audience filled Symphony Hall; was patient under fifteen minutes' delay in beginning—rare lapse from promptness in that seat of precision; from the outset gavé signs of latent excitement. It bubbled when Mme. Matzenauer was warmly and repeatedly recalled after she had sung the alto-part in the "Winter Rhapsody." It was in flow when Mr. Schnabel, long and heartily greeted, came to his place at the piano for the First Concerto. It beat higher when he had done, when Dr. Koussevitzky at last joined him, when both saluted the standing orchestra. It ran full tide at the close of the First Symphony, the concert, and the festival. The house rang with the plaudits. By the new Bostonian custom, feet now stamped for the conductor as they had for Mr. Schnabel. Shouts rose besides. Flowers were handed upward. Time and again Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled until at last the whole audience was on its feet for better acclamation. In his years at Symphony Hall, he has known many such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison.

By many a sign through these four concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky is establishing the occasional festival in the musical life of Boston. Three years ago the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death gave him first opportunity. Six concerts then assembled the symphonies, the mass, the chamber pieces of the master. They drew and stirred as much of the town as frequents symphonic music. The quality of performance ran high. When the conductor proposed a second festival, this time to the greater glory of Brahms, came doubts and fears. No centenary, no anniversary of any kind, gave it reason. Vaguely, as he knows Shakspeare, the man in the street knows Beethoven—and responds. Brahms, to him, is an unknown quantity. Many a page of Beethoven may thrill unpractised listeners. The approach to Brahms exacts musical background, a degree of musical culture. The Beethoven canon teems with masterpieces. There are not so many in the collected work of Brahms. A chorus, an orchestra, a conductor, a few solo-voices —and Beethoven may prevail. At the least, Brahms needs, besides, a masterful pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky persisted; Mr. Schnabel was at hand; not a doubt or a fear now stands justified. Again a festival has assembled and excited the musical town. Again the standard of performance has run high. Again as much of the achieving Brahms as could be compressed into five programs has held as many audiences intent. (Only the Haydn Variations were really missed.) On second occasion the end has crowned the work and the conductor, if for so long he tarries here, may go courageously forward to a third festival. Some predict Debussy. But is there enough of him and in sufficient variety? Moreover, "Pelléas and Mélisande" is essential; whereas Symphony Hall is no opera house. More probably, the manifold and inexhaustible Bach, with the Mass in B minor, through a whole generation unheard in Boston, for climax.

In the festival now ended there was reason to demur to some of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but he chose wisely when he set on the final list three of the more dramatic works of Brahms. The first was the so-called Alto or Winter Rhapsody—fragments of Goethe's poem "Winter Journey to the Harz," set for alto voice—Mme. Matzenauer's; men's chorus—from the Harvard Glee Club; the usual Brahmsian orchestra. One of the chosen fragments pictures a youth, within the poet's acquaintance, wandering the mountains in prey to anguished melancholy, self-reproach and misanthropy. The other is prayer to the kind gods that he be enlightened, stayed and comforted. The orchestra and the solo-voice sound the woes and the fate of the youth; the chorus in half voice enters the petitioning close. For Brahms, the music throughout is surprisingly dramatic and objective. Into orchestra and singing voice pass the youth's mental agony and spiritual stress, often in unmistakable accents of music-drama. Farther on, and the solo-voice is searching out his heart. The chorus flows deep and high in devout fervors; ends as in the descent of peace.

It pleased Brahms to talk now and again of an opera, to pretend to be groping for a suitable text. Though he frequented the theater, it was alien to him as field for composition. His clear, self-critical mind readily perceived that limitation. None the less, the "Winter Rhapsody" is clear proof of his occasional will, his commensurate ability, to make music-drama for the stage of the imagination. It was not less so with the graphic and passioned singing of Mme. Matzenauer; with the vocal background, warming and brightening, of the Harvard choir.

Then ensued the Piano-Concerto of Brahms's young years, the First, in D minor, with Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel and the orchestra with them mutually resolved to carry it in the grand style, the sonorous voice, the utmost release, at need, of tone and passion. The first movement ran in titanic conflict. The orchestra flung out its declamation; the piano, though it was but a single man—and a composer—answered and overtopped it. (Remember the superb trills between them divided). A seething, swirling music cried its passion of defiance and revolt; was hardly to be stilled when the piano at last adventured the gentler calming motiv. There was "development" that developed, inasmuch as each new measure had motion and meaning; sonorities that smote the air; rhythms that clove it; the sense, rare from Brahms, of incandescent phrase and tone. The "Winter Rhapsody," likewise from his younger years, had discovered him as dramatic composer. Now, through the first movement of the Piano-Concerto he raged in native wildness. Mr. Schnabel emerged as heroical pianist of boundless yet measured power; of conquering resonances that were never mere violence upon the ear; of great sweeps of tone out of which salient detail suddenly flashed. Or else they softened and stayed into some euphony with the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was riding a music of contrasts, now torrential, again rigid. The orchestra played as though pianist and conductor were looking over each man's shoulder. . . .

The foil was the beauty of the slow division, played by Mr. Schnabel with sensibility to every note and phrase, yet as though the whole were a chorale in noble and aspiring course. Under the conductor's hand and ear, the orchestra was his complement. They passed to the final Rondo, which is music of a semi-exhausted Brahms withdrawing within himself, recalled to the necessities of the occasion only when he must make a pianist's cadenza. Mr. Schnabel, who can be subjective as well as objective, followed him; yet would not have such an end to such a Concerto decline altogether into musical reflection upon three motivs. Underneath the fire still smoldered; the heroic voice yet spoke out. One and the other pianist and conductor have played this Concerto in Symphony Hall. It remained for Mr. Schnabel and Dr. Koussevitzky to transpose it into grandeur.

The First Symphony in C minor brought the end, with conductor, orchestra, and audience besides, lifted by the excitements of the evening well above themselves. Within memory the violins have not played with such wealth and unanimity of tone. The whole string choir, indeed, was full-rounded unity or measured diversity as the composer willed. The horns, the clarinets, the deep-voiced trombones, were truly Brahmsian. The valiant tympanist accomplished prodigies of rhythm. In turn, Dr. Koussevitzky could light and kindle, passion and dramatize, his Brahms, Nikisch-like; while no one, with reason, might say him nay in this First Symphony. The transition from the introduction to the first movement, the returns of the principal theme, the infusion into the musical structure of the second, gentler subject, the tossing rhythms, the distribution of harmonic and instrumental color—all, from orchestra and conductor, laid hold upon the imagination. Toward grandeur again was Brahms lifted; through the slow movement as well, where Dr. Koussevitzky does not spare vigor, though woodwinds and horns may sing never so musingly. The light, misty orchestral tone was veil of beauty upon the intermezzo-like Allegretto. Neither Nikisch nor Dr. Muck himself wrought more suspensively the slow introduction to the finale; received from the horns more mysterious, from the trombones more sonorous, tone. And the finale itself? There are some of us who love not Beethoven's jigging, shouting Ode to Joy to climax the Ninth Symphony, would fain have it end with the Adagio. For them, be it prejudice or blasphemy, Brahms's finale touches a spare and exultant grandeur—Dr. Koussevitzky has reason for his added horns and trombones—while Beethoven's blindly flails the air. And this is a Brahmsian time.

H. T. P.

Amusements

Concert-Chronicle

For First Hearing

TO a program of repetitions of novelties introduced during the last few months, Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday and Saturday of this week will add a single work as yet unheard anywhere—in fact not heard even by its composer until Tuesday morning of this week. The repetitions of works well in hand are easily explainable. Through last evening the orchestra and conductor have been busied—and that strenuously—with the Brahms festival. Rehearsal of other matters must needs be scant. Today alone can be given in full to the week's program. As result the program for the regular concerts lists the recently found symphony of Haydn, the sixth symphony of Sibelius, the new Schönbergian orchestration of Bach's prelude and fugue for organ generally known as Saint Anne's.

To these works Dr. Koussevitzky adds a new suite by Mr. Walter Piston, of the faculties of the Division of Music of Harvard University and of Radcliffe College. At last accounts it was rumored that Mr. Piston, who has experience with a baton, might conduct his suite. At the moment of writing these lines the final decision was still in the hands of the gods. Mr. Piston gives vigorous assurance that the suite is not in any sense programmatic. It is an adventure of themes pure and simple, through forms direct and clear. Its three movements are an Allegro, an Andante, an Introduction and Fugue. The piano is included as an orchestral instrument.

Continued on Page Fourteen

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Twelve

The first movement is light in character. Mr. Piston writes that it makes "some allusions to 'jazz,' but is not an attempt to write jazz nor to produce "American" music." A staccato figure in the bass makes beginning; more rapid figures are added. Above them, in a moment, bassoons sing the chief theme, definitely jazz-rhythmed. After some development, strings sing a slightly more lyrical theme, still phrased and accented somewhat jazz-wise. More development, and brass and percussion dissonantly repeat the chief theme. After this follows the middle section, introduced by a theme for 'cellos and containing many "solo phrases for various instruments and groups—oboes, solo violin, muted trumpets, trombone, etc., building up in a gradual crescendo." The return to the first part is introduced by horns and trombones, proclaiming fortissimo a rhythmically augmented version of the first accompaniment figure. After this the recapitulation takes normal course.

The second movement, Andante, is of a quiet nature. The heavier brass instruments, trumpets, trombones, tuba, are not used. Two themes are introduced very early, the first a flowing one by violas, the second, somewhat more sustained, by an English horn. Many times these two themes are alternated; through a number of simple phases of development they proceed.

The Introduction to the fugue begins at once with a motto of three notes, played by horns; they are strongly accented, each dissonant to the others. The introduction is dominated by this motto and grows through a crescendo to full orchestra. The subject of the fugue begins with these three notes. It is introduced by the second violins. The subject as a whole is interesting, after the first three notes light in character, well imagined. The counter-subject appears to be made up of a motif from the contrast theme of the first movement, together with a motif from the staccato figure of the very beginning. When the analytical interviewer, poring over the score with Mr. Piston, called his attention to this, the composer smilingly admitted the fact, but gave assurance that it had not been "consciously and intentionally so planned." Thus it is easy for commentators to see in music, erudite relationships which the composers themselves have never even thought of. On the other hand, probably among the finest unities to be found in music are those which the subconscious mind of the composer draws out of the material in hand, subtly repeating this or that, and handling it as if it were entirely new and fresh—which in such a case it would be to the composer.

Mr. Piston, in the course of his fugue, employs successively the various choirs of the orchestra. The original exposition is for strings alone. An episode which culminates in another entry of the subject, uses woodwinds and horns. A second episode, based on a rhythmic motif from the subject, goes to brass against a persistent bass in bassoons and piano. This time full strings enter with the subject, which is answered in the woodwinds. After another episode there are various powerful, climactic stretti leading to an energetic close for full orchestra.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand:

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Suite for Orchestra.....Piston
(The Composer Conducting)
Concerto, No. 4, in G minor for Piano and Orchestra.....Beethoven
(Pianist: A. Schnabel)
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday afternoon, April 4, and Saturday evening, April 5:

Symphony, No. 6, in F major ("The Pastoral").....Beethoven
Concerto, No. 4, in G major for Piano and Orchestra.....Beethoven
(Pianist: A. Schnabel)
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven

Incidents and Prospects

Twenty-one members of the Symphony Orchestra, who are also Frenchmen, have joined together as La Symphonie Française; made Abdon Laus, the bassoonist, conductor and Gaston Hamelin, the clarinetist, assistant conductor; announce a concert in Hancock Hall for Wednesday evening, April 30. Thirteen players in the new orchestra come from the string choir at Symphony Hall. The other eight comprise one flute, one oboe, one clarinet, one bassoon, one horn, one trumpet, two trombones. The whole makes a workable chamber orchestra.

Before the season ends, Dr. Koussevitzky is likely to produce, for the first times at any concerts, "Broadway," symphonic piece by Samuel Gardiner, the violinist and composer. By report it was placed next to Mr. Bloch's "America" in the competition in which that Rhapsody received first prize

Mr. Wendt will again return to Bos-

BOSTON CRITICISMS

1121

1929 Herald Nov 9

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1929

Cantabrigian Refinements

If Cantabrigians are given to counting their blessings, do they ever include Sanders Theater? Quite possibly they more often wish it demolished than cher-

Continued on Following Page

Hans. Amusements Nov 8

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

wise; but for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it affords an auditorium the like of which it would be difficult to produce. So one thought mus-ingly last evening while listening to the orchestra play Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, a suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. More than ever before Dr. Koussevitzky's handling of the orchestra approached—indeed, one sometimes thought exceeded—the refinements and subtleties of chamber music. Now in large halls such refinements are lost or minimized to dwarf-like and inconsequential proportions. In Sanders Theater last evening the music came forth with a wealth and richness of detail such as one would expect from the performance of an ensemble in a large private drawing room, but never from an orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians.

One might recite passage after passage in support of this thesis. Strings in "Egmont" repeatedly sounded like single instruments slightly amplified. Time after time woodwinds in "Firebird" breathed an intimacy which suggested much smaller proportions than those of the large concert orchestra. Of course, while Sanders Theater brings this sort of playing to its fullest realiation, it presupposes at least two other things to bring it into existence at all: an orchestra capable of such subtleties, such refined nuances, a conductor sensitive and able to draw them from the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky probably possesses no more desirable quality than his capacity for growth. At every stage one asks oneself, is anything further possible? Is there still a beyond which has not been attained? And in a matter of weeks or months comes the answer in something hitherto unsuspected. This fall it is increasing refinement towards the chamber-music ideal. And how perfectly wrought is this new high level. It does not militate against the best kind of orchestral fullness. It does not become cold in its perfections,—the warm-blooded Koussevitzky is guarantee against such misfortune. It does increase sheer artistry beyond belief.

Again, one seems to note this fall, together with the growth in sensibility, an advance in the universality of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations. As one listened last night, through the glories of Beethoven, the subtleties and sophistications of Stravinsky, the lush heats of Chaikovsky, one reflected also upon the downright, compelling truth of the handling of this music. Not through the evening did one detect a single "personal" reading. To tell after the composer, in fullest and most significant manner, the truth which that composer has tried to tell, that is after all the greatest achievement of such playing as that of last evening.

One must also write a paragraph upon the receptive qualities, the sure judgment of audiences. Time was, and not too long ago, when applause which caused the conductor to ask the men to rise to their feet, was an occurrence worthy of special note. In these latter days it occurs with a frequency which makes it almost a matter of course. And be it remembered, the audience is not speculating upon qualities of performance; the audience is responding spontaneously to what it receives. Last evening it was stilled after "Firebird" only when Dr. Koussevitzky brought the men from their seats. Again, after the third movement of the symphony there welled up a tide of approval against which Dr. Koussevitzky did not even attempt to raise the accustomed hand in request for continued quiet. Gravely he bowed acknowledgment and proceeded to the final lament of the symphony. A concert long to be remembered.

A. H. M.

Mr. Gruenberg, the composer, whose symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle" is heard at the current Symphony Concerts, prefers to be labelled American rather than Russian and sets high his labors for American music. An error of the linotypes on Thursday called the music of his tone-poem "pro" instead of "pre" Stravinskian.

Gruenberg Music Fails to Impress

Read Nov 9

This week's Symphony concert provides an afternoon of sheer contrast. At one end of the artistic scale stands Mr. Koussevitsky's apt and able reading of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major; at the other is "The Enchanted Isle," new and previously unheard symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg.

To Mozart, Mr. Koussevitsky brings grace and ardor, he maintains an agreeable sense of balance, he infuses his men with something of his own spirit and (what is even more important), with the very spirit of Mozart.

But Mr. Gruenberg's new poem contained little but sheer disappointment. Imaginative in theme, its treatment fell far short.

The remainder of the somewhat strangely balanced program was devoted to Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite" and to the merry pranks of Till Eulenspiegel as chronicled by one Richard Strauss.

Symphony Concert

The Pleasure Of Outspread Masterpieces

Strauss and Mozart Renewed At the Symphony Concert, Two Others Heard

THE ORCHESTRA of power that Dr. Koussevitzky sometimes drives before him was yesterday an orchestra of finesse. As at need he can infuse passion into its tone, so on Friday afternoon it gave him back poignancy. In "Till Eulenspiegel" are measures of piercing orchestral resonance; but nowhere in that piece does Strauss unroll the thick-bodied, full-throated periods at the close of "Death and Transfiguration" or through the middle section of the "Sinfonia Domestica." Above all else the orchestral voices in "Till" must be plastic and graphic, under which necessity they cannot also be fat. The Suite of Ravel from his ballet, "Mother Goose," is a succession of adroit felicities, finely woven, delicately pointed. Amusing the nursery—with the grown-ups clustering about the door—he does not raise his voice. Mr. Gruenberg's new tone-poem, "Enchanted Isle," containing nearly everything in the common stock of music, did deploy orotund moments. They were not many nor were they over-driven. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat began the concert. Throughout, it asks an orchestral tone that, whether it lightens or darkens, runs fleet or slow, remains limpid, piquant, naturally undulating. The shadows fall as in the Introduction; the skies brighten as from moment to moment in the first or the second movement, but the tonal landscape, so to say, is always luminous.

Consequently an afternoon of sensibility and virtuosity in the playing; of sensuous pleasure, in the hearing, that was warmth or piquancy to the soul. Mr. Gruenberg's scherzo-like pages, racing from shimmer to shimmer, sounded as in composing imagination he may have heard them. The streaming harmonies that suffuse the end of Ravel's Suite were magical in texture and color. Drug-like they beguiled the ear. The wistful measures of Hop-o'-My Thumb went as transparent as the child-like mood. The woodwinds in the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony were ravishingly sweet; the strings countered with finely pointed poignancy. The swiftness of the little orchestra in the Finale never once thinned tone or blurred accent.

Throughout "Till Eulenspiegel" an orchestra nearly a hundred strong played as though the conductor were manipulating an etcher's needle. (Not until the listener has heard Strauss's Rondo many times does he reflect how little it depends upon harmonic or instrumental color, how much and how often it is music of line and rhythm.) Here also was a tone that characterized as though Strauss's notes, generating it, were a vitalizing force. While the ear heard Till, the kindled eye actually saw him teetering, striding, sprawling. Indeed the only flaw upon the executive and the tonal perfection was the dulled rhythm of the "Pagodes"—wagging silly little heads as they pitty-patted over a dozen pages of Ravel's Suite. Seemingly, at Symphony Hall, only Dr. Muck caught the secret of those grotesque miniatures.

The masterpieces of the day—two of them!—were Strauss's tone-picture and Mozart's Symphony. When the historians cast up accounts for the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, they will surely reckon "Till Eulenspiegel" a triumph—perhaps the triumph—of objective symphonic music. In his other tone-poems, Strauss is primarily concerned with the inner sensations and emotions of his personages. The descriptive pages are incidental and external. For the most part he is writing what pedantic Germans call an Innigkeit-Musik. In "Till," on the other hand, his composing eyes are undetachably fixed upon the object. He may permit himself a few introductory measures of the "Listen-my-children-and-you-shall-hear" sort. He may further contemplate the emptied tonal scene, after a minor seventh has conducted Till into another world, with a half-gentle, half-sardonic smile. He may even lift his head for a more sardonic glance, while he is working at his etched tone-picture. Otherwise it, and only it, absorbs him.

To this day—and Till's Rondo is thirty-four years old—it remains the miracle and marvel of delineative music. To hear Strauss's rogue is to see him. The orchestra does not simulate him. It calls him into very life. Ear and imagination do not pant after a tonal narrative, clearer unfolded in the program-book. They are caught into it, carried along with it. All this, not in the fitful, fuzzy suggestion of most "descriptive" music, but with the incisive precision of black and white. With what wit Strauss works at his etching, with what enjoyment manipulates his orchestral acid and needle! In those days in Munich his friends used to liken him to a stripped mental and musical athlete all sinew without, all keenness within. "Till" is the enduring masterpiece of that fortunate condition. And Dr. Koussevitzky, now and again reproached as sentimentalist, can bite this etching in as though he had no other temperament.

In turn, the Symphony in E-flat is as clear characterization of the elder Mozart, who wrote it, unsuspecting, with death no more than three years away. He agreed to the conventions, followed the fashions of his musical time. Though one was a genius, one had also to live in the Salzburg of the Prince-Bishop or the Vienna of Emperor Joseph. Therefore the Minuet and the Finale heard yesterday—Mozartian readiness and fecundity, Mozartian deftness and shimmer and style. He must do his technical feat in a Finale that skips about rondo-like within nominal sonata-form. The Minuet, no less, flows and postures and flows again, with a silken elegance.

In these mature days—for him—Mozart lived also an inner life stressed and saddened. He loved beauty—for he made it—yet doubted whether it would endure; loved life, yet by the dread of death was ever haunted. His spiritual sensations were poignant; being such, they cut sometimes to the quick. Hence, the Introduction, the first Allegro, the slow movement of this same Symphony. There is beauty—till it hurts; pleasure but it passes; life—with death at the end. To listen to the darkling, low-voiced Introduction; to the first movement evading and deferring until that principal theme must come back like some dread fate returned; to the sweetness cut by swift poignancy in the Andante—so to hear is to believe and with Mozart imagine. In all his later music the Mozart of passion within, the Mozart of convention without, alternate or would blend. From the twenties onward, most of all in these final years, he was sensitive human being, finding thought and emotion in life—not the "sunny child" of the traditionalists or a "celestial spirit," whatever that may be.

For the other tw numbers, it was possible to wonder a little why, after intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky set Ravel's "Mother-Goose" immediately before Strauss's "Till." To hear, one after the other, was to find the conductor in reason. Ravel's "Children's Pieces"—to what precocious infants must the French give birth if the little Mimi and the little Jean (for whom they were written) really enjoyed them!—Ravel's "Children's Pieces" are as precise as "Till," shine with the same dry-clear light. Yet across another field; for the Parisian is fanciful and witty; whereas the Münchener is realistic and folk-humored, each, indeed, properly sensitive to subject-matter and composing purpose. Ravel's Ma Mère l'Oye wears a salon, a music-room, air; Strauss's Till braves it across the market place. Ravel's music is a music of minute felicities oftenest achieved by color; Strauss's cuts sharp and deep with line. Yet from each the pleasure that a many-sided orchestra should give and an open-minded audience receive. Though Beethoven's name stands on the keystone of the proscenium arch at Symphony Hall, under it we may also trifle.

The "common stock of music" is common phrase among reviewers in these days. By it they mean the procedures and idiosyncrasies of highly individualized modern composers—say Wagner, Strauss, Debussy or Sibelius—that have gradually become a common fund of matter and method. From it less endowed successors now daily draw. From it, in particular, Mr. Gruenberg drew liberally and steadily as he composed his tone-poem of "The Enchanted Isle." It abounds with everything that the listener can remember; while the original and veritable Gruenberg is hard to discover. And what a manifold, inexhaustible toy for such a composer, looking up from the stock-pot, is a modern virtuoso-orchestra! He can caress or he can whip it; "try out" choirs and separate instruments bring off this stroke or that for its own sake; dash in color; clothe king-like a singing theme that in itself is no better than a little naked boy; touch in and toss off—all for instant impression. What a game it is! How Mr. Gruenberg enjoyed it! And Dr. Koussevitzky. The audience as well. Long and loud, it clapped a modest, and maybe slightly surprised, composer, while the conductor beamed and beckoned. . . . It takes all sorts of compositions to make a program.

H. T. P.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was as follows: Mozart, Symphony, E flat major (K. 543); Gruenberg, "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Ravel, "Mother Goose" Suite; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Dr. Koussevitzky wisely reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart, as he did at the recent Beethoven Festival for that composer's first symphony when he gave a memorable performance. The performance yesterday of Mozart's Symphony is to be ranked with that playing of Beethoven's music, for exquisite proportion, euphony, and above all for creating—to use a phrase of Mr. W. J. Henderson's "The atmosphere of celestial beauty which surrounded the true Mozartian art." It is true that large orchestras were not unknown in Vienna when Mozart lived there. Seven years before the composition of the symphony played yesterday he spoke of one of his symphonies performed by an orchestra in which there were 40 violins, 10 violas, 8 violoncellos, 10 double basses, and wind instruments doubled; an orchestra of 200 took part in a performance of an oratorio by Dittersdorf; but as a rule the orchestras were small and compositions were planned accordingly. There were only twelve violins in all at the Vienna opera house; only six at the opera house in Prague when "Don Giovanni" was produced there.

Yesterday the various walks of the wind instruments were clearly defined, more so than if the instruments had been doubled for playing against 30 odd violins with other members of the quartet in proportion. For once the skill and taste with which Mozart employed the wind was disclosed to even the usually indifferent hearers, who were content enough if they saw "Mozart" on the program, feeling sure that no surprise would rouse them from genteel apathy. Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted many poetic or stirring performances of the old masters—if Mozart can justly be called an old one and not a modern—but never one more charming, more entrancing than that of yesterday. Mozart wished his music to "sound." Yesterday it sang. The finale had the dashing gaiety that characterizes his overture to "Nozze di Figaro."

Mr. Gruenberg wrote to us that having laid aside "The Enchanted Isle," projected during the world war; finding it on his return from Europe, he came across melodies and passages that brought back to him the wistful, romantic days of his youth. He determined to recapture "a whiff of these enchanted islands of memory." And so his isle was not far off in some far sea. Yet as the music was playing one hearer could not help remembering Prospero's Island as described by Caliban:

"The isle is full of noises,
Sounds and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not.
Sometimes a thousand twangling instruments
Will hum about mine ears; and sometimes voices,
That, if I then had wak'd after long sleep
Will make me sleep again."

(Mr. Gruenberg, though he believes that a composition should stand firmly as music without the aid of any literal or pictorial association as a prop, will pardon the intrusion here of Shakespeare).

It is no wonder that this symphonic poem, first heard at the recent Worcester festival, delighted the audience. Here is music by a contemporary that is melodious, imaginative, and, when contrast is required, poetically dramatic. Perhaps at the beginning the influence of Debussy is slightly shown; but it is hard for any modern composer with a poetic soul to escape wholly this influence. There is here no imitation; no obvious recollection; only a sympathy in expression. The idiom is modern, but healthily so. There is nothing morbid, naturally or designedly in Mr. Gruenberg's musical thoughts; nothing forced or labored in his expression of the thoughts. Melodically, harmonically and rhythmically the music is his own. Nothing to show mere ingenuity; nothing, by a barren exhibition of technical skill, to impress the pedant. The last pages admit apparently a few superfluous measures. It seems ungracious to say this when the work as a whole gave so much pleasure. This pleasure was enhanced by the modesty with which Mr. Gruenberg responded to the applause. He did not with the last chord jump frantically from his seat and with coat tails flying make a wild rush to the platform. He was slow in rising at Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation; he walked down the main aisle, shook the conductor's hand, bowed to the audience, and then, without grin or smirk, with his chest in his natural position, resumed his seat. And it is not impertinent to say that preparing and interpreting the composition of an American, native or adopted, Dr. Koussevitzky shows the interest, the zeal that he would bestow on a new work by a European or on an important classic, and puts it in the clearest, most favorable light by his genius for interpretation.

The charming suite of Ravel's and the rondo of Strauss brilliant in itself and by the performance completed the program of a most interesting concert. It will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments and Turkish music—to be played as a whole for the first time in Boston; Eichheim's "Burma" and "Java"—first time in Boston; Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe nov 9

Mozart, Ravel, Strouss and Gruenberg Pieces

Koussevitzky's Brilliant Readings of Modern Music Applauded

Dr Koussevitzky's brilliant readings of Ravel's "Mother Goose," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" made yesterday's Symphony concert unusually interesting. The program, a remarkably fine one, also included Mozart's E flat major symphony, which fared less well than the modern pieces at the conductor's hands.

Mr Gruenberg, whose home in is Brooklyn, was present to hear the first Boston performance of his tone poem, which was produced at the Worcester Festival last month. Dr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to come forward to share in the applause.

Mr Gruenberg, in a program note, explained his conviction that " a composition should stand on its own legs" unaided by verbal description. "The Enchanted Isle" is a revision of a piece written during the World War as a part of a projected series of four tone poems, "in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." The score has been published by the Juilliard Foundation.

This tone poem, scored for large modern orchestras, is fluent and well-written music, in a style which is sufficiently eclectic to remind the hearer of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky by turns. There are several finely imagined and eloquent passages, but these pages do not redeem the work as a whole from a certain vagueness and monotony of substance. It lacks dramatic unity. What one recalls afterward is a theme here, and a passage there, not an artistic unit.

One felt in listening to "Till Eulenspiegel" that this, if not the finest thing Richard Strauss has done, is certainly the best of his tone poems, and assured of a permanent place in the repertory. But it is dangerous work guessing at what will turn out to be the classics of our great granchildren. Dr Koussevitzky's keen feeling for dramatic contrasts, his ability to make music tell a story or paint a picture was admirably illustrated in his reading of this number, in which the orchestra played with splendid clarity and sonority.

Ravel's "Mother Goose," substituted on the program for the Spohr notturno for wind instruments, which is now scheduled for next week, also showed Dr Koussevitzky at his best. The brilliance and sonority he demands of the players in this seemingly delicate and tenuous music is quite in accordance with the way Ravel himself interpreted his works when heard here as guest conductor and as pianist.

But one wished yesterday that there had been more glamour and less intensity in the interpretation of the last number in this little suite. It failed to suggest "The Fairy Garden." Perhaps in Russia fairies are more strenuous and robust than they are usually supposed to be elsewhere, and disport themselves in gardens filled with California big trees.

Mozart's E flat major Symphony, the familiar one written in 1788, is a much greater masterpiece than yesterday's superficial and colorless reading of the first two movements would lead one to suppose. The pretty and relatively simple minuet, familiar to most amateur pianists, Dr Koussevitzky interpreted effectively, if without subtlety. But it was surprising to hear from him a reading of so great a work which was so thoroughly dull and mediocre. One often differs with him on details of interpretation, but very few times in the past five seasons has one found any reading of his uninteresting and wholly unimaginative.

The secret of Mozart is, of course, in his melodies, which must be treated with the utmost subtlety of phrasing and dynamics. Read in literal, pedestrian fashion, Mozart's music loses its power. One had only to call to mind the beauty and power of this symphony when Dr Muck conducted it, or to remember the Mozart conducting of Bruno Walter to realize that the trouble with yesterday's performance was with the conductor.

It is only fair to add that the Boston Symphony has never had a conductor who could do full justice to every composer. Dr Muck, for example, failed with Tchaikovsky and did not excel in modern French music. Dr Koussevitzky yesterday obviously had taken considerable pains with the Mozart. He had reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which Mozart wrote. He treated the whole work too much in miniature, forgetting that Mozart with his few instruments and his lack of sonority and emphasis was far more eloquent and far more profoundly emotional in this symphony than such composers as Lizst ever succeeded in being.

The program announced for next week includes two new pieces by Eichheim, "Java," and "Burma," preceded by Sophr's suite for wind instruments, and followed by Strauss' Symphony Domestica. P. R.

RG EXPERT 'OLAR TRIP IN ZEPP

, Coast Guard iceberg expert, who General McCarl to make the North with the party of scientists of the ition of the Arctic. The Zeppelin's

FIVE IN ONE FAMILY STRICKEN WITH DIPHTHERIA

MALDEN, Nov 8—Five children of Mr and Mrs Harry Carr of 8 Swan st have been stricken with diphtheria the last few days and one of them, Marjorie, 6, died this morning and was buried this afternoon at Forest Dale Cemetery.

Four other children, Hilda, Elmer, Leslie and Orrin are patients at the Contagious Hospital. Two other children, Charles and Harry, are under quarantine at home. The Board of Health is making an investigation of the source of the disease.

Post nov 9 BOS

LIGHTER PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Gruenberg's "Echanted Isle" Given a Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The unity of effect that Dr. Koussevitzky continually seeks in his programmes (although he may not always gain it), he successfully attained in the list prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, and this despite a last-minute substitution of Ravel's "Mother Goose" for Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments now put off until next Friday and Saturday.

PLEASING AND LIGHT

As it finally stood, the programme assembled Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the "Mother Goose" aforesaid and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," all of them, to speak in paradox, examples of the lighter side of serious music-making. Here was nothing cerebral, nothing to stir the deeper emotions. Here were pieces designed to give, in their diverse ways, a ready pleasure.

Mr. Gruenberg, a Russian born but brought to these shores in infancy, made yesterday his first appearance as composer in Symphony Hall. By token of his brilliant and witty setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" heard here two seasons ago, Mr. Gruenberg is to be regarded as one of the leading spirits among the younger generation of American composers. But "Daniel Jazz" is of the mature, full-fledged Gruenberg, whereas the symphonic poem of yesterday is a work of his salad days, his formative and assimilative period, recused from oblivion and remade by the composer in accordance with his more advanced conceptions of harmony and orchestration. But attempts at recapturing in later life a youthful state of mind seldom bear fruit.

"The Enchanted Isle," which had its initial performance at the recent Worcester Festival, emerges as a curi- styles and idioms, a

SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

THE best-balanced program of the year, one of the finest in recent years, features the Symphony concerts this week. A classic symphony, Mozart's in E-flat, opens it. A recent American composition, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," completes the first half. Then follow the French Impressionist Ravel with his "Mother Goose" pieces and the post-Wagnerian Strauss with "Till Eulenspiegel."

Only a single unfamiliar piece appears on this list—and that is enough for the general audience. If you averaged up the dates in which all the pieces were written you would get approximately the year 1878 as the average year—and that is a good average, too. In fact, the average is really a bit lower, since Gruenberg's work is by no means ultra-modern, as the listener would expect in advance.

The performance of this program was almost as brilliant as the choice. The orchestra played at the top of its bent, and Mr. Koussevitzky took as much pains with the miniaturist, Ravel, and the classic, Mozart, as with the sumptuous Strauss and Gruenberg. We cannot recall when the orchestra as a sounding instrument has been heard to better advantage than in "Till" as it was played yesterday.

And Mr. Koussevitzky gave an inspired reading of this ever-fresh tone-poem. He did as well by Ravel and Gruenberg. Only in the Mozart did he seem to "do things," to seek for hidden meanings, new shadings. He seemed to have lost faith in the ability of Mozart's score to impress the hearer with its drama; he seemed to find it necessary to over-dramatize it in order that it might be effective.

Gruenberg's piece left an excellent impression on its first hearing. The opening section established a mood definitely—and beautifully.

Herald nov 10

Dr. Koussevitzky For First "Monday"

LAST evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the first of the series of supplementary concerts that are given on Monday evenings. As on Fridays and Saturdays, and on Mondays in recent years, a house that appeared to be fully "sold-out" was present to greet him. And the term "'greet him" is on this occasion no idle phrase. For when Dr. Koussevitzky appeared, a great wave of hand-clapping welled up, which persisted through his numerous bows, and refused to subside until he made signs of turning his back on the audience and addressing himself to the music of the evening.

As at the first Friday and Saturday concerts of this year, Dr. Koussevitzky began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and ended with the same composer's fifth symphony. Between the two came moderns, Strauss with an interlude from the opera, "Intermezzo," Stravinsky with the suite from the ballet "Firebird."

Much comment and favorable has been made upon the conductor's Beethoven. Mr. Newman, here at the Beethoven festival of a few years ago, paid high tribute to it. One wonders what he would say to these performances with which the year 1929-30 is beginning. Last evening there were those in the halls who showed little enthusiasm at the prospect of hearing again the fifth symphony. Some of the same, seen again after the concert, said that they would not have missed this present fifth for anything that might have been substituted for it. Its high points are the last portions of the first movement and most of the last movement. The first movement grows and grows until it ends with a full-blooded weightiness that words cannot well describe. (After all, is it not the function of music to utter something that is crying for utterance, but which words cannot express?). And the last movement is nothing short of a blaze of glory. Between stands, of course, the expressive song of the 'cellos with its triumphant answer from winds, both repeated more and more elaborately; the scherzo with its humors variously; and then that long, tense, subdued ascent which leads to the blinding, overpowering finale.

An exceedingly pleasant bit of music is the interlude from Strauss's opera "Intermezzo." It is love-music,—of the musing wife thinking of her absent husband just before the arrival of the letter that will make her so suspicious, so jealous. But it is far from being a music of youthful passion. Domestic contentment, conjugal satisfactions, a feeling that all's well with the world as long as this wife and this husband remain "one", these emanate from the music. Once again Strauss is a painter in tones of a music of domesticity—not from many composers a theme for musical treatment. 'Cellos sing, other instruments sing, there are rich smooth harmonies, expansive transitions. And one says, "Isn't it nice? Indeed Strauss can write;" and passes on to the notes on the next number in the program book.

That next number last evening happened to be Stravinsky's "Firebird". A more suggestive music was never written. The story stands plain upon the pages of the score for those who can read,—and those who can hear. And last evening surely more than an average number must have been among "those who can hear." Surely there were none who did not experience the very feel of the greyness just bfore the dawn, with its spooks, its dartings of fireflies, its unexpected weird sounds, its uncanny mystery; who did not dance gravely with the gorgeous bird; who did not join him (perhaps better her) in supplicating entreaty to be freed from the hands and the embrace of the reconnoitering stranger; who could not see in the music the flashing golden apples and the princesses, released for the moment from the wicked sorcerer, at their innocent play with them. And then the play develops into a dance. (A tune to hum for those who desire it.) Music suave and graceful and sedate. Not a riotous dance, this. Riot indeed, is reserved for the final "Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei." All the hellish brood of that sorcerer is let loose. It is nothing short of bedlam. Pictorial music, all, from misty gray dawn to final rout; and played with as vivid a power of suggestion as though the orchestral pallette were for eye rather than for ear.

A. H. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A splendidly varied and balanced program opened the first concert of the Monday night series last night at Symphony hall. Beethoven's Egmont Overture opened the program. Interlude from Strauss's Intermezzo followed; then came Suite from Stravinsky's Fire Bird, and lastly Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was greeted by prolonged applause, before the concert, after each number, and at the close of the Beethoven Symphony by an audience which left no empty seats in the hall.

As was to be expected, the performance of the program was excellent. The Egmont Overture had brilliance and dignity, the Strauss Interlude poetically interwoven colors, the Fire Bird Suite furious excitement, dainty elegance, weird and exotic fantasy. Dr. Koussevitzky excells as much in his dramatic thrilling reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony as in his matchless interpretation of the glittering Stravinsky Suite. The Symphony marched on to relentless climax after climax, carried forward by splendid rhythm, glowing with an inner core of color that illumined every phrase. The precision and nuance at the command of the orchestra never ceases to inspire wonder and pride, and the players were forced to rise and share in the applause at the close of the concert. E. B.

113

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Nov 9

Mozart, Ravel, Strouss and Gruenberg Pieces

Koussevitzky's Brilliant Readings of Modern Music Applauded

Dr Koussevitzky's brilliant readings of Ravel's "Mother Goose," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" made yesterday's Symphony concert unusually interesting. The program, a remarkably fine one, also included Mozart's E flat major symphony, which fared less well than the modern pieces at the conductor's hands.

Mr Gruenberg, whose home in is Brooklyn, was present to hear the first Boston performance of his tone poem, which was produced at the Worcester Festival last month. Dr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to come forward to share in the applause.

Mr Gruenberg, in a program note, explained his conviction that " a composition should stand on its own legs" unaided by verbal description. "The Enchanted Isle" is a revision of a piece written during the World War as a part of a projected series of four tone poems, "in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." The score has been published by the Juilliard Foundation.

This tone poem, scored for large modern orchestras, is fluent and well-written music, in a style which is sufficiently eclectic to remind the hearer of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky by turns. There are several finely imagined and eloquent passages, but these pages do not redeem the work as a whole from a certain vagueness and monotony of substance. It lacks dramatic unity. What one recalls afterward is a theme here, and a passage there, not an artistic unit.

One felt in listening to "Till Eulenspiegel" that this, if not the finest thing Richard Strauss has done, is certainly the best of his tone poems, and assured of a permanent place in the repertory. But it is dangerous work guessing at what will turn out to be the classics of our great granchildren. Dr Koussevitzky's keen feeling for dramatic contrasts, his ability to make music tell a story or paint a picture was admirably illustrated in his reading of this number, in which the orchestra played with splendid clarity and sonority.

Ravel's "Mother Goose," substituted on the program for the Spohr notturno for wind instruments, which is now scheduled for next week, also showed Dr Koussevitzky at his best. The brilliance and sonority he demands of the players in this seemingly delicate and tenuous music is quite in accordance with the way Ravel himself interpreted his works when heard here as guest conductor and as pianist.

But one wished yesterday that there had been more glamour and less intensity in the interpretation of the last number in this little suite. It failed to suggest "The Fairy Garden." Perhaps in Russia fairies are more strenuous and robust than they are usually supposed to be elsewhere, and disport themselves in gardens filled with California big trees.

Mozart's E flat major Symphony, the familiar one written in 1788, is a much greater masterpiece than yesterday's superficial and colorless reading of the first two movements would lead one to suppose. The pretty and relatively simple minuet, familiar to most amateur pianists, Dr Koussevitzky interpreted effectively, if without subtlety. But it was surprising to hear from him a reading of so great a work which was so thoroughly dull and mediocre. One often differs with him on details of interpretation, but very few times in the past five seasons has one found any reading of his uninteresting and wholly unimaginative.

The secret of Mozart is, of course, in his melodies, which must be treated with the utmost subtlety of phrasing and dynamics. Read in literal, pedestrian fashion, Mozart's music loses its power. One had only to call to mind the beauty and power of this symphony when Dr Muck conducted it, or to remember the Mozart conducting of Bruno Walter to realize that the trouble with yesterday's performance was with the conductor.

It is only fair to add that the Boston Symphony has never had a conductor who could do full justice to every composer. Dr Muck, for example, failed with Tchaikovsky and did not excel in modern French music. Dr Koussevitzky yesterday obviously had taken considerable pains with the Mozart. He had reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which Mozart wrote. He treated the whole work too much in miniature, forgetting that Mozart with his few instruments and his lack of sonority and emphasis was far more eloquent and far more profoundly emotional in this symphony than such composers as Lizst ever succeeded in being.

The program announced for next week includes two new pieces by Eichheim, "Java," and "Burma," preceded by Sophr's suite for wind instruments, and followed by Strauss' Symphony Domestica. P. R.

'RG EXPERT 'OLAR TRIP IN ZEPP

, Coast Guard iceberg expert, who ieneral McCarl to make the North with the party of scientists of the ition of the Arctic. The Zeppelin's

FIVE IN ONE FAMILY STRICKEN WITH DIPHTHERIA

MALDEN, Nov 8—Five children of Mr and Mrs Harry Carr of 8 Swan st have been stricken with diphtheria the last few days and one of them, Marjorie, 6, died this morning and was buried this afternoon at Forest Dale Cemetery.

Four other children, Hilda, Elmer, Leslie and Orrin are patients at the Contagious Hospital. Two other children, Charles and Harry, are under quarantine at home. The Board of Health is making an investigation of the source of the disease.

Post Nov 9 BOS

LIGHTER PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Gruenberg's "Echanted Isle" Given a Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The unity of effect that Dr. Koussevitzky continually seeks in his programmes (although he may not always gain it), he successfully attained in the list prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, and this despite a last-minute substitution of Ravel's "Mother Goose" for Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments now put off until next Friday and Saturday.

PLEASING AND LIGHT

As it finally stood, the programme assembled Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the "Mother Goose" aforesaid and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," all of them, to speak in paradox, examples of the lighter side of serious music-making. Here was nothing cerebral, nothing to stir the deeper emotions. Here were pieces designed to give, in their diverse ways, a ready pleasure.

Mr. Gruenberg, a Russian born but brought to these shores in infancy, made yesterday his first appearance as composer in Symphony Hall. By token of his brilliant and witty setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" heard here two seasons ago, Mr. Gruenberg is to be regarded as one of the leading spirits among the younger generation of American composers. But "Daniel Jazz" is of the mature, full-fledged Gruenberg, whereas the symphonic poem of yesterday is a work of his salad days, his formative and assimilative period, recused from oblivion and remade by the composer in accordance with his more advanced conceptions of harmony and orchestration. But attempts at recapturing in later life a youthful state of mind seldom bear fruit.

"The Enchanted Isle," which had its initial performance at the recent Worcester Festival, emerges as a curious mixture of styles and idioms, a mingling of other men's methods which in the process have lost their rightful savor.

Special Officer Manning

Arlington

PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

THE best-balanced program of the year, one of the finest in recent years, features the Symphony concerts this week. A classic symphony, Mozart's in E-flat, opens it. A recent American composition, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," completes the first half. Then follow the French Impressionist Ravel with his "Mother Goose" pieces and the post-Wagnerian Strauss with "Till Eulenspiegel."

Only a single unfamiliar piece appears on this list—and that is enough for the general audience. If you averaged up the dates in which all the pieces were written you would get approximately the year 1878 as the average year—and that is a good average, too. In fact, the average is really a bit lower, since Gruenberg's work is by no means ultra-modern, as the listener would expect in advance.

The performance of this program was almost as brilliant as the choice. The orchestra played at the top of its bent, and Mr. Koussevitzky took as much pains with the miniaturist, Ravel, and the classic, Mozart, as with the sumptuous Strauss and Gruenberg. We cannot recall when the orchestra as a sounding instrument has been heard to better advantage than in "Till" as it was played yesterday.

And Mr. Koussevitzky gave an inspired reading of this ever-fresh tone-poem. He did as well by Ravel and Gruenberg. Only in the Mozart did he seem to "do things," to seek for hidden meanings, new shadings. He seemed to have lost faith in the ability of Mozart's score to impress the hearer with its drama; he seemed to find it necessary to over-dramatize it in order that it might be effective.

Gruenberg's piece left an excellent impression on its first hearing. The opening section established a mood definitely—and beautifully.

Herald Nov 12

Dr. Koussevitzky For First "Monday"

LAST evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the first of the series of supplementary concerts that are given on Monday evenings. As on Fridays and Saturdays, and on Mondays in recent years, a house that appeared to be fully "sold-out" was present to greet him. And the term "greet him" is on this occasion no idle phrase. For when Dr. Koussevitzky appeared, a great wave of hand-clapping welled up, which persisted through his numerous bows, and refused to subside until he made signs of turning his back on the audience and addressing himself to the music of the evening.

As at the first Friday and Saturday concerts of this year, Dr. Koussevitzky began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and ended with the same composer's fifth symphony. Between the two came moderns, Strauss with an interlude from the opera, "Intermezzo," Stravinsky with the suite from the ballet "Firebird."

Much comment and favorable has been made upon the conductor's Beethoven. Mr. Newman, here at the Beethoven festival of a few years ago, paid high tribute to it. One wonders what he would say to these performances with which the year 1929-30 is beginning. Last evening there were those in the halls who showed little enthusiasm at the prospect of hearing again the fifth symphony. Some of the same, seen again after the concert, said that they would not have missed this present fifth for anything that might have been substituted for it. Its high points are the last portions of the first movement and most of the last movement. The first movement grows and grows until it ends with a full-blooded weightiness that words cannot well describe. (After all, is it not the function of music to utter something that is crying for utterance, but which words cannot express?). And the last movement is nothing short of a blaze of glory. Between stands, of course, the expressive song of the 'cellos with its triumphant answer from winds, both repeated more and more elaborately; the scherzo with its humors variously; and then that long, tense, subdued ascent which leads to the blinding, overpowering finale.

An exceedingly pleasant bit of music is the interlude from Strauss's opera "Intermezzo." It is love-music,—of the musing wife thinking of her absent husband just before the arrival of the letter that will make her so suspicious, so jealous. But it is far from being a music of youthful passion. Domestic contentment, conjugal satisfactions, a feeling that all's well with the world as long as this wife and this husband remain "one", these emanate from the music. Once again Strauss is a painter in tones of a music of domesticity—not from many composers a theme for musical treatment. 'Cellos sing, other instruments sing, there are rich smooth harmonies, expansive transitions. And one says, "Isn't it nice? Indeed Strauss can write;" and passes on to the notes on the next number in the program book.

That next number last evening happened to be Stravinsky's "Firebird". A more suggestive music was never written. The story stands plain upon the pages of the score for those who can read,—and those who can hear. And last evening surely more than an average number must have been among "those who can hear." Surely there were none who did not experience the very feel of the greyness just bfore the dawn, with its spooks, its dartings of fireflies, its unexpected weird sounds, its uncanny mystery; who did not dance gravely with the gorgeous bird; who did not join him (perhaps better her) in supplicating entreaty to be freed from the hands and the embrace of the reconnoitering stranger; who could not see in the music the flashing golden apples and the princesses, released for the moment from the wicked sorcerer, at their innocent play with them. And then the play develops into a dance. (A tune to hum for those who desire it.) Music suave and graceful and sedate. Not a riotous dance, this. Riot indeed, is reserved for the final "Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei." All the hellish brood of that sorcerer is let loose. It is nothing short of bedlam. Pictorial music, all, from misty gray dawn to final rout; and played with as vivid a power of suggestion as though the orchestral pallette were for eye rather than for ear.

A. H. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A splendidly varied and balanced program opened the first concert of the Monday night series last night at Symphony hall. Beethoven's Egmont Overture opened the program. Interlude from Strauss's Intermezzo followed; then came Suite from Stravinsky's Fire Bird, and lastly Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was greeted by prolonged applause, before the concert, after each number, and at the close of the Beethoven Symphony by an audience which left no empty seats in the hall.

As was to be expected, the performance of the program was excellent. The Egmont Overture had brilliance and dignity, the Strauss Interlude poetically interwoven colors, the Fire Bird Suite furious excitement, dainty elegance, weird and exotic fantasy. Dr. Koussevitzky excells as much in his dramatic thrilling reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony as in his matchless interpretation of the glittering Stravinsky Suite. The Symphony marched on to relentless climax after climax, carried forward by splendid rhythm, glowing with an inner core of color that illumined every phrase. The precision and nuance at the command of the orchestra never ceases to inspire wonder and pride, and the players were forced to rise and share in the applause at the close of the concert. E. B.

113

INFORMATION OBSCURED

114

FIRST MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Symphony Opens Series With Admirable List

The current series of Monday evening Symphony Concerts had its beginning at Symphony Hall last evening, and there was the to-be-expected enthusiastic welcome to Dr. Koussevitzky, as he made his first appearance upon the stage. In that it commenced with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and ended with that composer's Fifth Symphony, the programme resembled that which opened this year's regular series of Symphony Concerts some five weeks ago. The other items, culled from subsequent programmes of that series, were the Interlude from Strauss' opera "Intermezzo" and the suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet "The Fire-Bird."

Regarded as a medium to display conductor and orchestra to the best advantage, the programme of last evening served its purpose admirably. As before, Dr. Koussevitzky was singularly happy in his reading of Beethoven's Overture, and if his version of the Fifth Symphony is in some ways an unconventional one it stresses admirably the romantic and dramatic side of the music. As for the scintillant music of Stravinsky, it could scarcely receive at any hands a juster, more illuminating presentation and an appreciative audience continued its plaudits until Dr. Koussevitzky brought the orchestra to its feet to share in them.

Like that of a previous Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, last evening's audience received gladly the music of Strauss, which this year made its first appearance on the programmes of the Boston orchestra. An autobiographical domestic comedy, "Intermezzo" discloses an aspect of Strauss' artistic nature little evidenced elsewhere. The Interlude which in the opera first accompanies and then serves as postlude to the evening musings of the wife left at home while her husband pursues his career as conductor in a far-off city. The music, of innate simplicity and charm, is made with a mastery granted to few composers, whether of our own or another day and, artless as it seems, an exceeding artfulness has gone into the fashioning of it.

SYMPHONY OPENS MONDAY SERIES

First Program Is Given Brilliant Performance

An audience which left very few vacant seats gave Dr Koussevitzky an enthusiastic welcome at the opening of the first concert of the Boston Symphony's annual Monday evening series.

The program contained as its only "novelty" the Interlude from Richard Strauss' recent opera, "Intermezzo," to which Friday and Saturday subscribers have already been treated. This is suave and polished but supremely unimportant music, reminding one of the more sentimental portions of a Viennese light opera. Perhaps it is unreasonable to expect an extract from a work which was intended as little more than a light and amusing diversion to be anything more than this. Certainly, despite its graceful insignificance, it is impossible not to enjoy the almost insolent skill that went into its weaving.

An intensely dramatic performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture had opened the concert stirringly, with moods admirably established and sustained and with emphasis effectively placed, if a trifle too vigorously insistent. The same composer's ever-popular 5th symphony stood at the foot of the program. It was performed with all the brilliance and energy to which Dr Koussevitzky in this work has accustomed his audiences.

His interpretation is planned with evident care—with an obvious desire both to clarify the structure of each movement and to let slip no opportunity of producing an effect to which the music may seem to lend itself. The result is sometimes illuminating; inner parts usually submerged are occasionally brought to light; the effect seems often excessively strenuous, but it is always alert and alive.

Stravinsky's Suite from the ballet "L'Oiseau de Feu" (Stravinsky of the vintage of 1910, of which the composer of today, with his neo-classic austerity, is probably ashamed) lent a note of legendary glamor to the evening's proceeding. The uncannily ingenious orchestral and harmonic coloring, and the pungently racial thematic material to which it is applied, never fail of their effect. Last night Dr Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave the work a most brilliant and imaginative performance, to enthusiastic and prolonged applause.

The second concert of this series will take place Monday evening, Dec 2.

Nov 16

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, N

Symphony

Old and New, East, West, and Spohr Besides

Strauss of "The Domestica," Eichheim of The Orient, At Symphony Hall

THE STRANGENESS of the stage to the incoming eye, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, matched the subsequent strangeness to the ear of Mr. Eichheim's tone-poems of the Orient. In both "Java" and "Burma" he employed native instruments that he had himself collected — gongs, metal bars and tubs, bells, other means to fine and novel resonance. From front to rear, they filled the right-hand corner of the stage, where usually the harps rise in gilded state. The interlopers were yet more golden; while upon brightly painted or lacquered stands most were disposed. Were the sun permitted to enter the concert room and had it fallen upon what one wit named "the Eichheim Collection," gongs, tubs and tables would have flashed back a manifold radiance. As it was, they gleamed uncommonly bright through the neutral atmosphere of Symphony Hall on a wet November afternoon as though this shimmer was counterpart to their light or gently dissonant tinkle.

To swell this strangeness Dr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon with the Nocturne that Richard Strauss suggested to him as worthy of resurrection from Spohr. It was played upon twenty-odd instruments, woodwind, brass, percussion, clustered and set well back in the center of the stage; while the empty chairs and desks of the string choir yawned about them. Indeed, not until the intermission had cleared the stage of Oriental spoil, did it resume its normal aspect, with the full orchestra of Strauss for the "Sinfonia Domestica"—a mere 108—in customary place.

Spohr's Nocturne occupied the listeners, and need occupy the reviewer, only briefly. Taking second thought, Dr. Koussevitzky prudently reduced the six numbers to four, excising an Adagio and a Polonaise, retaining a March, a Minuet, an Andante (with variations) and the Finale. As it was, before these "selections" had run course, the relatively narrow, and here undiversified, timbre of the wind choir began to cloy; while Spohr's neat little, tame little, melodic ideas endured not too well his elegant expansions. If Spohr began music-making as contemporary of Beethoven, he ended that calling as contemporary of Mendelssohn. Now and again the ear caught, or fancied that it caught, a Mendelssohnian finesse and felicity in the elder composer's uses of the wind choir and there was modicum of interest, pleasure—and speculation. Why, for example, did Spohr overlook the flutes and give all his best, or his virtuoso, measures—as in the Variations—to the clarinets or the oboes? At moments also he was ingenious when the bass-drum, padded lightly along in the background or the horns deepened a shallow music.

Spohr wrote the Nocturne for the entertainment of a rich man of business in Vienna; evidently believed him easily entertained; utilized, seemingly, whatever matter came slipping off his pen. To him the treatment was everything, and throughout the Nocturne is apt and neat. Yet Mozart, in his house-music for the great and rich of Salzburg, has many times the better of it. The kindly disposed made a mental note of "quaint" against this first item of the afternoon; the more irritable or austere demurred impatiently. One guardian of the temple—and frequenter of the theater—even declared that if she must hear "this sort of thing" at Symphony Hall, then Kern did it better than Spohr. Strauss, however, who brought about the resurrection, always was a connoisseur of wind instruments. "I like to listen to them," he told a friend when he was conductor at the Royal Opera at Berlin and was plodding on a sultry evening through "Lohengrin."

Mr. Eichheim's new tone-poems out of Java and Burma, measurably renewed the illusion, wonder and delight of his first "Oriental Impressions," seven years back. Then he, and we listeners with him, were discoverers of musical sounds touching the ear with strange softness and sweetness, caressing it with subtle dissonance, jangling upon it swiftly and suddenly, by all three holding imagination spelled. Both the new pieces are fresher, more original, graphic and poetized than the "Chinese Legend" of 1925. As occidental composer, Mr. Eichheim tends to a Debussyan idiom. It wore not too persuasively the Chinese trappings in which he would then dress it. In "Burma" and "Java" is relatively little trace of that Parisian speech and he resorts to it, primarily, as conveyance for his Oriental discoveries.

Beyond this pitfall escaped, another opens. "Java," for example, unfolds from motivs heard and noted there or elsewhere in Malaysia. From them Mr. Eichheim draws a series of variations. Before they have all come to pass, he has exhausted his material. The hearer catches himself listening only for the strange resonances of metal, in gong or tub or bar, struck by bright-colored, padded sticks. "Burma" suffers less by this limitation—because it is briefer and pithier, because it is more impressionistic and, as it seemed to an outsider, less dependent upon native motivs.

"Burma," moreover, was plentiful in a new interest—of rhythm. Two of the four short divisions are dances: grotesque for the Councillors; sinuous and spiralling for the Maids of Honor; while a third—of the Prince and the Princess—goes in stately motion with ritual-like flourishes. Now these rhythms are novel and piquant to Occidental ears, giving to the music a new beat, to fancy a new compulsion. They renew the strangeness that the first "Oriental Impressions" diffused. Again comes the notion that in this Oriental music is not a little that Occidental composers have yet to discover, employ and impart to audiences. At the outset of "Java" is similar rhythmic surprise. We listen to rice-pounders, and the swirling rhythmic patterns of their blows are intricate and singular.

Elsewhere, "Java" more gains the ear by the concord or the discord, the color and suggestion of novel, subtle timbres. A gong is tapped and the answering note is strangely bright, light, clear and sweet. From a bar and the bamboo resonator beneath proceeds as rare and as musical a sound. Other of these native instruments are touched, contrasted, blended. The notes fall super-subtle, super-shaded; lend a strange, soft glitter to the customary instrumental and harmonic vesture, upon which they are sewn like little stars. There are resonances and radiances in these Javanese timbres that as yet our ears hardly perceive; yet even so are surprise to the imagination. Mr. Eichheim discovers, adjusts, reveals; thereby enlarges less the bounds, than the sensibilities of music. He renews the adventure on a larger, bolder scale in the introduction to "Burma" and listening ears are filled with new resonances, dissonances and suggested mood.

Re-playing, for the second part of a long concert, the "Sinfonia Domestica," Dr. Koussevitzky renewed for Strauss the fine, true discriminating service that he did last month for Chaikovsky in the "Pathetic Symphony." It is easy to deride the tone-poem, when as yesterday, that picturing of Dr. and Mrs. Strauss, of Jacquingasse, 10, Vienna III., follows close upon such musical exoticism as "Burma" and "Java." It is equally easy to emphasize what some call the jocular, and others the vulgar, aspects of "The Domestica." There are German analysts who harp upon "drastic tone-picturing"; English, as well, who profess to know how, when and where the child is bathed and put to bed or husband and wife fall to querulous disputing. There are conductors, no less, who take cue for a similar reading; turn the final fugue into rude din and dissonance; set the clock to striking as though it were alarm for a lumbermen's camp; lard out the songful middle measures thick and greasy; with dull wits and heavy hands, begin and persist turgidly. From such performance the hearer departs ready to agree with the first detractor who happens to flaunt in his face the megalomania, the coarse humor, the tasteless egotism of the composer of "Ein Heldenleben" and this same "Sinfonia Domestica."

Such analysts, commentators and conductors read the tone-poem without the divination which is the only reason for their respective callings. Return to the final fugue and consider it as happy expansion of an awakening, morning mood, to be taken with animation, even exuberance, yet lightly, wittily, fancifully. Open the middle pages and find in them the zest and the passion of living when the artist creates or the man within him loves. Then release these ardent, full-freighted staves. Hark back to the unfolding of husband, wife and child in the motivs of the beginning. They are not semi-literal definitions, but the composer's fancy playing about his imagined household. Follow the course of the succeeding Scherzo and here is no obtrusive fiddle-faddle about "the baby's bath," but Strauss's fantasy upon homely happiness, as dreamful in its way as the sleep-chasings, so called, that link the middle ecstasies to the gay elation of the end. So to read "The Domestica" is to read it for the poetry implicit and discoverable within.

Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky opened out such a tone-poem; while the orchestra was its manifold voice. As from one who writes musingly, the individualizing themes took shape and substance. Under the conductor's light pace, rhythm and tone, the Scherzo was idyllic. Cleansed of thickness and heaviness, distilled into cumulating passion of musical sound, through the middle pages went the achievement and the affection which are the fulfillment of living. The tonal texture ran rich and clear; the orchestra pulsed and glowed. The dreamful voice again in the transitional passage; the striking of the clock as sounds faintly stirring through this mist. Then with upspringing hand and tone the bright exuberance of the final fugue. The true, universal, enduring "Domestica," the tone-poem as tone-poem, from Dr. Koussevitzky's perceiving mind, divining imagination and ordering hand. These with an orchestra that at the top of its bent, Strauss might, almost, have added to his vision.

H. T. P.

Herald

URDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1929

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Spohr, March, Minuet, Andante with variations, and Finale from Notturno for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music. Eichheim, "Java," a symphonic poem and "Burma" (conducted by the composer; first time in Boston). Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Symphonic and vocal music by Spohr was performed at the symphony concerts with a certain regularity up to the Nineties; but nothing by him has been listed on the programs since 1906 when Willy Hess played a violin concerto. Yet Spohr for many years cut a prominent figure in the musical world as composer and violinist; he was thought to be a mighty fine fellow in the concert halls. He agreed to this in his autobiography. Today he is known only by two or three violin concertos, a few anthems still sung in churches with choir of mixed voices, and, possibly the overture to "Jessinda." Little is known about the origin of his Notunro, extracts from which were played yesterday. Perhaps the work was composed for some court or other special occasion; perhaps for some orchestra proud of its wind choir.

The Theme with variations (which, transcribed, was performed here 70 years ago by the Mendelssohn Quintet Club) surely tests the proficiency of that orchestral section. Yesterday, it is needless to say, the performance was brilliant; one might justly say unsurpassable. Although the announcement that variations are to be played by an orchestra, violinist or pianist is calculated to strike terror in the soul of any hardened concert-goer. The art of the players yesterday lent interest to the music itself; the hearer refrained from saying aloud or thinking: "Old hat! Hear what Germans, who, Mr. Ludwig insists, are the most musical people in the world, enjoyed in the early years of the 19th century."

Mr. Eichheim, having acquainted the Symphony audience with music of China and Japan, visited Java and Burma for its benefit, studied the music of those countries, and brought with him Javanese instruments, which were added yesterday to those familiar in the West. No doubt this excellent musician, this enthusiastic admirer of Oriental music, will visit Sumatra and Borneo, and in a symphonic poem entitled "Borneo" will introduce the dance of the celebrated "Wild Men."

"Java" was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra last week. "Burma" is an enlargement of music written for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. In its concert form it consists of three exciting dances.

When Saint-Saens heard Javanese musicians at the Paris exhibition of 1889 he described their music as ravishing: "The little bamboo bells; the gamelang, a series of small tuned gongs struck with sticks enveloped in cotton; charm deliciously the ear. There are unexpected rhythms; it is dream music by which some have been hypnotized. What ought the ancient Hindu music to be, with its complicated and characteristic modes? No doubt the master work of oriental music, of that art which responds to a certain state of mind and civilization from which humanity goes farther and farther day by day."

It was manifestly impossible for Mr. Eichheim to reproduce in his symphonic poem, with a huge western orchestra, even with the addition of the instruments brought from afar, the mood that depends largely on the scene, the native players and even the costumes. He was obliged to westernize the music somewhat; yet the chief themes were unmistakably oriental, and the variations of the charming, wistful, Malayan song did not dispel the illusion, or the mood, inspired by that air. There was nothing incongruously academic in these variations; no attempt to show technical skill as encouraged in conservatories. There was no abandonment of the exotic.

But if the exotic delights the soul in the first moments, the prolongation of the mood is a foe to enjoyment. The most sympathetic hearers wish that the music would at last have a more western, even a more familiar flavor. In plain words, "Java" would gain in picturesqueness and charm if it were shortened. Mr. Eichheim knew what he wanted in the performance; the orchestra eloquently responded to his wishes. Warmly welcomed when he came on the platform, hearty applause recalled him after the performance.

Strauss' Symphony in which he dilates in tones on joyful, also harassing, domesticity is known to all. More or less ingenious commentators have told audiences what they should see and hear in Strauss's home; how he, his wife, their relatives, and the baby behave, in peace and in screaming argument. The child is put to bed; there is no passage in which one hears the father like Mr. Babbitt, singing in his bath. Nor is there any table scene, no hint at beer and sausage. In respect the Ode Symphony, "The Pl[illegible] by Jabez Tarbox, produced at San [illegible] in 1854, is a more realistic wo[illegible] the analyst John Phoenix is to b[illegible]lieved. The train has encamped f[illegible] night. "The unpacking of the [illegible] and mess-pans, the unyoking [illegible] oxen, the gathering about the [illegible] camp-fires, the frizzling of the p[illegible] are so clearly expressed by the mus[illegible] that the most untutored savage could [illegible]adily comprehend it. Indeed, so viv[illegible] and lifelike was the representation, that a lady sitting near us, involuntar[illegible]y exclaimed aloud at a certain [illegible]assage. 'Thar, that pork's burning!' an[illegible] it was truly interesting to watch the [illegible]ratified expression of her face when, [illegible] a few notes of the guitar, the pan was removed from the fire, and the blazing pork extinguished."

Strauss's themes are commonplace, but the orchestral dress in which they and their combinations are clad is gorgeous. The performance was of the virtuoso order and of the highest rank. The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give no concerts here next week. Mr. Burgin will conduct on Nov. 29-30 when the program will comprise Borodin's Symphony, B minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens's violin concerto No. 3 (Mr. Thibaud); Schmitt's Study for Poe's "Haunted Palace," and perhaps a suite from Hindemith's ballet, "The Demon."

EICHHEIM IS GUEST AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

THERE are only three numbers listed on the program for the Symphony concerts of this week, yet the music-making does not cease until two hours and ten minutes after it has begun. Nor is this long program tiresome, for each of the numbers had a special interest for the listener.

There are two novelties—Spohr's "Notturno for Wind Instruments and Janissarics Music," over a century old, and Eichheim's two Oriental pieces, "Java" and "Burma," heard under the composer's direction, for the first time in Boston. The second half of the program is devoted to Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which rather completes a Strauss Festival" begun with "Till Eulenspiegel" last week.

Spohr's music proved to be simple, quaint and charming. The instrumentation is not ingenious, for the composer does not single out each instrument with scrupulous regard for its possible timbres, yet the very combination of wind instruments alone is enough to give unusual color. This music is primarily entertaining, with an occasional flair for virtuosity, as in one clarinet roulade, which was brilliantly played by, we assume, Mr. Hamelin.

* * *

115

Symphony

Matinee Of Thibaud And Lesser Lights

A Master-Violinist, A Lacking Conductor, New Piece Mishandled

UNMISTAKABLY it was Mr. Thibaud's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. While the audience was cordial to Mr. Burgin, conducting as Dr. Koussevitzky's deputy, it was doubly warm toward the violinist. He was the first "assisting artist" of the season, and for such, though Dr. Koussevitzky usually banishes them, many still hanker. The Parisian, moreover, was remembered figure. Nearly every one recognized the tall, gaunt, life-worn presence when he came unobtrusively to his place beside the conductor's stand. In Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor—the chosen piece—the violin enters immediately. Mr. Thibaud had not played twenty measures before the familiar fineness of tone, the musical sensibility, the clear exposition, pleasured and absorbed the hearer. At each pause the applause was eager; at the end long and hearty; while in it the string choir—an audience of connoisseurs—quickly joined. The merciless program-book recorded the violinist as in his fiftieth year. Yet ear and hand on the one side, musical susceptibility and stylistic felicity on the other gave no sign of waning. Unlike many a violinist at middle age, Mr. Thibaud neither overdoes nor underdoes. At the golden mean he still sits in Gallic poise.

At first thought, the choice of concerto seemed disappointing. Three years ago, in Symphony Hall, Brahms's Concerto engaged Mr. Thibaud; five years back, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony"; in 1921 a Concerto of Mozart. Now he was returning to the Concerto of Saint-Saëns in which he made his début at the Symphony Concerts, ten years since. And in these days Saint-Saëns is a demoded composer, not too often heard in his own Paris. Readers of the program-book may have smiled doubtfully when it quoted some nineteenth-century German about the "stormy or the "intensified passion" here and there in this Concerto in B minor. At the end of the nineteen-twenties neither passion nor deep thought—as the cited Teuton also implied—is precisely the quality to be sought in Saint-Saëns's music. Yet other and more lasting traits still animate this third Violin-Concerto.

Under Saint-Saëns's hand the orthodox form is pliant not cribbing design. Measure after measure, page after page, flow forward, never faltering, never turbid. The musical content may not be remarkable or impressive, but economical are the means, astute the workmanship. Here a scholarly detail pleases; there an agreeable fancy; yet again an unexpected turn or an adroit euphony. The solo-violin shines out of the first movement; in the second, moves across the velvet background of the wood-winds; in the finale, gives the word of command to the whole orchestra. Passion there is not; but throughout just sentiment, tempered elegance, unfailing sense of style.

What Saint-Saëns put to music-paper Mr. Thibaud called to life in the concert-hall. His tone is fine-textured, and there is not a rough measure in the whole concerto. His ear and hand are quick to adroit euphonies; on Saint-Saëns's pages they abound. He shades and accents with a sensibility and a subtlety alert to the composer's every exercise in fancy or finesse. His clearness of mind—and tone—are mirror to substance, shape, sentiment, expanding and diversified. He shares the composer's economy and aptness. Where Saint-Saëns writes the just note, Mr. Thibaud plays it with as just voice and inflection. He is at one with the composer's precision and elegance; but he makes both less bloodless, since in his tone, as so much musical sound, there is life-giving beauty, a gently radiant tone withal to gild this measure now worn threadbare or that progression now running thin. And brittle never.

In the better days of the Comédie-Française, when a tragedy of Racine was acted, the charm of the voices; the felicity of the phrasing, intonations, cadences; the justness of the sentiment or the passion; the flawless measure, the stylistic poise of the whole, laid spell upon the listener. Less the woes of Phædra, Andromache or Berenice stirred him than the rising flow, the ebbing fall of this Racinian music. Similarly when Mr. Thibaud plays Saint-Saëns. The composer's "musical thought," as the learned call it, may be what it will—so long as from end to end the violinist glamours it.

The other numbers of the afternoon were less fortunate. There was the new Symphonic Dance," for example, from Wetzler's opera, "The Basque Venus," current show-piece in many concert-halls. Dr. Muck's audience in Hamburg rose to cheer it. Mr. Toscanini's in New York rent the reverberant air. A show-piece, however, requires showmanship in him who projects it—minor quality in such eminences as the German or the Italian conductor, present and serviceable none the less. It is altogether lacking in Mr. Burgin, intelligent, capable, sympathetic conductor that he proved himself in accompaniment with Saint-Saëns for Mr. Thibaud.

In Basque dances, Wetzler found his motivs; and they are vivid. With a modernist energy, he whipped them from rhythm to rhythm; diversified them with measures to suggest the spell, strange, fatal, irresistible, of Venus the Perturber. He dressed these motivs, repeated or developed, in the multifarious panoply of the modern orchestra. He accomplished that development in stinging progressions, biting harmonies, sudden discords, flicking timbres, nerve-racking climaxes. The outcome is undoubtedly a show-piece, but also current sensation in half the concert-halls of Europe and America. We Bostonians deserved also our excitement, but Mr. Burgin could set to the dance no displayful, nervous, vitalizing will. A laggard orchestra played it. Unjustly to composer and to audience, the whole went for naught.

Like misfortune overtook the processional movement from the Suite out of Rismsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel." The composer flings up rhythms; sets instrumental colors flaring; the more incisiveness, glare and tumult the better. The showman's hand is essential and, for fault or merit, Mr. Burgin can not ply it. Therefore the Wedding March came tamely off, while in the orchestra inertia sat plain. Nearer to the music was the deputy conductor's version of the drowsy scene in King Dodon's courtyard, broken now and again by distant sounds of war. Rimsky-Korsakov was master, at will, of drugging harmonies, lazy rhythms, somnolent timbres. He could perfume measures with the heavy scents, the thick sweetness, the languorous dalliance of the Orient. In such music he clothes Dodon's slumbrous noontide court, dresses the queen of Shemakha, and Mr. Burgin has a viable notion of it.

Again with Borodin's Second Symphony, much depends upon the conductor. Borodin was no master of symphonic design and development. Visions of a primitive, feudal, oriental, Russia floated before his imagination, sounded in his ears. He saw boyards in concourse and at feasts; heard the chants of minstrels above the throbbing guzzli. An opera, a ballet, even a symphonic suite, might contain and unfold this dreaming. Borodin preferred a symphony, repeating the chosen motivs; making heavy-handed play with them; depending for a motion, body, surface, suggestion, upon emphatic rhythms, changing harmonies and timbres. By reiterated beat, by diversified color he would prevail. Now Borodin, with all his passionate conceiving, is no Rimsky and no Ravel at such imaginative, resourceful workmanship. He remains half-articulate and muscle-bound. The conductor must release the voice, set free the movement, disperse the monotonies. In their time Dr. Muck and Dr. Koussevitzky have done what man may with this Second Symphony of Borodin. Mr. Burgin, intelligent and able musician though he is, lacks the vitalizing force, the projecting imagination to impose such a laboring music upon orchestra and audience. His error throughout the afternoon—the Concerto only excepted—was to play conductors', not composers' music.

H. T. P.

STRAUSS DOMINATES SYMPHONY

His "Domestica" Is Played With Uncommon Eloquence

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the outset of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert the stage of Symphony Hall presented a curious picture. Seated in the midst of a forest of unoccupied chairs and useless music-stands were less than a score of wind and percussion players, assembled to perform a resurrected Notturno of Spohr, while left stage, to speak theatrically, in readiness for Henry Eichheim's "Java" and "Burma," an array of red tables, heaped with glittering gongs, bells and bars, suggested a deserted Oriental bazaar.

ELDERLY AND TINKLING

The music of Spohr, more than a hundred years old but new to the Symphony concerts, proved to be in the last degree tinkling and innocuous. No doubt it pleased our great-great grandparents, who looked upon Beethoven as a dangerous fellow, and for that matter it pleased yesterday's audience, though it is kindest to suppose the applause was intended for the performance rather than for the music itself. And it was good to hear, for once at least, a portion of the wind-choir in isolation. In this the strings habitually receive more than their share.

This week for a third time a pair of Symphony audiences is being regaled with the musical fruits of Mr. Eichheim's Oriental journeys. Beyond that of any other composer is his mastery of translating the music of the East into the musical language of the West.

Slightly Monotonous

In "Java," his latest score, and in "Burma," music derived from a ballet performed not many seasons ago in New York, Mr. Eichheim has done his translating almost too faithfully. By common consent the music of Eastern nations, however seductive and fascinating some may find it, is by our standards monotonous, and the charge of monotony may well be brought against this most recent music of Mr. Eichheim's. Atmosphere he does obtain, however, and "Java" and "Burma" offer in abundance rhythmic and percussive effects, now exhilarating, now entrancing, while here and there they disclose harmonic and orchestral sonorities of singular beauty.

Mr. Eichheim, who again conducted his own music, was liberally applauded by his fellow-townsmen.

Strauss' "Domestica"

After the penny-whistle tunes of Spohr and the intense exoticism of Eichheim, the audience was ready yesterday for music closer to the current norm, and they received it in lavish, almost too lavish, quantity, since the hour was late, in Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," once maligned and ridiculed, but now an impressive contestant for first place among the Bavarian composer's symphonic poems. In "Till Eulenspiegel" of last week some felt that Dr. Koussevitzky missed in measure the characteristic humor, but of the warm humanity, the rich musical substance, the imposing architectural design of the "Domestica" not an iota escaped him.

The performance was, indeed, one of uncommon eloquence, and the audience showed itself sensible of that fact.

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS "BURMA" AND "JAVA"

Composer Applauded at Symphony Concert

Spohr Notturno for Wind Instruments and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica

Henry Eichheim was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert, where he conducted as guest his musical impressions of the Orient entitled "Burma," and "Java," played for the first time in Boston. Dr Koussevitzky's share of the program included Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments, and Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

Mr Eichheim, a violinist in the Boston Symphony from 1891 to 1912, has in recent years made several visits to the Orient, where he has studied the native music of Japan, China, Burma, Java, and India and collected native instruments. His "Oriental Impressions," and "Chinese Legend" have been played by the Boston Symphony in recent seasons.

"Burma" is a symphonic poem made by Mr Eichheim out of the incidental music he wrote for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. It begins with music intended to portray a twilight scene before a temple at Rangoon. Then follows a set of three dances grouped into what in Burma would be called a "Pwe," or entertainment offered in honor of a special occasion. The piece is scored for a large orchestra, to which gongs and percussion instruments brought by the composer from Mandalay and Rangoon were added yesterday.

"Java" is the first movement of an unfinished trilogy. It has an introduction intended to suggest the music by Javanese women on a hollow log, six feet long, used for rice pounding. The sides and ends of the log are struck with heavy clubs in intricate rhythms. Several native themes, with the aid of variations on them, furnish the material for the rest of the piece. In this piece Javanese instruments are added to the orchestra. They do not, however, include one of these rice-logs.

Mr Eichheim, unlike such European writers of pseudo-Oriental music as Rimsky-Korsakov, is thoroughly familiar with actual Oriental music. His themes and his percussion instruments are genuinely Oriental. What is more important, his imagination is saturated with the color and atmosphere of the Orient. No wonder then that his tone poems contain many passages that evowe that atmosphere even for listeners who have never been East of Suez. If they fail on the whole in blending the technique and the instruments of European music and those of the Orient the fault lies in the nature of things.

Suppose a patient and erudite native of Burma or Java, trained in the music of his own country, should come to America and hear the Boston Symphony, and Paul Whiteman's orchestra, then go home with a collection of saxophones, violins, trumpets, and so on, and try to write for a Javanese orchestra a set of musical impressions of such American scenes as the Harvard Stadium on a Saturday in November, or Park-st Subway at 5 p m. adding to his own orchestra his collection of European instruments. Would not the result be an imperfectly fused musical amalgam?

Spohr's Nocturne for wind instruments, probably written in 1812, was commissioned by a rich and presumably eccentric manufacturer. Dr Koussevitzky's revival of it was suggested by Richard Strauss, who caleld the piece to his attention last Summer. It served yesterday to test the virtuosity of the wood wind and brass players in the Boston Symphony. The suave and spineless character of the music, with its flabby themes and saccharine harmonies, showed clearly enough for Spohr's numerous operas, oratorios, cantatas and symphonies are now never played in public. Only the concert violinists keep his memory green by an occasional revival of one of his concertos, which, after all, are quite as good as the bulk of the violin virtuoso repertory.

Valiantly as Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra labored yesterday with Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, one could not but feel that it was too long, too elaborate, too pedantic a working out of musical material without profound significance. It is curious that this should be the sort of thing done in the 1900s by the man who in the 1890s could write music so vital, so splendidly dramatic as "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel." Strauss' music was badly placed on yesterday's program, after the long and exacting novelties by Eichheim and the dull show piece by Spohr.

So elaborate a work should be placed first on a program, even if latecomers had to be excluded for a long time. In New York and Philadelphia late-comers at orchestral concerts are not admitted until there is an intermission. Why are they in Boston permitted to troop into the hall midway in a piece, as they did yesterday during the Spohr, disturbing the 99 percent of the audience which had arrived on time?

P. R.

BURGIN LEADER AT SYMPHONY

Conducts Orchestra in Skilful Manner During Concert

In Mr. Koussevitzky's absence, Richard Burgin conducted the sixth symphony concert of the season yesterday at Symphony hall. He was more than adequate—and was greeted with gratifying and deserved applause.

The audience seemed particularly enthusiastic throughout the concert, and received with delight the orchestral suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or," which opened the program. Motifs from this colorful, melodic number have been plagiarized repeatedly, but they have not suffered. In their own setting they are exquisite.

The broad, moving beauty of Borodin's Symphony in B minor followed. It pleased the audience greatly, a mood for Slavic music having been established by the earlier piece.

Jacques Thibaud performed as guest soloist in Saint Saens concerto in B minor. His skill is amazing. The flawless performance of that sombre yet passionate piece brought rapturous applause from the audience.

Played for the first time in Boston, Wetzler's Symphonic dance in Basque style from "The Basque Venus," concluded the program. It is based on Prosper Merimee's story, "La Venus d'Ille," and comprises four Spanish dances that are vigorous, spirited and significant of the Basque country.

The program will be repeated this evening.

THIBAUD FINE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

JACQUES THIBAUD, as violin soloist, and Richard Burgin, as conductor in place of Serge Koussevitzky, take this week's Boston Symphony concerts out of the routine. Soloists, especially those of M. Thibaud's stamp, are none too common at these concerts, and they are the more welcome when they come.

It is probably more than a coincidence that Mr. Koussevitzky decided to "rest" when a violinist was scheduled for assisting arrtists. For Mr. Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, has in the past conducted with a fellow-violinist at his side. Yesterday between conductor and soloist, the Saint-Saens B Minor Concerto was given new life. M. Thibaud's silken tone, his faultless artistry, his aristocracy of style, are an old story. Mr. Burgin's support with the orchestra was, to say the least, sympathetic. And the performance was the more notable in that, we understand, there had been no rehearsal with the soloist. The audience was so enthuiastic that if it had been in a New York concert hall it would have cheered.

The concert had other points of interest. Rimsky-Korsakov began it with a Suite from his opera, "Coq d'Or." Borodin's Second Symphony, in B minor, followed. This Russian half of the program was well played by the orchestra. Mr. Burgin has acquired considerable freedom with the baton since his last appearance. He is more confident, more ready to impart his wishes to the men. As a result, Russian music did not sound dull, even though Mr. Koussevitsky was not at hand.

There was one novelty, and it was reserved for the last—a symphonic dance from a recent opera, "The Basque Venus," by Hermann Hans Wetzler, German composer. In a single movement, four dances, Basque fashion, are joined. The music is exhilarating, not to say wild. It is something more than a tour de force, for the native themes are ingeniously developed, with remarkably effective harmonic and orchestral treatment. For once, a novelty was whole-heartedly applauded.

BURGIN LEADS AT SYMPHONY EFFECTIVELY

In the absence of Mr. Koussevitsky, Richard Burgin conducts this week's Symphony concerts wisely and well. He has not set himself the easiest of tasks, for on his program stand Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or," Borodin's second symphony, Wetzler's dance from "The Basque Venus" and Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor, with Jacques Thibaud for soloist.

To the Rimsky suite, Mr. Burgin brought quick perception and brilliant execution. Discerningly, he brought out the fantastic quality of the suite. He stressed its essential sensuousness lightly. In short, he brought from it all the ingenuity that Rimsky put in, and that is no mean achievement.

With Borodin, it was excellence on excellence. Conductor and orchestra marked well the savage, barbaric passages, were not too heavy handed on those allenly delicate Russian interludes which crop up surprisingly.

116

Herald

URDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1929

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the sixth concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, the concert master, conducted. Jacques Thibaud was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, suite from "Le Coq d'Or"; Borodin, Symphony, B minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens, Violin Concerto No. 3, B minor; Wetzler, Symphonic Dance in Basque style from "The Basque Venus," an opera based on a story by Merimee. (First time in Boston.)

Some dismiss Borodin as an amateur in music; accomplished in his own profession; no doubt "fond of music", but far inferior to the other members of the "Big Five". Thus they do him gross injustice, as Handel unjustly slighted Gluck, saying that his own cook knew more about counterpoint. Borodin had not the academic training of Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov, but he wrote songs of exquisite beauty; here is the symphony played yesterday; there are pages of "Prince Igor"; there is a charming string quartet. No doubt in all these works, except the songs, a learned professor could point out some technical flaws, shortcomings and so on, but Borodin had musical ideas, imaginative, poetic; he was not slavishly bound to the theory that extreme nationalism is all-important; he knew and was proud of his country's history; he realized the value of Russian and Asiatic folk-songs; but he knew that music to endure for a time must pass national boundaries; that oriental flavoring must be for orthodox forms to please western ears; for nothing in music so quickly palls on the so-called civilized world as extreme and obstinate exoticism. Take the symphony in B minor, for example, of which The Finale is the least important section.

Only a composer of a poetic nature, a lover of the beautiful which includes fancy, could have written the Scherzo, the Andante, and much of the opening Allegro. In these pages there are fine harmonic and instrumental expressions that are Borodin's, not another's. The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" preceded, delightful music in large part, but chiefly so by reason of piquant instrumentation. The difference does not lie in the fact that Rimsky-Korsakov's music is for the opera house; Borodin's for the concert hall; it lies in the musical nature of the two men. Borodin while he was writing his symphony was also at work on his opera. It is not surprising that there are measures in the symphony that recall the Polovtsian dances with chorus in "Prince Igor"; but there is nothing in the symphony that can be called strictly operatic; nor is Rimsky-Korsakov in his happiest mood when he attempts in any one of his works to be strictly symphonic, although he put himself under a rigorous course of counterpoint, when he found out that he needed this instruction.

Mr. Wetzler, knowing that the scene of Merimee's "La Venus d'Ille" is not far from the Basque country, helped himself reasonably to Biscayan rhythms. He chose the Fandango, though it is especially a Spanish dance; the Zortzico, a complicated dance in which many join toward the end; Espatadantz, a Basque sword dance that admits pantomime; and for a Finale the Arin-Arin, the last figure of the Zortzico.

The suite derived from the opera was first performed at Hamburg under Dr. Muck's leadership. The Chicago orchestra gave the first performance in this country last February. The opera itself was produced at Leipsic last November.

As is the case with most suites when the dances are not in strong contrast, the earlier pages of Mr. Wetzler's symphonic dance are the most striking, the most musically interesting. When he comes to the furious pages of the Finale, there is chiefly a monstrous din in which distinctive rhythms are lost. The Fandango and the Zortziko are those portions of the work which are the most pleasing to the hearer; those which are most creditable to the composer. How closely this music expresses the Biscayan spirit and emotions is not for a New Englander who knows that land only through tales of travellers and novelists, and through illustrated print, to say. Ten years ago last April Mr. Laparra's "Basque Sunday" was performed here at a symphony concert. The composer was the pianist. The Scherzo was suggested by the game of Pelote. In the last movement there were allusion to the "Arin-Arin" and the "Espatadantza," but Mr. Laparra said that his aim was not so much to reconstitute the rhythms as to express the musical sentiment evoked in him by certain Biscayan aspects and customs. In Pierne's suites from his music for Coti's "Ramuntcho," selections played at a symphony concert early in 1922—"Rhapsody" was first performed here by the Boston Orchestra Club as early as 1910—there are Biscayan dance rhythms. Laparra's music is picturesque, worthy of the man that wrote the opera, "La Habanera." But the simple measure in which Azucena, when she is dragged by Ferrando before the Count di Luna, sings of her homeland bring Biscay nearer to us.

Saint-Saens is held in slight repute by the young lions who today roar their opinions about music, but he wrote an effective violin concerto, three piano concertos out of his five that are worth hearing, chamber music of excellent quality, a witty opera "Phryne" and other music that is not negligible. His third violin concerto still gives pleasure especially when it is played by Mr. Thibaud, the most aristocratic of violinists now before our public. Yesterday he was recalled many times.

Mr. Burgin had firm control of the orchestra. He conducted tastefully, with spirit, with authority. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings. Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first time in Boston). Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston). Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2.

H. Shapiro, Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Galpin, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest K. Ballard, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Reed, and Mr. Stanely Dunn of Boston, Mr. Herbert Johnson and Mr. Robert H. Coe of Worcester, and Mr. Frank Branco of all River.

Mrs. W. E. Gray of Boston is a guest the Chalfonte-Haddon Hall in Atlan- City, N. J.

30, 1929

THIBAUD SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Wetzler's "Basque Venus" an Orchestral Treat

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To set forth facts, the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought in Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, the first leader thus far to replace Dr. Koussevitzky this season, and in Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist, the first soloist to be heard in this first quarter of the 24 pairs of Symphony concerts. And to express an opinion, it also brought, in the symphonic dance from Hermann Hans Wetzler's opera, "The Basque Venus," the most arresting new piece of the year.

ENTHUSIAM IN AUDIENCE

Mr. Burgin's task in the pair of concerts he annually conducts is a difficult one. Audience and orchestra alike are more easily impressed by an "outsider" when it comes to the filling of Dr. Koussevitzky's shoes. Yet Mr. Burgin came through yesterday with flying colors. His programme, which, in addition to Wetzler's piece, listed the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Le Coq d'Or;" Borodin's Second Symphony and Saint-Saens' Third Violin Concerto, was shrewdly chosen. From first to last the orchestra responded nobly to his efforts, and the audience, as it chanced, was more consistently enthusiastic than it has been at more than one of the preceding concerts.

A goodly portion of this applause went, of course, to Mr. Thibaud, playing with familiar artistry, elegance, taste, musicianship and technical skill, the adroitly fashioned, superficially attractive music of him who has been called the French Mendelssohn.

Wetzler's Group Liked

But there was applause aplenty at the end of the concert for Wetzler's group of dances, a masterly symphonic development in the Straussian manner of tunes from the Basque country. After this brilliant, formidably difficult composition, most brilliantly played, Mr. Burgin, more than once recalled to the stage, bade his fellow musicians rise and share in the plaudits.

Cordial, too, was the reception accorded the suite in which, with Mr. Burgin as his spokeman, the grave-faced, bearded and be-spectacled Professor Rimsky narrated with the skill peculiarly his own these portions of a fable out of Russian legend, displaying to his enraptured listeners the magical and manifold tints of his orchestral palatte.

Borodin's Symphony

Indeed, it was in a way no kindness to Borodin to put his symphony of Russian chivalry after the music of his more accomplished, more resourceful and musically more erudite confrere. Heard with that of Rimsky fresh in the ear, Borodin's instrumentation sounded opaque, seemed lacking in contrasts, while there is in the score little symphonic manipulation of the themes, striking enough in themselves. Only the Andante, with its haunting song of the old troubadours, harp-accompanied, today holds fast the attention.

The Russian Five were not meant to write symphonies. In the opera, the symphonic poem, the orchestral suite and the song lay the fields for their talents.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Thibaud Applauded in Saint-Saens Concerto

Globe Nov 30

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert, making what has come to be his annual appearance in that capacity. In January, Eugene Goossens, and the Russian composer Glazunov will, it is reported, each conduct a pair of Symphony concerts as guest leaders. Dr Koussevitzky's contract is reported to permit him to entrust not more than three of the 24 pairs of concerts to other leaders.

Yesterday the appearance as soloist of the distinguished French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, offered some compensation for the absence of Dr Koussevitzky to those who think of concerts in terms of the notable personalities to be seen and heard. To those for whom the music is the chief thing at a concert, the admirable playing by the great orchestra under Mr Burgin's unassuming yet thoroughly competent leadership of an interesting program was wholly satisfactory One noted with interest, however, that a very large number of Friday subscribers had given their tickets to friends.

Mr Thibaud's interpretation of Saint-Saens' B minor concerto was warmly applauded. The violinist played with the type of sentiment and the suavity of style this music, essentially a salon piece, demands. For its technical exactions he was, of course, more than adequate. But Mr Thibaud's playing of Beethoven and Brahms on former occasions, has, however, roused more heartfelt admiration in the listener.

A suite of dances from Wetzler's opera "The Basque Venus" the novelty of the afternoon proved to be effective treatments of Spanish rhythms, scored for large modern orchestra, and given a highly spiced modern harmonic flavor. The composer, who was long a resident of New York, has not heretofore been represented on Boston Symphony programs.

The dances heard yesterday are drawn from an opera based on Merimee's story "The Venus of Ille." They may well take their place in the repertory with the many pseudo-Spanish works such as Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," Chabrier's "Espana," and Bizet's "Carmen" whose vivid rhythms and coloristic orchestration so delight audiences. Genuine Spanish music, from Vittoria to de Falla, is curiously somber and serious in tone compared to the non-Spanish composer's notions of what Spain in music should be like.

Yesterday's concert began with a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Le Coq d'Or," which made one wish that the Chicago Civic Opera, now once more possessed of a numerous ballet, would produce this work, still very agreeably remembered here by those who saw the single performance of it given by the Metropolitan Opera more than a decade ago. This opera and the "Scheherezade" suite are likely to prove the most enduring of Rimsky-Korsakov's many works. Mr Burgin had the orchestra play with an admirable deftness and clarity except in the march, which became turgid at moments.

The symphony of the afternoon, Borodin's Second, is said to bear marks of Rimsky-Korsakov's talents at editing the work of his gifted but amateurish friends among the Russian nationalist composers. Some have in recent years condemned Rimsky's editing of Musorgsky's "Boris" as tasteless and academic, yet, however superior the original version, now published at last, may seem to the one long known in our opera houses; it is certainly to Rimsky's editing that "Boris" owes the hearings that have given it world-wide fame.

Perhaps if Borodin had been able to speak for himself in the symphony heard yesterday, without the score passing as it did through the editorial hands of Rimsky and of Glazunov, his music might have had a harsher, more crabbed, more genuinely Slavic originality. As it stands, much of this symphony could easily be the work of Tchaikovsky, whom it was for a long time fashionable to run down as insufficiently Russian. Its qualities are his qualities, its defects, repetitiousness, failure to build up an imposing musical structure, and lapses into the commonplace, are his defects. The much talked of "Five" are less national than writers just before the W[illegible] made them out to be, and far less significant.

The real trouble with this Borodin symphony is that it no longer holds the listener's attention. Its idiom, once piquant and exotic, is hardly startling to ears accustomed to Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Its musical ideas are not sufficiently pregnant and powerful to compel attention of themselves.

The program announced for next week includes Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto; Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres;" Ravel's much-discussed "Bolero," and Schumann's Second Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct.

P. P.

116

Herald

URDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1929

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the sixth concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, the concert master, conducted. Jacques Thibaud was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, suite from "Le Coq d'Or"; Borodin, Symphony, B minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens, Violin Concerto No. 3, B minor; Wetzler, Symphonic Dance in Basque style from "The Basque Venus," an opera based on a story by Merimee. (First time in Boston.)

Some dismiss Borodin as an amateur in music; accomplished in his own profession; no doubt "fond of music", but far inferior to the other members of the "Big Five". Thus they do him gross injustice, as Handel unjustly slighted Gluck, saying that his own cook knew more about counterpoint. Borodin had not the academic training of Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov, but he wrote songs of exquisite beauty; there is the symphony played yesterday; there are pages of "Prince Igor"; there is a charming string quartet. No doubt in all these works, except the songs, a learned professor could point out some technical flaws, shortcomings and so on, but Borodin had musical ideas, imaginative, poetic; he was not slavishly bound to the theory that extreme nationalism is all-important; he knew and was proud of his country's history; he realized the value of Russian and Asiatic folk-songs; but he knew that music to endure for a time must pass national boundaries; that oriental flavoring must be for orthodox forms to please western ears; for nothing in music so quickly palls on the so-called civilized world as extreme and obstinate exoticism. Take the symphony in B minor, for example, of which The Finale is the least important section.

Only a composer of a poetic nature, a lover of the beautiful which includes fancy, could have written the Scherzo, the Andante, and much of the opening Allegro. In these pages there are fine harmonic and instrumental expressions that are Borodin's, not another's. The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" preceded, delightful music in large part, but chiefly so by reason of piquant instrumentation. The difference does not lie in the fact that Rimsky-Korsakov's music is for the opera house; Borodin's for the concert hall; it lies in the musical nature of the two men. Borodin while he was writing his symphony was also at work on his opera. It is not surprising that there are measures in the symphony that recall the Polovtsian dances with chorus in "Prince Igor"; but there is nothing in the symphony that can be called strictly operatic; nor is Rimsky-Korsakov in his happiest mood when he attempts in any one of his works to be strictly symphonic, although he put himself under a rigorous course of counterpoint, when he found out that he needed this instruction.

Mr. Wetzler, knowing that the scene of Merimee's "La Venus d'Ille" is not far from the Basque country, helped himself reasonably to Biscayan rhythms. He chose the Fandango, though it is especially a Spanish dance; the Zortzico, a complicated dance in which many join toward the end; Espatadantz, a Basque sword dance that admits pantomime; and for a Finale the Arin-Arin, the last figure of the Zortzico.

The suite derived from the opera was first performed at Hamburg under Dr. Muck's leadership. The Chicago orchestra gave the first performance in this country last February. The opera itself was produced at Leipsic last November.

As is the case with most suites when the dances are not in strong contrast, the earlier pages of Mr. Wetzler's symphonic dance are the most striking, the most musically interesting. When he comes to the furious pages of the Finale, there is chiefly a monstrous din in which distinctive rhythms are lost. The Fandango and the Zortziko are those portions of the work which are the most pleasing to the hearer; those which are most creditable to the composer. How closely this music expresses the Biscayan spirit and emotions is not for a New Englander who knows that land only through tales of travellers and novelists, and through illustrated print, to say. Ten years ago last April Mr. Laparra's "Basque Sunday" was performed here at a symphony concert. The composer was the pianist. The Scherzo was suggested by the game of Pelote. In the last movement there were allusion to the "Arin-Arin" and the "Espatadantza," but Mr. Laparra said that his aim was not so much to reconstitute the rhythms as to express the musical sentiment evoked in him by certain Biscayan aspects and customs. In Pierne's suites from his music for Coti's "Ramuntcho," selections played at a symphony concert early in 1922—"Rhapsody" was first performed here by the Boston Orchestra Club as early as 1910—there are Biscayan dance rhythms. Laparra's music is picturesque, worthy of the man that wrote the opera, "La Habanera." But the simple measure in which Azucena, when she is dragged by Ferrando before the Count di Luna, sings of her homeland bring Biscay nearer to us.

Saint-Saens is held in slight repute by the young lions who today roar their opinions about music, but he wrote an effective violin concerto, three piano concertos out of his five that are worth hearing, chamber music of excellent quality, a witty opera "Phryne" and other music that is not negligible. His third violin concerto still gives pleasure especially when it is played by Mr. Thibaud, the most aristocratic of violinists now before our public. Yesterday he was recalled many times.

Mr. Burgin had firm control of the orchestra. He conducted tastefully, with spirit, with authority. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings. Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first time in Boston), Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston), Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2.

H. Shapiro, Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Galpin, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest K. Ballard, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Reed, and Mr. Stanely Dunn of Boston, Mr. Herbert Johnson and Mr. Robert H. Coe of Worcester, and Mr. Frank Branco of Fall River.

Mrs. W. E. Gray of Boston is a guest at the Chalfonte-Haddon Hall in Atlantic City, N. J.

[illegible] S. Plumer of

R[illegible]

30, 1929

THIBAUD SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Wetzler's "Basque Venus" an Orchestral Treat

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To set forth facts, the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought in Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, the first leader thus far to replace Dr. Koussevitzky this season, and in Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist, the first soloist to be heard in this first quarter of the 24 pairs of Symphony concerts. And to express an opinion, it also brought, in the symphonic dance from Hermann Hans Wetzler's opera, "The Basque Venus," the most arresting new piece of the year.

ENTHUSIAM IN AUDIENCE

Mr. Burgin's task in the pair of concerts he annually conducts is a difficult one. Audience and orchestra alike are more easily impressed by an "outsider" when it comes to the filling of Dr. Koussevitzky's shoes. Yet Mr. Burgin came through yesterday with flying colors. His programme, which, in addition to Wetzler's piece, listed the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Le Coq d'Or;" Borodin's Second Symphony and Saint-Saens' Third Violin Concerto, was shrewdly chosen. From first to last the orchestra responded nobly to his efforts, and the audience, as it chanced, was more consistently enthusiastic than it has been at more than one of the preceding concerts.

A goodly portion of this applause went, of course, to Mr. Thibaud, playing with familiar artistry, elegance, taste, musicianship and technical skill, the adroitly fashioned, superficially attractive music of him who has been called the French Mendelssohn.

Wetzler's Group Liked

But there was applause aplenty at the end of the concert for Wetzler's group of dances, a masterly symphonic development in the Straussian manner of tunes from the Basque country. After this brilliant, formidably difficult composition, most brilliantly played, Mr. Burgin, more than once recalled to the stage, bade his fellow musicians rise and share in the plaudits.

Cordial, too, was the reception accorded the suite in which, with Mr. Burgin as his spokeman, the grave-faced, bearded and be-spectacled Professor Rimsky narrated with the skill peculiarly his own these portions of a fable out of Russian legend, displaying to his enraptured listeners the magical and manifold tints of his orchestral palatte.

Borodin's Symphony

Indeed, it was in a way no kindness to Borodin to put his symphony of Russian chivalry after the music of his more accomplished, more resourceful and musically more erudite confrere. Heard with that of Rimsky fresh in the ear, Borodin's instrumentation sounded opaque, seemed lacking in contrasts, while there is in the score little symphonic manipulation of the themes, striking enough in themselves. Only the Andante, with its haunting song of the old troubadours, harp-accompanied, today holds fast the attention.

The Russian Five were not meant to write symphonies. In the opera, the symphonic poem, the orchestral suite and the song lay the fields for their talents.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Thibaud Applauded in Saint-Saens Concerto

Globe Nov 30

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert, making what has come to be his annual appearance in that capacity. In January, Eugene Goossens, and the Russian composer Glazunov will, it is reported, each conduct a pair of Symphony concerts as guest leaders. Dr Koussevitzky's contract is reported to permit him to entrust not more than three of the 24 pairs of concerts to other leaders.

Yesterday the appearance as soloist of the distinguished French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, offered some compensation for the absence of Dr Koussevitzky to those who think of concerts in terms of the notable personalities to be seen and heard. To those for whom the music is the chief thing at a concert, the admirable playing by the great orchestra under Mr Burgin's unassuming yet thoroughly competent leadership of an interesting program was wholly satisfactory One noted with interest, however, that a very large number of Friday subscribers had given their tickets to friends.

Mr Thibaud's interpretation of Saint-Saens' B minor concerto was warmly applauded. The violinist played with the type of sentiment and the suavity of style this music, essentially a salon piece, demands. For its technical exactions he was, of course, more than adequate. But Mr Thibaud's playing of Beethoven and Brahms on former occasions, has, however, roused more heartfelt admiration in the listener.

A suite of dances from Wetzler's opera "The Basque Venus" the novelty of the afternoon proved to be effective treatments of Spanish rhythms, scored for large modern orchestra, and given a highly spiced modern harmonic flavor. The composer, who was long a resident of New York, has not heretofore been represented on Boston Symphony programs.

The dances heard yesterday are drawn from an opera based on Merimee's story "The Venus of Ille." They may well take their place in the repertory with the many pseudo-Spanish works such as Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," Chabrier's "Espana," and Bizet's "Carmen" whose vivid rhythms and coloristic orchestration so delight audiences. Genuine Spanish music, from Vittoria to de Falla, is curiously somber and serious in tone compared to the non-Spanish composer's notions of what Spain in music should be like.

Yesterday's concert began with a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Le Coq d'Or." which made one wish that the Chicago Civic Opera, now once more possessed of a numerous ballet, would produce this work, still very agreeably remembered here by those who saw the single performance of it given by the Metropolitan Opera more than a decade ago. This opera and the "Scheherezade" suite are likely to prove the most enduring of Rimsky-Korsakov's many works. Mr Burgin had the orchestra play with an admirable deftness and clarity, except in the march, which became turgid at moments.

The symphony of the afternoon, Borodin's Second, is said to bear marks of Rimsky-Korsakov's talents at editing the work of his gifted but amateurish friends among the Russian nationalist composers. Some have in recent years condemned Rimsky's editing of Musorgsky's "Boris" as tasteless and academic, yet, however superior the original version, now published at last, may seem to the one long known in our opera houses; it is certainly to Rimsky's editing that "Boris" ves the hearings that have given it world-wide fame.

Perhaps if Borodin had been able to speak for himself in the symphony heard yesterday, without the score passing as it did through the editorial hands of Rimsky and of Glazunov, his music might have had a harsher, more crabbed, more genuinely Slavic originality. As it stands, much of this symphony could easily be the work of Tchaikovsky, whom it was for a long time fashionable to run down as insufficiently Russian. Its qualities are his qualities, its defects, repetitiousness, failure to build up an imposing musical structure, and lapses into the commonplace, are his defects. The much talked of "Five" are less national than writers just before the W[illegible] made them out to be, and far less significant.

The real trouble with this Borodin symphony is that it no longer holds the listener's attention. Its idiom, once piquant and exotic, is hardly startling to ears accustomed to Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Its musical ideas are not sufficiently pregnant and powerful to compel attention of themselves.

The program announced for next week includes Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto; Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres;" Ravel's much-discussed "Bolero," and Schumann's Second Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct.

P. [illegible]

MONITOR DEC 16-

117

Boston Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky set an oddly assorted bill of fare before his paying guests at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth banquet of the season. For opening, he conducted Spohr's "Notturno for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music," op. 34. Then he yielded the podium to Henry Eichheim, a former violinist in the Boston band, who now spends much of his time in the Far East. Mr. Eichheim took advantage of the opportunity to conduct his two recent orchestral pieces, "Java" and "Burma." After the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky, who seems to be having a run on Strauss this year, returned to direct his forces in the "Sinfonia Domestica."

Dr. Strauss, indeed, had a further hand in the proceedings, for it was he, by report, who recommended the Spohr relic to the Boston conductor; hoping perhaps that it might find place on a program with one of his own compositions. Janissaries Music, as readers of Philip Hale's program notes learned, is Turkish music; that is, triangle, cymbals and bass drum. In short, this is military band music. It might well alternate with Beethoven's Turkish March in concerts for children. It is innocent, unpretentious stuff. Its chief interest lies in the variations of the Andante. It was gayly published by the wind [illegible] the United States.

choirs and gladly received by the Friday afternoon audience.

Mr. Eichheim has added two souvenirs to his memoirs of eastern travels. In his latest, the "Java," he joins to the usual orchestral instruments of the West those of the Javanese orchestra, including metal tubes, metal bars, marimba and gongs. These inevitably supply a certain color and atmosphere. The themes are native, but their harmonic treatment is that of the French impressionists. There is a great deal of repetition but no apparent development. We had always understood that Eastern music was very monotonous. Mr. Eichheim in "Java" gave us nothing to modify the impression.

The "Burma," written originally for a play, probably would be more expressive if heard in the theater. Of its two sections the first is a tone picture of "Twilight at Shwe Dagon." The impression left by this was not materially different from that made by the "Java." Both, we think, would be more effective if they were shorter. And it is possible that they would have profited if they had been conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky instead of the composer. Mr. Eichheim allowed the bells which accompany the entire twilight picture to be sounded so loudly that in the end they became annoying. Very likely this is the way they sound at Shwe Dagon. But Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt would have realized that, regardless of "realism," considerations of artistic balance required that they should be subdued. By the way, what do they do with sleighbells in Burma?

The remainder of the Burma poem consisted of three dances, making up a "pwé," or entertainment. These were more acceptable than the preceding measures, chiefly because they were shorter and yielded contrast among themselves. On the whole, Mr. Eichheim's impressions of the East are very definitely those of a traveler from the West, and we are not convinced that the attempt to make the twain meet by expressing the musical thoughts of the one in the musical idiom of the other is completely successful.

For conclusion, another nitid revelation of a Strauss score; in this instance, a score which would benefit by pruning—and this is not said because it came at the end of a program which endured for more than two hours. There are stunning pages, here are also dull pages here. But here were few dull moments in this efulgent performance. L. A. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERT

Martha Baird Soloist in Schumann Concerto

Globe Dec 3

Last night, in Symphony Hall, occured the second Symphony concert of the Monday evening series, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. As usual there was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Opening the program with Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, the conductor drew from his men their customary smoothness of tone and beauty of color. There are, however, those to whom Dr Koussevitzky's conducting is a thing unpleasingly studied, too definitely planned and posed. With not a note from the orchestra, the full emotional content of the music would have been vividly portrayed, now tensely dramatic, now languid. Surely music is enough in itself; it cannot need additional interpretation through plastic expression. The orchestra, however, admirably sustained the mood of the Lento, and to the Allegro it brought enticing grace.

The soloist of the evening was Martha Baird, already known to her Boston public thorough Jordan Hall programs. This time she was heard in the Schumann Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra. Unfortunately Miss Baird is not possessed of a tone of sufficient body to be altogether successful in appearance with so large an orchestra and in so large a hall. Again, one felt that her music was confined to two planes only. Gently she did her work, with a certain continuity, a certain tonal beauty. Occasionally she rose to bigger moments, but for the most part, it remained on a single level. However, she had the good taste to refrain from forcing, even if such restraint meant the sacrifice of interest.

The program closed with the Tchaikovsky "Symphony in B minor" (Pathetic), long a favorite with Symphony audiences. Here was emotionalism at its darkest. Sheer pathos against a background of storm and stress. Emotion grippingly sensuous; morbid sullen, relentless and inevitable, tearing its way along towards poignant climaxes. Rich and full was the Allegro con grazia, stormy the Allegro molto vivace, Well equipped, both technically and temperamentally were conductor and orchestra for an interpretation vivid and moving. A spell-bound audience waited breathlessly for a final note, then gave its customary tribute of delighted approval.

Some Men Have Hard Fists

He—Dearie, would this be an opportune time to ask your dad what my chances are?

She—Well, he's in his stocking feet.—Capper's Weekly.

Concert-Chronicle

For Second Monday

LAST evening at Symphony Hall the orchestra played its second Monday program. Upon that program stood Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra, in D minor, Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony in B minor. Between there was Schumann's concerto for piano, with Miss Martha Baird, favorably remembered from recitals in Jordan Hall, as soloist.

With Handel's concerto, through its

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Dec 3

Continued from Preceding Page

ing thus upon solid ground, devoting more attention to the general ensemble overture first majestic, then playful; its "air" of accustomed Handelian melodic felicities, broadly suggesting the grave sarabande; the succeeding rippling Allegretto, played last evening with muted strings; the final energetic Allegro; with all these the orchestra last eveping excelled itself. Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz,. Bedetti, as the "concertino," played with luminous tone of surpassing beauty. Orchestra and conductor were somehow especially on their mettle. And Handel gave them ample occasion.

Thus also with Chaikovsky's symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky has long been noted for his masterful way with this symphony. To its poignancies, its griefs, in first movement and last, he gives sympathetic and persuasive voice. Does it move to more ecstatic moments, he is in the lead. Does gloom give way for the moment to good cheer, the mood is his also. And the charm of its second movement, the elfin-like scherzo, the ascending march of the third have been, and are, his forte. And the men, to the last stand of the fiddles, are with him. Dr. Koussevitzky has given many surpassing performances of this symphony. That of last evening was no exception.

As new matter (for the season) came last evening the concerto of Schumann. Probably in a concerto the attention centers more upon the soloist than upon the music. And Miss Martha Baird, last evening, was the soloist. Be it said at once, Miss Baird played well. As upon several occasions in Jordan Hall, so now in this larger field, her technique did not falter, her tone held beauties. And her Schumann rang true. The energetic, rhythmic Schumann, the Schumann of far flung melodies and of tender sentiment was hers. And yet something seemed lacking. The answer is not far to seek. The background furnished by that superb instrument, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, dwarfed the soloist in comparison. When her turn came to dominate, there was no domination. It would be the part of wisdom for her to play with those orchestras, and they are not few, above which she can rise. And do not the Monday concerts deserve, let us say, a Thibaud or an Iturbi?

A. H. M.

Post Dec 3, 1929

SYMPHONY IN 2D MONDAY

Martha Baird, Pianist Soloist With Orchestra

Martha Baird as the soloist in Schumann's A minor Concerto for piano and orchestra was undoubtedly regarded by many as the outstanding feature of last evening's Symphony concert, the second of the current season's Monday evening series. But the playing of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony by the Boston orchestra in its present estate under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky must remain an event of major importance, even though the conductor's vivifying and poetizing way with the piece is no longer a new story to Bostonian ears.

For the matter of that, Schumann's A minor Concerto is scarcely a novelty hereabouts. Whether the marked warmth with which it was received by last evening's audience was tribute to the continued popularity of the music itself or to Miss Baird's playing of the solo portion may not be estimated. Certain it is that the young pianist, several times recalled to the stage, may well count last evening's reception another addition to the list of successes which she has achieved both here and in Europe. Nor was the enthusiasm unmerited. Miss Baird does not belong to the generation brought up in the Schumann "tradition," but she brings to the service of this music of an earlier and more romantic day an excellent and abundant technique and a fresh and youthful enthusiasm. That there was breadth and beauty in the orchestral support goes without the saying.

Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Opus 6, No. 10, recently heard at one of the regular pairs of Symphony concerts, began the programme of last evening and once again displayed the surpassing excellence of the orchestra's string choir.

No. 1.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of the Monday evening concerts this season last night in Symphony hall. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows:

Herald Dec 3

TR

Handel's Concerto Grosso op. 6, No. 10; Schumann's Piano Concerto (Martha Baird, pianist); Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

As the music by Handel and Tchaikovsky has been performed here recently and as the music itself is familiar to Boston's audiences, there remains little to be said except that the performance again excited enthusiastic admiration. Again the charming air and the joyous allegros of Handel; again the pathos and the splendor of Tchaikovsky's symphony made their irresistible way. The fiery, exciting March was played superbly.

Some have expressed the opinion in recent years that Schumann's concerto is not for large halls; that it is too intimate. Yet pianists of the first rank do not agree to this and those of lesser fame find the music grateful especially if they have developed a fine rhythmic sense. Miss Baird who gave a recital here last October displayed an agreeable touch and well-trained fingers.

The next concert of the series will be on Jan. 27.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Spoils From The East for Western Ears

To Symphony Hall Eichheim, Returned Anew, Brings "Java" and "Burma"

OLD HANDS when they read, a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, believed it no more than a preliminary run over the course. It read strangely; was sure to be altered, perhaps more than once. On the contrary, stood, and still stands, firm: Spohr's Nocturne for Wind Instruments as beginning; then Mr. Eichheim's two "Oriental" poems, "Burma" and "Java"; finally Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," battle-hoses that the conductor rides gladly. To these three novel pieces, then—for it contains that unusual number—with what tains that unusual number—with what speed and space we may. This article shall traverse the Orient early.

Henry Eichheim will be remembered by some for his "Oriental Impressions" and his "Chinese Legend," played here respectively in 1925 and 1926; by others from the fact that he belonged to the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1896 to 1912. He is now a world-traveller, though his legal residence is in Santa Barbara, California. As a composer he devotes his energies to the music of the Orient. Upon this week's program at Symphony Hall stand two of his latest works, "Burma," originally composed as music for a play by Irene Lewisohn at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in 1926, later enlarged and played by the Chicago, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia orchestras; "Java," entirely new, which the composer conducted for the first time at Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday and Monday last. In them Mr. Eichheim uses the instruments of the Gamelang or Javanese orchestra,—the bonang, made of twelve small metal tubes; the saron, seven heavy bronze bars on a resonator; the demong, seven bronze bars each under its own resonator; the gender, thirteen metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a marimba; five tuned gongs. These, by word of mouth from Mr. Eichheim, are "all authentic and used by the natives of Java. They were brought from Samarang and Solokarta. In playing them the natives sit on the floor." There are also Burmese instruments, "brought from Rangoon and Mandalay." Together these two groups of instruments fill most of the space where usually the last desks of violas have place; from there to backcenter of the orchestral platform. To play them there will be nine percussion-players, drawn from various choirs of the orchestra.

"'Java'" said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, "is the result of my last trip (1927-28) to the Orient, and is the first movement of an Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, 'Angkor,' depicting the masses of great temples in Cambodia, is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Cambodian architecture includes the most impressively beautiful temples in French Indo-China. The building left by the Khmers are a fruitful field for an artist to dream and think in. The effect at night of this dead grandeur was overpowering and fantastic in the extreme and a strange contrast to Chinese ruins, as for example the Temple of Heaven in Peiping.

"The finale of this Symphony, 'Bali,' is based on the brilliant and scintillating music of this people. It will be dedicated to Mr. Stokowski. Bali is a delightful paradise sixty by ninety miles in size, thirty-six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of all, then artists: goldsmiths and silversmiths, weavers, architects, painters, actors, musicians, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with hard hammers, while the Javanese use soft hammers. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is liquid and golden, the most beautiful music in the world. There are in it no edges or joints; it is an unending flow of entrancing sound. One never nears the impact of hammers, is never aware of the fact that the music is being made: rather is it like lovely streams that flow out of rocks—coming from nowhere, going nowhere; simply existing as a thing of sourceless beauty. Intricate rhythmical patterns follow one another with extreme logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, perfected art. For this art is the result of the tropically warm inspiration of a profoundly talented race.

"This last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Yangtze River. While I was there the war broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my cabin on the river-boat. One day, about five hundred miles from nowhere, I remarked upon the artistic beauty of an inscription in Chinese characters on the grass of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters which I had been admiring spelled the words, 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on these trips, by the way, not as a musician, but as a lover of Oriental architecture: Then I hear music; it may be of orchestras, it may be the song of peasants at work, or of vendors selling their wares on the streets. But when I hear them I make note of them. So this last trip yielded me about four hundred examples.

On the island of Java I attended a royal wedding of five princesses at Djokjakarta. The beautiful young brides were covered with priceless jewels, in costumes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and impressiveness, and ended only when the grooms carried the brides away in their arms. Forty days after the wedding there was an elaborate ceremonial celebrated by a three-day festival, lasting each day from six in the morning until ten at night. There were plays founded on the Hindu classics. There were dancing and the ceremonial music. Here was this golden music at its finest, played by one of the three best Javanese orchestras in the world. Through these long hours the orchestra was playing incessantly, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten impression upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"My 'Java' begins with the music of rice-pounders; a hollow log six or seven feet long, used for threshing rice, is struck by six women with heavy clubs. The resulting sounds have caused it to be used as a musical instrument. The sounds are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic patterns of asymmetric design. I use four of these rhythms in the introduction. Then after a transition there is a melody of five notes which I heard in the theater at Djokjakarta, which is the basis of the entire piece. There are also two counter-melodies heard in the courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' ends with a section depicting the calm of early morning at the Borobudur, the largest Buddhistic shrine in the world."

"Burma" is divided into two main parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe Dagon; (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists of three dances: I. The prince and princess, personages taken from the Hindu classics and appearing as principal figures in Burmese and Javanese stage plays. II. Grotesquerie. Grotesque figures in are part of all theatrical performances in Java and Burma. They relieve the tension of tragedy with their clowning add contrast. III. A final dance of the maids of honor. Said Mr. Eichheim:

"The beginning of 'Burma' depicts twilight on the platform of the Shwe Dagon, the most beautiful Buddhistic shrine in Burma, a huge golden spire. This twilight mood brings the peasants, the priests, the musicians, the boys playing ball, the water-carriers, the aged and the young, into the sacred precincts of this holy shrine. This teeming life is soon engulfed in the night and ends with the tinkling of the little bells that are suspended from the pagoda, swayed by the wind. The second part is composed of three dances and is called a Pwé. It is a form of entertainment common throughout Burma in which musicians and dancers and singers play their grotesque or serious music on platforms before a newly opened store, or at the house of a merchant who is celebrating the birth of a son, or some other festive occasion in Burmese life."

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

In the course of the season Dr. Koussevitzky is planning to repeat Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," first heard at the Symphony Concerts in February of 1927. Again the Harvard Glee Club will provide the chorus. Such a masterpiece should indeed escape the common fate of a single production. Their in-

"Eichheim of The Orient"

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week

He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translator of The Music of The Far East

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Herr Ludwig Spohr to Audiences of 1929

THE third novel number on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week—the other two are described elsewhere on these pages—is a piece for wind choir by Ludwig Spohr, composer once often heard at these concerts. In the days of Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture to his opera, "Jessonda," was played seven times; the eighth Violin-Concerto thirteen times, the ninth, nine times. Eight of his compositions had distinct place in the repertory—four of them violin-concertos, two overtures, two symphonies. The last Spohr performance occurred Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck conducted at his second pair of concerts in America. More recently, if memory does not slip Albert Spalding, the violinist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, possibly in Boston. In his time and long after there was no doubting his vogue.

Spohr was a contemporary of Beethoven for no less than forty-three years. For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beethoven's death not until 1827. But the two men did not meet until late in Beethoven's life. It is said that Spohr never fully understood or appreciated either Beethoven or Weber. But he was amongst the first to champion the cause of Wagner, giving early performances of "Tuelsching Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" against much opposition. He was also greatly interested in Schumann.

Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, composer of powers in his day considered extraordinary. As violinist he played one of his own duos concertante with Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of many of the noted violinists of the succeeding generation; wrote a "violin-school" which long remained a classic in pedagogical literature. As a conductor he was famous all over Europe. Like Haydn before him, he was once guest of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that when symphonies and overtures were performed, the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which when it was heard [nota bene!] had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin." This was the state of orchestral performance only a hundred years ago. There was actual conducting only "when the orchestra began to falter"! It was with some difficulty that Spohr persuaded the directors of the Philharmonic Society to allow him to conduct with a baton, in which method of conducting he was a pioneer.

Continued on Following Page

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Continued from Preceding Page

Spohr composed in all forms. His opus numbers mount to nearly one hundred and fifty. Best known among them was a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he stands in the vein-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert, he had a taste for harmonic color, for [illegible] modulations, for [illegible] chromatic [illegible] (at least) to modern ears, at [illegible] in favor, abound in his [illegible] that definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

Upon the title-page of the piece to be played tomorrow stand these words: "Notturno für Harmonie-und Janitscharen-Musik; Sr. Durchlaucht Herrn Gunther Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." In obviously literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony-and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary" music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . . ."

To Spohr then, in agreement with Grove above, "Janitscharen-Musik" was a kind of band rather than a type of composition. Final confirmation of this view comes from Meyer's [German] Lexikon, which under Janitscharen-Musik refers to Militär-Musik and there writes: "A type of music, or a reference to the kind of orchestra which accompanies troops. One distinguishes: Infantry-(Harmonie-formerly Janissary-) Music, consisting of woodwinds, brass, percussion, also glockenspiel; Hunting (horn-) Music, consisting entirely of brass, with doubled French horns; Cavalry (trumpet-) Music, in which woodwinds are lacking, alto-horns replace French horns, trumpets stand in the foreground and drums are added. Each of these types has its peculiar tone-color. Infantry-music with its high wood-winds is suitable for modern music; Hunting music sounds well for song-like cantabile melodies; for Cavalry music with its piercing trumpets and resounding drums marches are most effective." From which discussion it is apparent that Spohr's pieces might well be entitled in English, "Nocturne for military band."

Herr Doktor Richard Strauss, encountering Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last June, recommended the Nocturne. It falls into six divisions—march, minuet, andante with variations, a polonaise, an adagio, finale. The score calls for a triangle, bass drum and cymbals, piccolo, flutes, oboes, clarinets horns, trumpets, bassoons, double-bassoon and trombone. The polonaise adds a "corno di posta." The square-cut eight-and-sixteen-measure rhythms of most of these movements preclude, of course, the meandering style which has been charged against Spohr as his worst fault. Per contra, except in the variations and adagio he does not rise above the style of military band music. The Nocturne was popular in Spohr's day. In Boston, the Andante with variations was played in 1859 by the Mendelssohn Quintet.

Amusements

STATE

Mass. A—

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Spoils From The East for Western Ears

To Symphony Hall Eichheim, Returned Anew, Brings "Java" and "Burma"

OLD HANDS when they read, a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, believed it no more than a preliminary run over the course. It read strangely; was sure to be altered, perhaps more than once. On the contrary it stood, and still stands, firm: Spohr's Nocturno for Wind Instruments as beginning; then Mr. Eichheim's two tone-poems, "Burma" and "Java"; finally Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," battle-horse that the conductor rides gladly. To these the novel pieces, then—for it contains that unusual number—with what speed and space we may. This article shall traverse the Orient early.

Henry Eichheim will be remembered by some for his "Oriental Impressions" and his "Chinese Legend," played here respectively in 1923 and 1925; by others from the fact that he belonged to the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1910 to 1912. He is now a world-traveller, though his legal residence is in Santa Barbara, California. As a composer he devotes his energies to the music of the Orient. Upon this week's program at Symphony Hall stand two of his latest works, "Burma," originally composed as music for a play by Irene Lewisohn at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in 1926, later enlarged and played by the Chicago, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia orchestras; "Java," entirely new, which the composer conducted for the first time at Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday and Monday last. In them Mr. Eichheim uses the instruments of the Gamelang or Javanese orchestra,—the bonang, made of twelve small metal tubes; the saron, seven heavy bronze bars on a resonator; the demong, seven bronze bars each under its own resonator; the gender, thirteen metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a marimba; five tuned gongs. These, by word of mouth from Mr. Eichheim, are "all authentic and used by the natives of Java. They were brought from Samarang and Solokarta. In playing them the natives sit on the floor." There are also Burmese instruments, "brought from Rangoon and Mandalay." Together these two groups of instruments fill most of the space where usually the last desks of violas have place; from there to backcenter of the orchestral platform. To play them there will be nine percussion-players, drawn from various choirs of the orchestra.

"'Java'" said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, "is the result of my last trip (1927-28) to the Orient, and is the first movement of an Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, 'Angkor,' depicting the masses of great temples in Cambodia, is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Cambodian architecture includes the most impressively beautiful temples in French Indo-China. The building left by the Khmers are a fruitful field for an artist to dream and think in. The effect at night of this dead grandeur was overpowering and fantastic in the extreme and a strange contrast to Chinese ruins, as for example the Temple of Heaven in Peiping.

"The finale of this Symphony, 'Bali,' is based on the brilliant and scintillating music of this people. It will be dedicated to Mr. Stokowski. Bali is a delightful paradise sixty by ninety miles in size, a thirty-six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of all, then artists: goldsmiths and silversmiths, weavers, architects, painters, actors, musicians, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with hard hammers, while the Javanese use soft hammers. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is liquid and golden, the most beautiful music in the world. There are in it no edges or joints; it is an unending flow of entrancing sound. One never hears the impact of hammers, is never aware of the fact that the music is being made; rather is it like lovely streams that flow out of rocks—coming from nowhere, going nowhere; simply existing as a thing of sourceless beauty. Intricate rhythmical patterns follow one another with extreme logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, perfected art. For this art is the result of the tropically warm inspiration of a profoundly talented race.

"This last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Yangtze River. While I was there the war broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my cabin on the river-boat. One day, about five hundred miles from nowhere, I remarked upon the artistic beauty of an inscription in Chinese characters on the grass of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters which I had been admiring spelled the words, 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on these trips, by the way, not as a musician, but as a lover of Oriental architecture. Then I hear music; it may be of orchestras, it may be the song of peasants at work, or of vendors selling their wares on the streets. But when I hear them I make note of them. So this last trip yielded me about four hundred examples.

On the island of Java I attended a royal wedding of five princesses at Djokjakarta. The beautiful young brides were covered with priceless jewels, in costumes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and impressiveness, and ended only when the grooms carried the brides away in their arms. Forty days after the wedding there was an elaborate ceremonial celebrated by a three-day festival, lasting each day from six in the morning until ten at night. There were plays founded on the Hindu classics. There were dancing and the ceremonial music. Here was this golden music at its finest, played by one of the three best Javanese orchestras in the world. Through these long hours the orchestra was playing incessantly, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten impression upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"My 'Java' begins with the music of rice-pounders; a hollow log six or seven feet long, used for threshing rice, is struck by six women with heavy clubs. The resulting sounds have caused it to be used as a musical instrument. The sounds are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic patterns of asymmetric design. I use four of these rhythms in the introduction. Then after a transition there is a melody of five notes which I heard in the theater at Djokjakarta, which is the basis of the entire piece. There are also two counter-melodies heard in the courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' ends with a section depicting the calm of early morning at the Borobudur, the largest Buddhistic shrine in the world."

"Burma" is divided into two main parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe Dagon; (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists of three dances: I. The prince and princess, personages taken from the Hindu classics and appearing as principal figures in Burmese and Javanese stage plays. II. Grotesquerie. Grotesque figures which are part of all theatrical performances in Java and Burma. They relieve the tension of tragedy with their clowning add contrast. III. A final dance of the maids of honor. Said Mr. Eichheim: "The beginning of 'Burma' pictures twilight on the platform of the Shwe Dagon, the most beautiful Buddhistic shrine in Burma, a huge golden spire. This twilight mood brings the peasants, the priests, the musicians, the boys playing ball, the water-carriers, the aged and the young, into the sacred precincts of this holy shrine. This teeming life is soon engulfed in the night and ends with the tinkling of the little bells that are suspended from the pagoda, swayed by the wind. The second part is composed of three dances and is called a Pwé. It is a form of entertainment common throughout Burma in which musicians and dancers and singers play their grotesque or serious music on platforms before a newly opened store, or at the house of a merchant who is celebrating the birth of a son, or some other festive occasion in Burmese life."

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

In the course of the season Dr. Koussevitzky is planning to repeat Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," first at the Symphony Concerts in 1928 of 1927. Again the Harvard Glee Club will provide the chorus. Such a piece should indeed escape the [illegible] fate of a single production.

"Eichheim of The Orient"

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week

He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translator of The Music of The Far East

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Herr Ludwig Spohr to Audiences of 1929

THE third novel number on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week—the other two are described elsewhere on these pages—is a piece for wind choir by Ludwig Spohr, composer once often heard at these concerts. In the days of Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture to his opera, "Jessonda," was played seven times; the eighth Violin-Concerto thirteen times, the ninth, nine times. Eight of his compositions had distinct place in the repertory—four of them violin-concertos, two overtures, two symphonies. The last Spohr performance occurred Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck conducted at his second pair of concerts in America. More recently, if memory does not slip Albert Spalding, the violinist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, possibly in Boston. In his time and long after there was no doubting his vogue.

Spohr was a contemporary of Beethoven for no less than forty-three years. For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beethoven's death not until 1827. But the two men did not meet until late in Beethoven's life. It is said that Spohr never fully understood or appreciated either Bethoven or Weber. But he was amongst the first to champion the cause of Wagner, giving performances of "Tonio Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" against much opposition. He was also greatly interested in Schumann.

Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, composer of powers in his day considered extraordinary. As violinist he played one of his own duos concertante with Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of many of the noted violinists of the succeeding generation; wrote a "violin-school" which long remained a classic in pedagogical literature. As a conductor he was famous all over Europe. Like Haydn before him, he was once guest of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that when symphonies and overtures were performed, the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which when it was heard [nota bene!] had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin." This was the state of orchestral performance only a hundred years ago. There was actual conducting only "when the orchestra began to falter"! It was with some difficulty that Spohr at last persuaded the directors of the Philharmonic Society to allow him to conduct with a baton, in which method of conducting he was a pioneer.

Continued on Following Page

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Continued from Preceding Page

Spohr composed in all forms. His opus numbers mount to nearly one hundred and fifty. Best known among them was a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he stands in the van-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert, he had a taste for harmonic color[illegible] modulations, [illegible] Chromatic (least) eyes, [illegible] modern ears, at [illegible] favor, abound in his works. His first definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

Upon the title-page of the piece to be played tomorrow stand these words: "Notturno für Harmonie-und Janitscharen-Musik; Sr. Durchlaucht Herrn Günther Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." An obviously literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary" music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . ."

To Spohr then, in agreement with Grove above, "Janitscharen-Musik" was a kind of band rather than a type of composition. Final confirmation of this view comes from Meyer's [German] Lexikon, which under Janitscharen-Musik refers to Militär-Musik and there writes: "A type of music, or a reference to the kind of orchestra which accompanies troops. One distinguishes: Infantry-(Harmonie-formerly Janissary-) Music, consisting of woodwinds, brass, percussion, also glockenspiel; Hunting (horn-) Music, consisting entirely of brass, with doubled French horns; Cavalry (trumpet-) Music, in which woodwinds are lacking, alto-horns replace French horns, trumpets stand in the foreground and drums are added. Each of these types has its peculiar tone-color. Infantry-music with its high wood-winds is suitable for modern music; Hunting music sounds well for song-like cantabile melodies; for Cavalry music with its piercing trumpets and resounding drums marches are most effective." From which discussion it is apparent that Spohr's piece might well be entitled in English, "Nocturne for military band."

Herr Doktor Richard Strauss, encountering Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last June, recommended the Nocturne. It falls into six divisions—march, minuet andante with variations, a polonaise, an adagio, finale. The score calls for a triangle, bass drum and cymbals, piccolo, flutes, oboes, clarinets horns, trumpets, bassoons, double-bassoon and trombone. The polonaise adds a "corno di posta." The square-cut eight-and-sixteen-measure rhythms of most of these movements preclude, of course, the meandering style which has been charged against Spohr as his worst fault. Per contra, except in the variations and adagio he does not rise above the style of military band music. The Nocturne was popular in Spohr's day. In Boston, the Andante with variations was played in 1859 by the Mendelssohn Quintet.

Amusements

STATE

Mass. A--

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

118

GENERAL BOSTON NOTICES.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Spoils From The East for Western Ears

To Symphony Hall Eichheim, Returned Anew, Brings "Java" and "Burma"

OLD HANDS when they read, a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, believed it no more than a preliminary run over the course. It read strangely; was sure to be altered, perhaps more than once. On the contrary it stood, and still stands, firm: Spohr's Nocturne for Wind Instruments as beginning; then Mr. Eichheim's two tone-poems, "Burma" and "Java"; finally Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," battle-horse that the conductor rides gladly. To the three novel pieces, then—for it contains that unusual number—with what speed and space we may. This article shall traverse the Orient early.

Henry Eichheim will be remembered by some for his "Oriental Impressions" and his "Chinese Legend," played here respectively in 1922 and 1925; by others from the fact that he belonged to the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1890 to 1912. He is now a world-traveller, though his legal residence is in Santa Barbara, California. As a composer he devotes his energies to the music of the Orient. Upon this week's program at Symphony Hall stand two of his latest works, "Burma," originally composed as music for a play by Irene Lewisohn at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in 1926, later enlarged and played by the Chicago, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia orchestras; "Java," entirely new, which the composer conducted for the first time at Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday and Monday last. In them Mr. Eichheim uses the instruments of the Gamelang or Javanese orchestra,—the bonang, made of twelve small metal tubes; the saron, seven heavy bronze bars on a resonator; the demong, seven bronze bars each under its own resonator; the gender, thirteen metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a marimba; five tuned gongs. These, by word of mouth from Mr. Eichheim, are "all authentic and used by the natives of Java. They were brought from Samarang and Solokarta. In playing them the natives sit on the floor." There are also Burmese instruments, "brought from Rangoon and Mandalay." Together these two groups of instruments fill most of the space where usually the last desks of violas have place; from there to back-center of the orchestral platform. To play them there will be nine percussion-players, drawn from various choirs of the orchestra.

" 'Java' " said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, "is the result of my last trip (1927-28) to the Orient, and is the first movement of an Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, 'Angkor,' depicting the masses of great temples in Cambodia, is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Cambodian architecture includes the most impressively beautiful temples in French Indo-China. The building left by the Khmers are a fruitful field for an artist to dream and think in. The effect at night of this dead grandeur was overpowering and fantastic in the extreme and a strange contrast to Chinese ruins, as for example the Temple of Heaven in Peiping.

"The finale of this Symphony, 'Bali,' is based on the brilliant and scintillating music of this people. It will be dedicated to Mr. Stokowski. Bali is a delightful paradise sixty by ninety miles in size, thirty-six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of all, then artists: goldsmiths and silversmiths, weavers, architects, painters, actors, musicians, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with hard hammers, while the Javanese use soft hammers. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is liquid and golden, the most beautiful music in the world. There are in it no edges or joints; it is an unending flow of entrancing sound. One never hears the impact of hammers, is never aware of the fact that the music is being made: rather is it like lovely streams that flow out of rocks—coming from nowhere, going nowhere; simply existing as a thing of sourceless beauty. Intricate rhythmical patterns follow one another with extreme logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, perfected art. For this art is the result of the tropically warm inspiration of a profoundly talented race.

"This last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Yangtze River. While I was there the war broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my cabin on the river-boat. One day, about five hundred miles from nowhere, I remarked upon the artistic beauty of an inscription in Chinese characters on the grass of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters which I had been admiring spelled the words, 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on these trips, by the way, not as a musician, but as a lover of Oriental architecture: Then I hear music; it may be of orchestras, it may be the song of peasants at work, or of vendors selling their wares on the streets. But when I hear them I make note of them. So this last trip yielded me about four hundred examples.

On the island of Java I attended a royal wedding of five princesses at Djokjakarta. The beautiful young brides were covered with priceless jewels, in costumes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and impressiveness, and ended only when the grooms carried the brides away in their arms. Forty days after the wedding there was an elaborate ceremonial celebrated by a three-day festival, lasting each day from six in the morning until ten at night. There were plays founded on the Hindu classics. There were dancing and the ceremonial music. Here was this golden music at its finest, played by one of the three best Javanese orchestras in the world. Through these long hours the orchestra was playing incessantly, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten impression upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"My 'Java' begins with the music of rice-pounders; a hollow log six or seven feet long, used for threshing rice, is struck by six women with heavy clubs. The resulting sounds have caused it to be used as a musical instrument. The sounds are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic patterns of asymmetric design. I use four of these rhythms in the introduction. Then after a transition there is a melody of five notes which I heard in the theater at Djokjakarta, which is the basis of the entire piece. There are also two counter-melodies heard in the courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' ends with a section depicting the calm of early morning at the Borobudur, the largest Buddhistic shrine in the world."

"Burma" is divided into two main parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe Dagon; (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists of three dances: I. The prince and princess, personages taken from the Hindu classics and appearing as principal figures in Burmese and Javanese stage plays. II. Grotesquerie. Grotesque figures which are part of all theatrical performances in Java and Burma. They relieve the tension of tragedy with their clowning add contrast. III. A final dance of the maids of honor. Said Mr. Eichheim:

"The beginning of 'Burma' pictures twilight on the platform of the Shwe Dagon, the most beautiful Buddhistic shrine in Burma, a huge golden spire. This twilight mood brings the peasants, the priests, the musicians, the boys playing ball, the water-carriers, the aged and the young, into the sacred precincts of this holy shrine. This teeming life is soon engulfed in the night and ends with the tinkling of the little bells that are suspended from the pagoda, swayed by the wind. The second part is composed of three dances and is called a Pwé. It is a form of entertainment common throughout Burma in which musicians and dancers and singers play their grotesque or serious music on platforms before a newly opened store, or at the house of a merchant who is celebrating the birth of a son, or some other festive occasion in Burmese life." A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

In the course of the season Dr. vitzky is planning to repeat Stra, opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," fir at the Symphony Concerts in I of 1927. Again the Harvard G will provide the chorus. Such a piece should indeed escape the fate of a single production. Their in-

"Eichheim of The Orient"

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week

He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translater of The Music of The Far East

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Herr Ludwig Spohr to Audiences of 1929

THE third novel number on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week—the other two are described elsewhere on these pages—is a piece for wind choir by Ludwig Spohr, composer once often heard at these concerts. In the days of Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture to his opera, "Jessonda," was played seven times; the eighth Violin-Concerto thirteen times, the ninth, nine times. Eight of his compositions had distinct place in the repertory—four of them violin-concertos, two overtures, two symphonies. The last Spohr performance occurred Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck conducted at his second pair of concerts in America. More recently, if memory does not slip Albert Spalding, the violinist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, possibly in Boston. In his time and long after there was no doubting his vogue.

Spohr was a contemporary of Beethoven for no less than forty-three years. For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beethoven's death not until 1827. But the two men did not meet until late in Beethoven's life. It is said that Spohr never fully understood or appreciated either Beethoven or Weber. But he was among the first to champion the cause of Wagner, giving early performances of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" against much opposition. He was also greatly interested in Schumann.

Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, composer of powers in his day considered extraordinary. As violinist he played one of his own duos concertante with Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of many of the noted violinists of the succeeding generation; wrote a "violin-school" which long remained a classic in pedagogical literature. As a conductor he was famous all over Europe. Like Haydn before him, he was once guest of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

STATE

Mass. Av

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Continued from Preceding Page

when symphonies and overtures were performed, the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which when it was heard [nota bene!] had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin." This was the state of orchestral performance only a hundred years ago. There was actual conducting only "when the orchestra began to falter"! It was with some difficulty that Spohr persuaded the directors of the Philharmonic Society to allow him to conduct with a baton, in which method of conducting he was a pioneer.

Spohr composed in all forms. His opus numbers mount to nearly one hundred and fifty. Best known among them was a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he stands in the van-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert, he had a taste for harmonic color[illegible] modulations, often [illegible] Chromatic least) sweet[illegible] modern ears, at [illegible]ecisly in flavor, abound in his works. This first definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

violas have place; from there to back-center of the orchestral platform. To play them there will be nine percussion-players, drawn from various choirs of the orchestra.

"'Java'" said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, "is the result of my last trip (1927-28) to the Orient, and is the first movement of an Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, 'Angkor,' depicting the masses of great temples in Cambodia, is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Cambodian architecture includes the most impressively beautiful temples in French Indo-China. The building left by the Khmers are a fruitful field for an artist to dream and think in. The effect at night of this dead grandeur was overpowering and fantastic in the extreme and a strange contrast to Chinese ruins, as for example the Temple of Heaven in Peiping.

"The finale of this Symphony, 'Bali,' is based on the brilliant and scintillating music of this people. It will be dedicated to Mr. Stokowski. Bali is a delightful paradise sixty by ninety miles in size, thirty-six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of all, then artists: goldsmiths and silversmiths, weavers, architects, painters, actors, musicians, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with hard hammers, while the Javanese use soft hammers. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is liquid and golden, the most beautiful music in the world. There are in it no edges or joints; it is an unending flow of entrancing sound. One never hears the impact of hammers, is never aware of the fact that the music is being made; rather is it like lovely streams that flow out of rocks—coming from nowhere, going nowhere; simply existing as a thing of sourceless beauty. Intricate rhythmical patterns follow one another with extreme logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, perfected art. For this art is the result of the tropically warm inspiration of a profoundly talented race.

"This last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Yangtze River. While I was there the war broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my cabin on the river-boat. One day, about the priests, the musicians, the boys playing ball, the water-carriers, the aged and the young, into the sacred precincts of this holy shrine. This teeming life is soon engulfed in the night and ends with the tinkling of the little bells that are suspended from the pagoda, swayed by the wind. The second part is composed of three dances and is called a Pwé. It is a form of entertainment common throughout Burma in which musicians and dancers and singers play their grotesque or serious music on platforms before a newly opened store, or at the house of a merchant who is celebrating the birth of a son, or some other festive occasion in Burmese life." A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

In the course of the season Dr. ... vitzky is planning to repeat Stra... opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," fir... at the Symphony Concerts in ... of 1927. Again the Harvard G... will provide the chorus. Such a piece should indeed escape the ... fate of a single production. ... their in... ... all lutes, one lute

Amusements

STATE

Mass. A...

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week

He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translator of The Music of The Far East

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Herr Ludwig Spohr to Audiences of 1929

THE third novel number on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week—the other two are described elsewhere on these pages—is a piece for wind choir by Ludwig Spohr, composer once often heard at these concerts. In the days of Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture to his opera, "Jessonda," was played seven times; the eighth Violin-Concerto thirteen times, the ninth, nine times. Eight of his compositions had distinct place in the repertory—four of them violin-concertos, two overtures, two symphonies. The last Spohr performance occurred Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck conducted at his second pair of concerts in America. More recently, if memory does not slip Albert Spalding, the violinist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, possibly in Boston. In his time and long after there was no doubting his vogue.

Spohr was a contemporary of Beethoven for no less than forty-three years. For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beethoven's death not until 1827. But the two men did not meet until late in Beethoven's life. It is said that Spohr never fully understood or appreciated either Beethoven or Weber. But he was among the first to champion the cause of Wagner, giving early performances of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" against much opposition. He was also greatly interested in Schumann.

Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, composer of powers in his day considered extraordinary. As violinist he played one of his own duos concertante with Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of many of the noted violinists of the succeeding generation; wrote a "violin-school" which long remained a classic in pedagogical literature. As a conductor he was famous all over Europe. Like Haydn before him, he was once guest of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that when symphonies and overtures were performed, the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which when it was heard [nota bene!] had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin." This was the state of orchestral performance only a hundred years ago. There was actual conducting only "when the orchestra began to falter"! It was with some difficulty that Spohr persuaded the directors of the Philharmonic Society to allow him to conduct with a baton, in which method of conducting he was a pioneer.

Continued on Following Page

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Continued from Preceding Page

Spohr composed in all forms. His opus numbers mount to nearly one hundred and fifty. Best known among them was a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he stands in the van-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert, he had a taste for harmonic color... Chromatic modulations, often (to modern ears, at least) sweetly in flavor, abound in his works. This first definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

Upon the title-page of the piece to be played tomorrow stand these words: "Notturno für Harmonie-und Janitscharen-Musik; Sr. Durchlaucht Herrn Gunther Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." An obviously literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony-and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Distionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary' music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . ."

To Spohr then, in agreement with Grove above, "Janitscharen-Musik" was a kind of band rather than a type of composition. Final confirmation of this view comes from Meyer's [German] Lexikon, which under Janitscharen-Musik refers to Militär-Musik and there writes: "A type of music, or a reference to the kind of orchestra which accompanies troops. One distinguishes: Infantry-(Harmonie-formerly Janissary-) Music, consisting of woodwinds, brass, percussion, also glockenspiel; Hunting (horn-) Music, consisting entirely of brass, with doubled French horns; Cavalry (trumpet-) Music, in which woodwinds are lacking, alto-horns replace French horns, trumpets stand in the foreground and drums are added. Each of these types has its peculiar tone-color. Infantry-music with its high wood-winds is suitable for modern music; Hunting music sounds well for song-like cantabile melodies; for Cavalry music with its piercing trumpets and resounding drums marches are most effective." From which discussion it is apparent that Spohr's piece might well be entitled in English, "Nocturne for military band."

Herr Doktor Richard Strauss, encountering Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last June, recommended the Nocturne. It falls into six divisions—march, minuet, andante with variations, a polonaise, an adagio, finale. The score calls for a triangle, bass drum and cymbals, piccolo, flutes, oboes, clarinets horns, trumpets, bassoons, double-bassoon and trombone. The polonaise adds a "corno di posta." The square-cut eight-and-sixteen-measure rhythms of most of these movements preclude, of course, the meandering style which has been charged against Spohr as his worst fault. Per contra, except in the variations and adagio he does not rise above the style of military band music. The Nocturne was popular in Spohr's day. In Boston, the Andante with variations was played in 1859 by the Mendelssohn Quintet.

Concert-Chronicle

ew: First Time Trans Nov 7

NOW that Spohr's resurrected Nocturne for Wind Instruments is deferred to the Symphony Concerts next week—for correction of badly opied parts—Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "Enchanted Isle," stands alone as novel piece on Dr. Koussevitzky's program for tomorrow and Saturday. Gruenberg is a Russian, born in 1885, now living and working in New York, best known in American concert-halls by a swirling setting of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" to the hilt characterizing that riotous poem. When "Enchanted Isle" was produced at the Worcester Festival on Oct. 3, 1929, the program-book contained this biographical note:

> Gruenberg is a pianist and composer. He came to America in 1885 and was educated in the public schools of New York. He made his studies with Adele Margulies in New York; at the Master-School in the Vienna Conservatory; with Busoni. He traveled as pianist through Russia, Germany, Norway, Sweden; was guest-conductor at the State Theater in various cities. He returned to America with Busoni and composed an opera, "The Bride of the Gods," for which Busoni wrote the text. In 1921 he was awarded a prize of $1000 for a symphonic poem, "The Hill of Dreams," played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Other works are sonatas for violin and piano, songs, piano-pieces, a symphony, a piano-concerto, chamber music. Gruenberg was a founder of the American Composers' Guild. Recently he was made president of the American section of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall, yesterday, Mr. Gruenberg proved a willing but modest subject. To the above sketch he added nothing material beyond the fact that he has been in Europe for the last eight years, returning to the United States only last year. "I was born," said Mr. Gruenberg, "I couldn't help it; what more is there to say?—to talk about myself—I stand revealed before the world in my works, for better or worse. You can read from them all my faults and weaknesses, as well as my good points. To add anything in words would be unsatisfactory."

Mr. Gruenberg answered the direct question whether there were a program for "Enchanted Isle" with a direct "No; I never have believed that music should be the handmaid of any of the other arts. It is absolute music and must stand on its own feet as music." It was written before the war, the second of four symphonic poems, "The Hill of Dreams," "Enchanted Isle," "Valley Voices," "Blue Castles."

"You see the idea was this: I was dreaming in a blue castle on the top of a hill on an enchanted island, listening to the voices of the valley, trying to create for myself a new world." When he returned to this country last year, Mr. Gruenberg found himself rummaging among old manuscripts. He came upon "Enchanted Isle," added or emended here and there, finally settling down to complete revision of the earlier score into the form of the present work. "Valley Voices" and "Blue Castles" exist only as sketches. "Will you ever complete them?" "Probably not. All these pieces retain the exuberance of the illusions of youth. I have changed greatly since that time."

As is the case with Debussy's "La Mer" and many another piece, the title is undoubtedly sufficient program for "Enchanted Isle." It is written for full modern orchestra. It begins very slowly. In the second measure the English horn sings a sinuous, languid sort of melody. In the seventh measure a clarinet joins with mated tune. These furnish the basis for the first portion. But the themes probably tell only the least part of the story. The ornamentation gives significance to the title. Supporting all is harmony rich and sonorous, without being particularly "advanced." Upper strings add weird sonority resulting from playing on the bridge of the violin. Flutes give a colorful, undulating, gently skipping figure. Harp and celesta do their part in bringing about exotic illusion. After several climaxes upon a development of the English horn tune, there is a delightfully fragrant episode upon the clarinet theme. Even greater than before are the efforts of the instruments that lend color and atmosphere. Then comes a scherzo division in tempo presto. Swift as the wind and as free is this section. A single motif may hardly be pointed to as its "theme." It is as if all the scherzos of the world had contributed their share toward the making of this one exceedingly imaginative scherzo. Then andante and scherzo alternately enter, after which there is a huge final climax on the original themes. The general style is decidedly pro-Stravinskian.

A. H. M.

Revised Programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday:

Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543).....Mozart
Symphonic Poem, "Enchanted Isle"...Gruenberg
Suite from The Ballet, "Mother Goose"...Ravel
Rondo for Orchestra, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss

From Mr. Horowitz, the pianist, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next:

Sonata in F minor, Op. 5.....Brahms
Diabolic Suggestions.....Prokofiev
Joyous Isle.....Debussy
Polonaise in C-sharp minor—Impromptu in A-flat—Brilliant Waltz.....Chopin
Fantasia on Themes from Mozart's Opera, "Don Juan".....Liszt

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Nov. 15-16:

Nocturne and Turkish Music for Wind Instruments.....Spohr
Burma.....Eichheim
Java.....Eichheim
Night in Minneapolis.....Strauss

The returns are not yet all in from the journey westward, last week, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra. From the concert in Chicago on Tuesday, they moved northwest for a concert on Wednesday in Minneapolis, unvisited since 1890 in the distant days of Nikisch as conductor. The occasion was not without excitements. Next morning The Minneapolis Tribune reported them, "on the front page" as follows:

> Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the Hub feeling that Minneapolis deserves all the nice things that have been said of it as a musical city.
>
> Certainly no man, much less one so tempermentally and emotionally

Continued on Following Page

effulgent as the Boston leader, could fail to feel that the great audience of nearly 5000 persons attending the concert at the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus Wednesday night, was with him heart and soul as he led his men through the broad dignity of Handel [a Concerto Grosso], the inimitable music of Debussy ["Clouds" and "Fêtes"], the dashing and bewildering composition of Ravel [second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloë"], the majesty of Beethoven [Fifth Symphony], or the scintillating brilliance of Chaikovsky [March Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony].

There is no doubt about Koussevitzky's own appreciation of the reception given him. He even made a little speech just long enough to tell the audience that the new hall was the finest in the world. That was quite enough; for it was what everybody wished to hear. Then he proceeded to break every rule of the organization he leads with such supreme mastery by adding to the program a part of the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony.

How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After the Ravel number I counted up to half a dozen and then wearied. The audience remained long after the program was concluded. It might have been there still, had it been posible to make Mr. Koussevitzky miss his train. They did their best anyway and to a man the orchestra responded.

Concert-Chronicle

Nov 6 Trans.

"Back to Mozart"

A SMALL orchestra has now become Dr. Koussevitzky's custom with most eighteenth-century symphonies, to the advantage of all concerned. The querulous traditionalists who feared that Mozart or Haydn would not sound through Symphony Hall unless eighty-odd men were playing, found their ears refuting them. Reduced to thirty or forty, the ensemble on the stage becomes as sensitive and reciprocating as a string-quartet in a music-room; while every individual valiance or finesse shines through clearly. The conductor, in turn, holds the little band in the hollow of his hand, susceptible to his slightest bidding. Through the half-hour, on Friday and Saturday, of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, we were all (as St. Paul has it) "members of one body"—audience, orchestra, conductor, composer.

Most, however, Mozart and his music were the gainers. Since there was no over-weight of strings, no consequent doubling of the wood-winds, the orchestral tone was transparent, supple, finely charactered. A full orchestra may hardly escape sluggishness at a quick Mozartean turn or transition. Its bulk blurs Mozartean clearness; especially in forte passages dulls Mozartean crispness. It stamps when it accents a Minuet; its fleetness is self-conscious and labored in a Finale. Substitute the small orchestra of Dr. Koussevitzky and every measure sounds with Mozartean clarity, pith and ease. Restored to the medium in which he sub-consciously heard it, again it speaks from his mind, heart and hand. There are plenty of all three in this Symphony in E-flat.

Concert-Chronicle

Nov 6 Trans.

Eichheim of The Orient

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Henry Eichheim, over-long absent from a public that knows and admires him, will be guest of the orchestra as composer and conductor. Two of his pieces, both new to Boston, will then be heard, by title "Java" and "Burma." The first is Mr. Eichheim's most recent work, to be produced this week by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is Part One of a trilogy to be completed by Part Two, "Bali," and Part Three, "Angkor"—both shrines of the Far East. "Burma" is adaptation into the symphonic form of a Burmese ballet, written by Mr. Eichheim for the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in the days of the Lewisohns. Needless to say, both "Java" and "Burma" are fruit of the composer's frequent journeys to the Orient, his studies of its music and its instruments, the instinct for both that he has developed and refined, the sparks these contacts set to his own creative imagination. By the precedent of the past,

Mr. Eichheim has again discovered new, strange, fascinating sounds.

That Babel of Sounds Which Is the Orient

Backgrounds to the Music Which Eichheim Has Transcribed

ALL life in the Orient, from its most momentous to its least consequential acts, is accompanied by music. The peddling of fish in the streets of Peiping, the begging of alms in the Nanking road, the arduous occupations of Seoul street laborers, the solicitations of blind Chinese masseurs, the plying of boatmen up and down yellow rivers, the tasks of actors in native theaters, all have their investitures of song or primitive percussion or both. In bazaars the beat of woodblocks and skin drums is never stilled . . . the flute never stops its thin wailing . . . the resonance of the "lo" is insistent, and it might be thought life itself would suddenly cease if there were no cymbals. Chinese soldiers oblige the citizenry to be respectful by blowing furious blasts on the "haiio," a sort of conch. In the cloistered temples of the hills priests conduct their worship, and all other tasks as well, to the appointed rhythms of the "yung chung" or large bell. In the cities priests beg or conduct itinerant ceremonies to the sound of the "mu-lu" or block of hollow wood, shaped like a skull.

The Orient has its concert halls wherein the customary orchestra comprises two balloon shaped guitars, a three string guitar, a violin or two, a flute, a "yang-ch'in" or foreign harpsichord, and one small drum: on these instruments the performers play in time and well together. But the characteristic music of the Orient is to be heard in its by-ways and bazaars, its main thoroughfares and along its waterways where it becomes the spontaneous voice of mankind.

Music was originated in the East to express gratitude for all nature; it was thought by imitating the phases of nature men could ally themselves harmoniously with her. Essentially there has been little change in the motivation of Oriental music since those far centuries when it was thus devised to give thanksgiving and expression to the multiplications of human emotion. The soul of mankind in the East today expresses itself in much the same musical terms which were adequate many centuries before Christ. There is a Persian saying "Nothing which has quickened the soul of mankind can be entirely lost." There have been periods of musical anæsthesia in the Orient; for instance the one superinduced in 200 B. C. by the order of a great emperor who demanded that all musical instruments and such manuscripts as existed be forthwith destroyed. The later task of musical re-establishment was made especially difficult because of the imperfection that had previously characterized what musical notation existed.

As it had centuries back, the natural music of every Eastern nation today has mystic influence on the passions of its peoples. It is used to express the grave and gay in life, to hearten the weary, to inspire idealism, to stir patriotism and reverence, to propitiate the spirits of heaven and earth, to mark, variously, holidays and sombre obsequies, in large to make articulate all experiences of mankind. At the death of an Imperial Concubine in 1464 all music in the Chinese Empire was stopped for five days. But at the usual music hour the choirs and orchestras assembled, instruments in hand, to spend the appointed time in silence.

The Occident in general considers Oriental music a mere succession of monotonous and cacaphonous sounds. If, however, these sounds seem careless, judged by Occidental musical standards, it should be remembered that the entrancing harmonies they possess for Oriental ears are had only by using such instruments as seem appropriate and sound well together, and that what we consider unusual and irregular sounds express, on the contrary a spontaneous and profound admiration for all Nature, according to Oriental thought.

In the East, too, the music of the West is unenviable. Henry Eichheim, whose Javanese and Burmese sketches are included in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for yesterday afternoon and this evening, and whose "Oriental Impressions," "Malay Mosaic" and "Chinese Legend" have been played by eminent European and American symphony orchestras, tells of dining on an evening with Mrs. Eichheim at the Tokyo home of Prince Tokugawa. After dinner a fellow guest drew from the sleeve of his kimona a "sho," traditional Japanese instrument of reed, fashioned of bamboo and having seventeen tubes. In the silence of a beautiful room this man played a cycle of ancient Japanese songs. The music, as his fingers moved with gentle precision among the tubes, was acutely pleasing to the Eastern ear but as inexplicable as it was lovely to the Western. When its sounds had drifted away Mr. and Mrs. Eichheim played, upon piano and violin, some of Debussy, a little of Saint Saëns, other things seemingly suitable to the occasion; but they were vaguely dubious of their music. Dim phantoms hovered in the room of a too different mode of music; and the contrast was sharp between the imaginative music of the East played with wondrous simplicity by a grave scholar upon an almost primitive instrument, and what is known as modern music in the West. A contrast not entirely helpful to the Western music. It was Prof. Tenabe, conductor of the Tokyo Imperial Orchestra, who has played upon the "sho," and it is a fact that Prof. Tenabe believes no good music has been written in 300 years.

119

To the Oriental the music of his race is the distillation of harmony existing between mankind and heaven and earth. It was not Confucius alone who believed music vitally affected the constitution of the State, hence that to govern men was to guide their feelings rightly; and how better than by music "which softens the manners, disarms force by grace, brings nearer and binds together the various elements of society"? In China students commonly agree that the Emperor Fu Hsi (B. C. 2852) originated the first formal arrangements of music. These, it is said, were inspired by the emperor's own appreciation of and gratitude for all nature. The sounds he devised imitated sounds in nature, and were fashioned into a system whose arrangement made them agreeable to the ear. In 2000 B. C. the Emperor Hwang Ti was commanding his ministers to cut bamboo tubes which could be blown to imitate the notes of the phoenix.

Music is indispensable to the masses in the East. It is not an art merely reserved for those with leisure for the acquisition of culture, but is found everywhere, particularly in humble settings. For instance, the motives of a Japanese Nocturne, which Eichheim has translated into the modern orchestral idiom of the West, were heard at night in Ikao and Matsushima, in Yokohama and Tokyo, variously sung and played on instruments by blind masseurs, chanted by old men beating small wooden bells, shrilly piped by food vendors; they reproduce the sounds of the "koto," fish head drums, flutes, the mixed, muted and murmurous music of Japanese night. The materials of a Chinese sketch, likewise, were heard in temples and in theaters, tea houses and streets, during the following after of wedding and funeral processions, in the listening to street cries and the thousand sounds of city and country life heard in Peiping, Hang Chow and the Buddhistic temples of the Western hills.

On the other hand this Chinese Legend opens with an example of the formalized, traditional music of a Chinese ceremonial, written about 700 A. D. by an emperor. In Korea travelers often remark the theme of a song of street laborers of Seoul. Ordinarily five men sing this song during their working hours. One sings the refrain, the other four answer. Since such laborers work only when it occurs to them the flavor of the pieces is distinctly humorous.

The incessant indispensibility of music, as an adjunct to all eastern activity, will be understood when the variety of its uses is considered. Music constantly accompanies labor, study, meditation and celebration; it is relied upon to appease spirits, and is formally credited with exerting happy prenatal influence over mothers and their children; as it is essential to the conduct of religious festivals it is likewise necessary to the proper observance of all great occasions such as coronations, receptions of foreign ministers and guests, the festivities of weddings and birthdays. Civic calamity has instant musical accompaniment, and the greeting of ordinary household guests, thanksgiving for rain or good harvests, lightening of labors in the rice fields, heartening of beggars and wayfarers, charming of society; variously the animation of strife or peace are habitually accomplished with the appointed influence of music. It has two essential forms, sacred and secular, with minutely prescribed forms to govern the worship of heaven and earth and ancestors. Llama priests at Wu Tai Shan intone their prayers in deep notes a fifth, or even an octave, apart. And it is obvious that no happening of any consequence anywhere in the East, whether religious or secular, can take place without its accompanying music.

The progress of Christianity and civilization in the Orient has gradually lifted its music to a loftier plane. No music in civilization possesses such crystallization of romance and phantasy as the music of China and Japan, of Java, Korea and India. Its study by the Occidental student opens new fields for the cultivation and adaptation of new harmonies, timbres, progressions and linear suggestions. Rimsky-Korsakov worked from a music of the nearer East as Bartok has worked from the tunes of the Hungarian gypsies, and Gilbert from those of the Indians, but a great treasure waits for the student of that strange magic which is the music of the Far East.

In China, it was during the reign of Huang Ti, "The Yellow Emperor," (B.C. 2697) that certain tones were taken as basic, sounds were fixed, names attached to them and an association definitely drawn between notes and celestial bodies. Music forthwith became an avenue to good government and was recognized throughout the empire as an influence for making people better and happier. Succeeding emperors composed hymns to reflect national life. It is recorded that in 655 B. C. Confucius was so impressed with a hymn composed by the great Shun (B. C. 2255) that he "abstained from meat for three months," which is a charming way of saying that for three months he concentrated study upon the beauty and significance of the hymn. In China music rests on two principles; the 's'hen-li" or spiritual, and the "ch'ishu" or substan-

Continued on Page Seven

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 16, 1929

Oriental Music

Continued from Page Five

CON. ON PAGE 120

Concert-Chronicle

ew: First Time Trans Nov 7

NOW that Spohr's resurrected Nocturne for Wind Instruments is deferred to the Symphony Concerts next week—for correction of badly opied parts—Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "Enchanted Isle," stands alone as novel piece on Dr. Koussevitzky's program for tomorrow and Saturday. Gruenberg is a Russian, born in 1885, now living and working in New York, best known in American concert-halls by a swirling setting of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" to the hilt characterizing that riotous poem. When "Enchanted Isle" was produced at the Worcester Festival on Oct. 3, 1929, the program-book contained this biographical note:

> Gruenberg is a pianist and composer. He came to America in 1885 and was educated in the public schools of New York. He made his studies with Adele Margulies in New York; at the Master-School in the Vienna Conservatory; with Busoni. He traveiled as pianist through Russia, Germany, Norway, Sweden; was guest-conductor at the State Theater in various cities. He returned to America with Busoni and composed an opera, "The Bride of the Gods," for which Busoni wrote the text. In 1921 he was awarded a prize of $1000 for a symphonic poem, "The Hill of Dreams," played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Other works are sonatas for violin and piano, songs, piano-pieces, a symphony, a piano-concerto, chamber music. Gruenberg was a founder of the American Composers' Guild. Recently he was made president of the American section of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall, yesterday, Mr. Gruenberg proved a willing but modest subject. To the above sketch he added nothing material beyond the fact that he has been in Europe for the last eight years, returning to the United States only last year. "I was born," said Mr. Gruenberg, "I couldn't help it; what more is there to say?—to talk about myself—I stand revealed before the world in my works, for better or worse. You can read from them all my faults and weaknesses, as well as my good points. To add anything in words would be unsatisfactory."

Mr. Gruenberg answered the direct question whether there were a program for "Enchanted Isle" with a direct "No; I never have believed that music should be the handmaid of any of the other arts. It is absolute music and must stand on its own feet as music." It was written before the war, the second of four symphonic poems, "The Hill of Dreams," "Enchanted Isle," "Valley Voices," "Blue Castles."

"You see the idea was this: I was dreaming in a blue castle on the top of a hill on an enchanted island, listening to the voices of the valley, trying to create for myself a new world." When he returned to this country last year, Mr. Gruenberg found himself rummaging among old manuscripts. He came upon "Enchanted Isle," added or emended here and there, finally settling down to complete revision of the earlier score into the form of the present work. "Valley Voices" and "Blue Castles" exist only as sketches. "Will you ever complete them?" "Probably not. All these pieces retain the exuberance of the illusions of youth. I have changed greatly since that time."

As is the case with Debussy's "La Mer" and many another piece, the title is undoubtedly sufficient program for "Enchanted Isle." It is written for full modern orchestra. It begins very slowly. In the second measure the English horn sings a sinuous, languid sort of melody. In the seventh measure a clarinet joins with mated tune. These furnish the basis for the first portion. But the themes probably tell only the least part of the story. The ornamentation gives significance to the title. Supporting all is harmony rich and sonorous, without being particularly "advanced." Upper strings add weird sonority resulting from playing on the bridge of the violin. Flutes give a colorful, undulating, gently skipping figure. Harp and celesta do their part in bringing about exotic illusion. After several climaxes upon a development of the English horn tune, there is a delightfully fragrant episode upon the clarinet theme. Even greater than before are the efforts of the instruments that lend color and atmosphere. Then comes a scherzo division in tempo presto. Swift as the wind and as free is this section. A single motif may hardly be pointed to as its "theme." It is as if all the scherzos of the world had contributed their share toward the making of this one exceedingly imaginative scherzo. Then andante and scherzo alternately enter, after which there is a huge final climax on the original themes. The general style is decidedly pro-Stravinskian.

A. H. M.

Revised Programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday:

Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543).....Mozart
Symphonic Poem, "Enchanted Isle"...Gruenberg
Suite from The Ballet, "Mother Goose"..Ravel
Rondo for Orchestra, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss

From Mr. Horowitz, the pianist, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next:

Sonata in F minor, Op. 5.....Brahms
Diabolic Suggestions.....Prokoffiev
Joyous Isle.....Debussy
Polonaise in C-sharp minor—Impromptu in A-flat—Brilliant Waltz.....Chopin
Fantasia on Themes from Mozart's Opera, "Don Juan".....Liszt

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Nov. 15-16:

Nocturne and Turkish Music for Wind Instruments.....Spohr
Burma.....Eichheim
Java.....Eichheim
Night in Minneapolis.....Strauss

The returns are not yet all in from the journey westward, last week, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra. From the concert in Chicago on Tuesday, they moved northwest for a concert on Wednesday in Minneapolis, unvisited since 1890 in the distant days of Nikisch as conductor. The occasion was not without excitements. Next morning The Minneapolis Tribune reported them, "on the front page" as follows:

> Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the Hub feeling that Minneapolis deserves all the nice things that have been said of it as a musical city.
>
> Certainly no man, much less one so tempermentally and emotionally

Continued on Following Page

effulgent as the Boston leader, could fail to feel that the great audience of nearly 5000 persons attending the concert at the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus Wednesday night, was with him heart and soul as he led his men through the broad dignity of Handel [a Concerto Grosso], the inimitable music of Debussy ["Clouds" and "Fêtes"], the clashing and bewildering composition of Ravel [second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloë"], the majesty of Beethoven [Fifth Symphony], or the scintillating brilliance of Chaikovsky [March Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony].

There is no doubt about Koussevitzky's own appreciation of the reception given him. He even made a little speech just long enough to tell the audience that the new hall was the finest in the world. That was quite enough; for it was what everybody wished to hear. Then he proceeded to break every rule of the organization he leads with such supreme mastery by adding to the program a part of the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony.

How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After the Ravel number I counted up to half a dozen and then wearied. The audience remained long after the program was concluded. It might have been there still, had it been posible to make Mr. Koussevitzky miss his train. They did their best anyway and to a man the orchestra responded.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans.

"Back to Mozart"

A SMALL orchestra has now become Dr. Koussevitzky's custom with most eighteenth-century symphonies, to the advantage of all concerned. The querulous traditionalists who feared that Mozart or Haydn would not sound through Symphony Hall unless eighty-odd men were playing, found their ears refuting them. Reduced to thirty or forty, the ensemble on the stage becomes as sensitive and reciprocating as a string-quartet in a music-room; while every individual valiance or finesse shines through clearly. The conductor, in turn, holds the little band in the hollow of his hand, susceptible to his slightest bidding. Through the half-hour, on Friday and Saturday, of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, we were all (as St. Paul has it) "members of one body"—audience, orchestra, conductor, composer.

Most, however, Mozart and his music were the gainers. Since there was no over-weight of strings, no consequent doubling of the wood-winds, the orchestral tone was transparent, supple, finely charactered. A full orchestra may hardly escape sluggishness at a quick Mozartean turn or transition. Its bulk blurs Mozartean clearness; especially in forte passages dulls Mozartean crispness. It stamps when it accents a Minuet; its fleetness is self-conscious and labored in a Finale. Substitute the small orchestra of Dr. Koussevitzky and every measure sounds with Mozartean clarity, pith and ease. Restored to the medium in which he sub-consciously heard it, again it speaks from his mind, heart and hand. There are plenty of all three in this Symphony in E-flat.

Concert-Chronicle

Nov 6 Trans.

Eichheim of The Orient

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Henry Eichheim, over-long absent from a public that knows and admires him, will be guest of the orchestra as composer and conductor. Two of his pieces, both new to Boston, will then be heard, by title "Java" and "Burma." The first is Mr. Eichheim's most recent work, to be produced this week by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is Part One of a trilogy to be completed by Part Two, "Bali," and Part Three, "Angkor"—both shrines of the Far East. "Burma" is adaptation into the symphonic form of a Burmese ballet, written by Mr. Eichheim for the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in the days of the Lewisohns. Needless to say, both "Java" and "Burma" are fruit of the composer's frequent journeys to the Orient, his studies of its music and its instruments, the instinct for both that he has developed and refined, the sparks these contacts set to his own creative imagination. By the precedent of the past, a an

Mr. Eichheim has again discovered new, strange, fascinating sounds.

That Babel of Sounds Which Is the Orient

Backgrounds to the Music Which Eichheim Has Transcribed

ALL life in the Orient, from its most momentous to its least consequential acts, is accompanied by music. The peddling of fish in the streets of Peiping, the begging of alms in the Nanking road, the arduous occupations of Seoul street laborers, the solicitations of blind Chinese masseurs, the plying of boatmen up and down yellow rivers, the tasks of actors in native theaters, all have their investitures of song or primitive percussion or both. In bazaars the beat of woodblocks and skin drums is never stilled . . . the flute never stops its thin wailing . . . the resonance of the "lo" is insistent, and it might be thought life itself would suddenly cease if there were no cymbals. Chinese soldiers oblige the citizenry to be respectful by blowing furious blasts on the "haiio," a sort of conch. In the cloistered temples of the hills priests conduct their worship, and all other tasks as well, to the appointed rhythms of the "yung chung" or large bell. In the cities priests beg or conduct itinerant ceremonies to the sound of the "mu-lu" or block of hollow wood, shaped like a skull.

The Orient has its concert halls wherein the customary orchestra comprises two balloon shaped guitars, a three string guitar, a violin or two, a flute, a "yang-ch'in" or foreign harpsichord, and one small drum: on these instruments the performers play in time and well together. But the characteristic music of the Orient is to be heard in its by-ways and bazaars, its main thoroughfares and along its waterways where it becomes the spontaneous voice of mankind.

Music was originated in the East to express gratitude for all nature; it was thought by imitating the phases of nature men could ally themselves harmoniously with her. Essentially there has been little change in the motivation of Oriental music since those far centuries when it was thus devised to give thanksgiving and expression to the multiplications of human emotion. The soul of mankind in the East today expresses itself in much the same musical terms which were adequate many centuries before Christ. There is a Persian saying "Nothing which has quickened the soul of mankind can be entirely lost." There have been periods of musical anæsthesia in the Orient; for instance the one superinduced in 200 B. C. by the order of a great emperor who demanded that all musical instruments and such manuscripts as existed be forthwith destroyed. The later task of musical re-establishment was made especially difficult because of the imperfection that had previously characterized what musical notation existed.

As it had centuries back, the natural music of every Eastern nation today has mystic influence on the passions of its peoples. It is used to express the grave and gay in life, to hearten the weary, to inspire idealism, to stir patriotism and reverence, to propitiate the spirits of heaven and earth, to mark, variously, holidays and sombre obsequies, in large to make articulate all experiences of mankind. At the death of an Imperial Concubine in 1464 all music in the Chinese Empire was stopped for five days. But at the usual music hour the choirs and orchestras assembled, instruments in hand, to spend the appointed time in silence.

The Occident in general considers Oriental music a mere succession of monotonous and cacaphonous sounds. If, however, these sounds seem careless, judged by Occidental musical standards, it should be remembered that the entrancing harmonies they possess for Oriental ears are had only by using such instruments as seem appropriate and sound well together, and that what we consider unusual and irregular sounds express, on the contrary a spontaneous and profound admiration for all Nature, according to Oriental thought.

In the East, too, the music of the West is unenviable. Henry Eichheim, whose Javanese and Burmese sketches are included in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for yesterday afternoon and this evening, and whose "Oriental Impressions," "Malay Mosaic" and "Chinese Legend" have been played by eminent European and American symphony orchestras, tells of dining one evening with Mrs. Eichheim at the Tokyo home of Prince Tokugawa. After dinner a fellow guest drew from the sleeve of his kimona a "sho," traditional Japanese instrument of reed, fashioned of bamboo and having seventeen tubes. In the silence of a beautiful room this man played a cycle of ancient Japanese songs. The music, as his fingers moved with gentle precision among the tubes, was acutely pleasing to the Eastern ear, but as inexplicable as it was lovely to the Western. When its sounds had drifted away Mr. and Mrs. Eichheim played, upon piano and violin, some of Debussy, a little of Saint-Saëns, other things seemingly suitable to the occasion; but they were vaguely dubious of their music. Dim phantoms hovered in the room of a too different mode of music; and the contrast was sharp between the imaginative music of the East, played with wondrous simplicity by a grave scholar upon an almost primitive instrument, and what is known as modern music in the West. A contrast not entirely helpful to the Western music. It was Prof. Tenabe, conductor of the Tokyo Imperial Orchestra, who had played upon the "sho," and it is a fact that Prof. Tenabe believes no good music has been written in 300 years.

119

To the Oriental the music of his race is the distillation of harmony existing between mankind and heaven and earth. It was not Confucius alone who believed music vitally affected the constitution of the State, hence that to govern men was to guide their feelings rightly; and how better than by music "which softens the manners, disarms force by grace, brings nearer and binds together the various elements of society"? In China students commonly agree that the Emperor Fu Hsi (B. C. 2852) originated the first formal arrangements of music. These, it is said, were inspired by the emperor's own appreciation of and gratitude for all nature. The sounds he devised imitated sounds in nature, and were fashioned into a system whose arrangement made them agreeable to the ear. In 2000 B. C. the Emperor Hwang Ti was commanding his ministers to cut bamboo tubes which could be blown to imitate the notes of the phoenix.

Music is indispensable to the masses in the East. It is not an art merely reserved for those with leisure for the acquisition of culture, but is found everywhere, particularly in humble settings. For instance, the motives of a Japanese Nocturne, which Eichheim has translated into the modern orchestral idiom of the West, were heard at night in Ikao and Matsushima, in Yokohama and Tokyo, variously sung and played on instruments by blind masseurs, chanted by old men beating small wooden bells, shrilly piped by food vendors; they reproduce the sounds of the "koto," fish head drums, flutes, the mixed, muted and murmurous music of Japanese night. The materials of a Chinese sketch, likewise, were heard in temples and in theaters, tea houses and streets, during the following after of wedding and funeral processions, in the listening to street cries and the thousand sounds of city and country life heard in Peiping, Hang Chow and the Buddhistic temples of the Western hills.

On the other hand this Chinese Legend opens with an example of the formalized, traditional music of a Chinese ceremonial, written about 700 A. D. by an emperor. In Korea travelers often remark the theme of a song of street laborers of Seoul. Ordinarily five men sing this song during their working hours. One sings the refrain, the other four answer. Since such laborers work only when it occurs to them the flavor of the pieces is distinctly humorous.

The incessant indispensibility of music, as an adjunct to all eastern activity, will be understood when the variety of its uses is considered. Music constantly accompanies labor, study, meditation and celebration; it is relied upon to appease spirits, and is formally credited with exerting happy prenatal influence over mothers and their children; as it is essential to the conduct of religious festivals it is likewise necessary to the proper observance of all great occasions such as coronations, receptions of foreign ministers and guests, the festivities of weddings and birthdays. Civic calamity has instant musical accompaniment, and the greeting of ordinary household guests, thanksgiving for rain or good harvests, lightening of labors in the rice fields, heartening of beggars and wayfarers, charming of society; variously the animation of strife or peace are habitually accomplished with the appointed influence of music. It has two essential forms, sacred and secular, with minutely prescribed forms to govern the worship of heaven and earth and ancestors.

[illegible] priests at Wu Tai Shan intone prayers in deep notes a fifth, or [illegible]n octave, apart. And it is obvious [illegible]o happening of any consequence [illegible]ere in the East, whether religious or secular, can take place without [illegible]ompanying music.

[illegible]progress of Christianity and civili[illegible]n the Orient has gradually lifted [illegible]e to a loftier plane. No music in [illegible]ion possesses such crystallization [illegible]nce and phantasy as the music of [illegible]nd Japan, of Java, Korea and [illegible]tts study by the Occidental stu[illegible]ns new fields for the cultivation [illegible]otation of new harmonies, tim[illegible]ressions and linear suggestions. [illegible]orsakov worked from a music [illegible]rer East as Bartok has worked [illegible]unes of the Hungarian gypsies, [illegible]t from those of the Indians, [illegible] treasure waits for the student [illegible]nge magic which is the music East.

[illegible], it was during the reign of "The Yellow Emperor," (B.C. [illegible]certain tones were taken as [illegible]s were fixed, names attached [illegible]d an association definitely [illegible]en notes and celestial bodies. [illegible]with became an avenue to [illegible]ment and was recognized [illegible]e empire as an influence for [illegible]e better and happier. Suc[illegible]rors composed hymns to re[illegible] life. It is recorded that in [illegible]icius was so impressed with [illegible]sed by the great Shun (B. C. [illegible] "abstained from meat for [illegible]' which is a charming way [illegible] for three months he con[illegible]y upon the beauty and sig[illegible]e hymn. In China music [illegible]principles; the 's'hen-li" or [illegible] the "ch'ishu" or substan[illegible]

[illegible]ed on Page Seven

[illegible] 2
[illegible]NY
11
[illegible]RLINI
[illegible]AELLI
[illegible]LENTI
Stars of 50
Tues..
[illegible]rs. Bo-
[illegible]t. Mat..
[illegible]es.. Car-
Thurs..
[illegible]l. Fri..
[illegible]t. Eve..
[illegible]—Carlo
[illegible]ra House
[illegible]SCRIPT
16, 1929

[illegible]tal Music

[illegible] from Page Five

CON. ON PAGE 120

12 D

tial. The touchstone of Eastern music is, generally, spiritual harmony. The Chinese have a saying that harmony of the heart produces harmony of the breath, harmony of the breath produces harmony of the voice, and that the voice is symbolic of the ineffable harmony existing between heaven and earth. The Oriental generally believes that music without poetry is scarcely music, and that worship without poetry is no worship at all.

The element of fitness which inevitably surrounds eastern musical expression is very impressive. Although the vast shimmer of sound which is inseparable from all Oriental neighborhoods bespeaks the spontaneous expression of natural emotions it largely follows characteristic forms. The milliner has his own music, made with a drum to whose upper side is affixed a "T'ao-Ku" or gong. When the milliner makes the musical noises typically associated with his calling there is no likelihood of his being mistaken, let us say, for the candy merchant who has a small "lo" or gong of a different type as aid to his business. And it would not be possible in all the east to find a milliner who would relinquish his drum and "T'ao-Ku" for the simple "lo."

Fitness is a predominant characteristic of the music of India too. For a time one Abdul Kahrim, an Hindu musician of Persian extraction, was going about on a musical pilgrimage from the north through the south, teaching those he could interest in the ancient music of his people. He was singing with the utmost simplicity and virtuosity, many folk songs that had come down across the centuries, dependent for perpetuation in the knowledge of succeeding generations upon such devotees of their beauties as he. He was known to be able to sing one song in particular about a blue flower. Abdul Kahrim was one of the few who knew the song. And one day an Occidental ran across him and asked him to sing the song of the blue flower. Abdul Kahrim smiled with gentle gravity after an instant's silence, and then he said that the song about the blue flower might only be sung at 2 o'clock upon a certain afternoon after the rice harvest. At 2 o'clock upon the afternoon after the rice harvest the Occidental would be gone from the country. . . . So he never heard the song about the blue flower.

The original five notes of China denote the essence of five major planets in heaven and on earth, the soul of the five elements, and, in a man, the sound of his five organs. They correspond also to the five virtues.

Professional musicians are happily numerous, travelling in groups or singly. The individual musicians are an important part of the Oriental picture, various portions of their persons having affixed instruments sufficient to make a small but complete band; bells are attached to their heads, bones to their ankles, cymbals to their knees and they carry fiddles or flutes to play as well. Blind musicians invariably play only secular music; music is practically the only occupation open to them and the mission schools have classes for them. Then there are the troubadours which come to the villages at eventide and play while one of their number tells legends of the great life of their countries, or the stories of famous men and women. The accompaniment is upon two or three instruments, a sort of guitar, a fiddle, perchance a flute and any of a variety of drums. The villagers, their work finished, gather around the musicians in some convenient place and give an hour or two to the most apparent enoyment of the incident. In the cities numerous bands parade the streets, and offer their services wherever there seems to be something going on. The most wrapt attention is given the ballad singers as they exhibit emotion, picturing suffering or laughing heartily as the occasion requires, and the bands have a variety of cheap, simple instruments with which addition is made to the din.

Eastern music has pronounced seasonal significance. There is, for example, a certain kind of music heard in China at the Winter Solstice, "when the sun commences to beat warmly and to revive all things." There is music for the passing of the Summer Solstice, "to provide a sort of solemn recessional for the sun." The Chinese relate their music to the twelve moons of the year, and there are various kinds of music to suit the five types of etiquette; for joyful occasions, for calamity, for martial pageants, for congratulations and for a welcome to guests. Music for ancestral worship is, of course, a survival of the very earliest periods of civilization in the Orient.

When the Oriental worships Confucius his music is slow, and the notes traverse a small compass. Confucius was perhaps the greatest exponent of the "Doctrine of the Mean," and it would be manifestly unseemly, therefore, to worship him with elaborate or sumptuous music.

The composer desiring to secure in the Orient themes to be made intelligible to audiences 12,000 miles away to the West must go to the East empty-handed. He must go looking for everything yet looking for nothing. He must have forgotten the classics of the West, he must have forgotten the major and minor scales, particularly in China, for the Chinese scale is made up of irregular, untempered intervals and has no leading notes in it, so that it may not be called either major or minor, although it has suggestions of both. Chinese instruments are often not carefully made although they are frequently made of the richest materials imaginable. The melody of Chinese tunes is never supported by the chords and harmonies we believe give substance and richness to Western music. Our chords and intricate harmonies have earned for us in the Orient a reputation for toleration of barbarous sound. Our progress in scientific and other fields is pointed to and it is considered pitiable that we have remained musically at a standstill. Our melodic principles are generally conceded to be the symbol not of artistic virtue but of arrested development.

Thinness of sound is basic in the free-voiced music of the East. Western melodic line has no approximation and a quite different balance of instruments replaces the sumptuous instrumental resources common to the conventional Western symphony orchestra.

Instruments of the Orient fall into eight classifications. Metal, stone, earthen or porcelain, silk or stringed, melon or wind, leather, bambo and wood. In 785, in the reign of the Emperor Teh Tsung, jade instruments were used in India by the Buddhists and some were taken at that time into China. In 1056 the Emperor TuTsung had a flute made of a substance resembling tortoise shell. Often Eastern instruments have been made of red ivory, sometimes of the bark of beech trees or leaves. The "sung" is made of perfect reeds. There is the "sho" which is a traditional instrument continuing in use today. There are harps and musical stones, the considerable variety of bells and drums, the moon-shaped guitar, three stringed guitar, two stringed violin, clarinet, cymbals and flutes. The marimba, which is a kind of xylophone, is probably of Javanese origin, discovered in 1704 on one of Churchill's voyages. On the Emerald Buddhist Temple in Siam, where the King of Siam worships when he is in Bankok, four bells hang and when they wave in the wind they make an irregular and much admired sound. The roofs of the Temple are of Chinese Imperial Yellow tile bordered with indigo blue pillars of exquisite mosaic, and the centre of interest is the Emerald Buddha, that green jade figure enthroned under golden umbrellas and surrounded by praying devas. The image was unearthed at Kiong-Hai nearly five centuries ago, was subsequently stolen by invading Cambodians and later recovered by the Siamese. The temple was begun in 1785 and there was a considerable period during which it remained half finished. In 1879 the King vowed to complete it and it was dedicated April 21, 1882.

In Java all things are done with the utmost subtlety and glowing beauty. For sheer musical beauty Java is particularly rich. Its music is one of the most lovely treasuries of sound to be found anywhere in the East. The "gamelang" or theater of Java is possibly unsurpassed, with its combined music and acting. The two are wedded to such a degree of perfection that they seem to have advanced far beyond European culture. Even "Pelleas and Melisande" is unlikely to give such pleasure as this extra-stage art of Ja.., which has the Noh drama of Japan for its only rival. The Javanese orchestra consists of wind, string and percussion instruments, the latter in preponderance to the other two.

The only possible means of reproducing the music of the Orient in the West is by borrowing a few of the more readily mastered instruments, such as bells, cymbals, small gongs and native drums and of approximating the sounds of others with instruments commonly in use by Western players. The typical attenuation of sound can be produced by the use of a few players instead of many; the fragile tones of the "chao" psaltery, "which begin and end on the bridge of the silver-crested love pheasant" (a purely symbolic term meaning, of course, that the instrument is the proper one for the playing of love songs) can be reproduced reasonably accurately with reed or string. It would be useless to try to bring from the East into the West the "Yu-ti" and "Yu-hsio," flutes of marble, so made because they are less susceptible to changes of temperature; the "Hai-lo" or soldier's conch finds a very excellent likeness in the European bugle. And, curiously enough, although it requires considerable experimenting with tonal quality, Chinese woodblock, the piccolo, flutes, oboes, the English horn, bassoons, harps and a variety of cymbals and drums will very creditably reproduce characteristic street sounds of the East; the song of the water carrier who balances his waterpots upon a bambo rod swung across his neck; the strange chant of the aged man busy with his evening prayers; the whining melody of the street musician playing his "ekeh" or reed instrument of bamboo; the shrill cries of female peddlers and the

M[illegible]ic Notes
[illegible]omment

Globe Nov 27

L[illegible]zky's contract with the Bo[illegible]ny is understood to permit [illegible]ust not more than three pai[illegible]its out of the 24 in the reg[illegible]s other leaders. It is his [illegible]turn over the pair of Bos[illegible]s following the orchestra's first [illegible]t to New York to Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and now officially announced from Symphony Hall as its assistant conductor. For two pairs at mid-season guest leaders are invited. This year the Russian composer Glazunov will lead those in the week of Jan 13. It is said that Mr Arbos, the admirable Spanish conductor heard here last season, may again appear as guest leader in January. One hope that he will, remembering the remarkably fine playing of the orchestra under his baton last Winter. For this week's concert Mr Burgin now proposes a revised program with Wetzler's "Basque Venus" as its novelty. Thibaud will appear as soloist, lest subscribers complain that no notable figure is to take part in the concert.

The Wetzler work is taken from an opera of the same name which had its premiere at the Leipzig Stadttheatre Nov 18, 1928. The libretto was written by the composer's wife, Lini Wetzler, after the Merimee book, "La Venus d'Ile." The story deals with the pervasive and evil influence of every one coming within range of a statue of the Goddess of Love, which had been unearthed on the ancestral estate of a Basque nobleman. The excerpt from the opera which will be played by the Symphony Orchestra, is a dance elaborately developed from four themes.

Trans Nov 27

Concert-Chronicle

Straussian Delirium

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday two new works (at least to Boston) were originally listed—from Schmitt and Hindemith. Both are now replaced by a very new novelty from the German, Hermann Hans Wetzler—the "Symphonic Dance" from his opera, "The Basque Venus," lately played in New York under Toscanini, then rivaling Ravel's "Bolero" as generator of excitement.

Wetzler was born at Frankfort-on-the Main, Sept. 8, 1870. But he spent his childhood years in America. In 1882, at the age of twelve, he was sent back to Frankfort to study music at the Conservatory. There his teacher for the piano was Clara Schumann; for the violin, Hugo Heermann; in composition, Engelbert Humperdinck. In 1892 he returned to America, and from 1897 to 1901 was organist of Trinity Church in New York. In 1903 he established the Wetzler Symphony Concerts, in the orchestra of which Richard Strauss conducted during his first visit to this country. It was with this orchestra that he gave the first performance anywhere of his "Sinfonia Domestica," March 1, 1904. The following year Wetzler returned to Germany, where he has held important positions as operatic conductor.

"Die Baskische Venus," Wetzler's fourteenth work, is based on Prosper Merimée's story, "La Venus d'Ille." The

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

quality of [illegible] first and only time to the Guild's performance of M. Rolland's play. [The Evening Post libretto was written by the composer's wife. Actually there is no "Basque Venus," except in the imaginations of composer and librettist; for Merimée's story runs course in southern France. For purposes of their own, the Wetzlers moved the scene slightly—across the Pyrenees. Thus the composer could delve deeply into that now fashionable source of materia musica—Spanish dances, rhythms and "local color." Thus furnished, he could give the opera the treatment he desired.

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

In the program book of the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Gilman summarizes the action of the opera: "It springs from the discovery of a bronze statue, supposed to have been made by the Greek sculptor Myron. The chief actor in the tale takes a ring from his finger during a game of tennis, and places it on one of the fingers of the statue. Remembering, late in the evening, where he had put it, he reports with much perturbation that the Venus has closed her hand on the ring, and that he is unable to remove it. The next day he is found crushed to death, presumably after having been embraced by the bronze Venus." The opera was first performed at the Municipal Opera House in Leipzig, Nov. 18, 1928.

The "Symphonic Dance in Basque Style," as the title on the flyleaf runs, occurs at the beginning of the second act. The score, published separately, calls for a large, Straussian orchestra. In concert it was played first by Dr. Muck at Hamburg, Jan. 7, 1929. It has been heard in America from the Chicago Orchestra (Feb. 8, 1929), from the Detroit Orchestra (Oct. 31, 1929), from the Philharmonic Society of New York (Nov. 14, 1929). Among the many currents of modern music, it flows out of the Straussian channel. Though the dance is played without pause, it runs in five divisions: I. Basque Fandango; II. Zortziko; III. Andante-Misterioso; IV. Espata-Dantza; V. Arin-Arin. The instrumentation of all five is full and brilliant. Wetzler prefaces the music with an anlytical summary:

> Basque youths and maidens dance the characteristic national dances before the guests at the wedding-feast in the castle. They are under the spell of the demoniacal force of the mysterious antique bronze statue of Venus, the silver eyes of which exercise a magic influence upon all the actors and events of the opera. Under this weird influence the dance assumes an ever-changing character.
>
> At the beginning, the sprightly strains of the Basque fandango are gradually worked to a climax of amorous ecstasy. The bold spirited Zortziko [a dance accompanied by tambourines, fifes and a kind of flageolet] which follows, is interrupted by a suggestion of the mysterious power that emanates from the staue and takes hold of the dancers. It is followed by an Ezpata-dantza [a sword-dance] on a Basque theme. Towards the end, the wild Arin-Arin [a highly rhythmical dance] grows more and more impetuous and reaches a climax of orgiastic frenzy.
>
> This dance-fantasy is the crystallization, in free symphonic form, of the impressions which the composer received from the ancient national dances of the Basque people. With the exception of the melody in the Sword-Dance, which is symphonically developed, no original Basque themes have been employed.

Forthcoming Programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in Symphony Hall:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Concerto for Piano with Orchestra in A minor.....Schumann
(Pianist: Martha Baird)
Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ("The Pathetic").....Chaikovsky

From Mr. Iturbi, the notable pianist, who will be heard for the first time in Boston next Monday afternoon and who has reconsidered the program originally proposed

Sonata in A major.....Mozart
Arabesque.....Schumann
Waltz in G-flat—Polonaise in A-flat.....Chopin
Variations on a Theme of Paganini.....Brahms
(Abridges Version by The Pianist)
Pavane.....Ravel
Danse de la prayeur.....de Falla
Corpus-Christi at Seville.....Albeniz
Pelele (The Basque Game).....Granados

From Beatrice Harrison, the eminent

The Round of Concerts Now Running Full

Ravel's Impending "Bolero," The Harvard Glee Club Widens Its Field

Trans. Nov. 29

NEARLY every musical year brings its sensational piece. Within memory, it was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," or more particularly the high-rhythmed crescendo, in the fourth division, of legionaries marching the Appian Way. Now, it is "Bolero," Ravel's tour de force, originally brief ballet for Mme. Ida Rubinstein in Paris, heard as symphonic piece two week's ago from Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society in New York; to be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts next week. At the first performance and at several repetitions, the Manhattanese shouted their pleasure, and talked of little else in the concert. Yet a few hissed, inasmuch as "Bolero" is modernistic and devoid of that precious commodity, "spirituality." Whether Bostonians will rise to like pitch remains to be seen; but they are little likely to hiss, since Ravel's name has long been sanctified among them.

Having heard "Bolero," Mr. Gilman wrote in The Herald Tribune: "The problem that Ravel set himself 'was' to repeat a single theme incessantly over a basso ostinato, without the relief of any trick of development, of any change in rhythm, of any change of key (until a dozen bars before the end), and without any incidental passage, contenting himself with giving different colors to the motif by the most varied play of instrumentation, thus achieveing a sonorous progression uninterrupted virtually until the close.'

"The outcome is irresistible. Ravel has turned off, in his brilliant and fluent way, an astonishing piece of bravura, captivating to the sense and the fancy. The result may not survive among the major products of Ravel's assured and necromantic art, but it is likely to remain with us and yield us joy. The insolent disdain of monotony's dire peril; the wit (insolent too) of the manner in which the saxophones are employed; the long and insidious crescendo; the effect of the modulation to E major just before the close—these things are irresistible; and Thursday night they quite took the house by storm, and Ravel turned out to be the hero of the evening—not unaided, perhaps, by the Milanese mage."

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dec. 6 and 7:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, in G major for String Orchestra.....Bach
Chants Nègres.....Fairchild
Bolero.....Ravel
Symphony, No. 2, in C major.....Schumann

About "Bolero" there is a note elsewhere in these columns. Mr. Fairchild is a Parisian composer of American origin, whose music has seldom made way westward. Not before, in Boston has the conductor set his hand to Schumann's Symphony "of a dark time."

From Dr Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major for String Orchestra.....Bach
Symphony No. 2, in C major.....Schumann
"Mother Goose" (Five Children's Pieces)..Ravel
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the first supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Dec. 10:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, for String Orchestra.....Bach
Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543).....Mozart
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

From Mr. Kreisler for his concert of [illegible] Quartet.

Dr. Koussevitsky and the Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert in New York on Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, for the profit of the Russian exiles, [illegible]illar charity in Boston as well. . . . The Senate of the Free City of Hamburg has commanded a portrait of Dr. Muck, to be hung in the Rathaus as memorial of his services to music as conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society.

The Associated Press devotes a considerable telegram to the approaching performance in Cincinnati of a Symphony by Frederick the Great, quite innocent of the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky produced it last winter in both Boston and New York. Even the New York Times, which usually remembers things, caught at the bait. . . . Mr. Kreisler lately sent a draft of $3500 to the High School of Music in Vienna as principle of a scholarship for young violinists.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

12 D

tial. The touchstone of Eastern music is, generally, spiritual harmony. The Chinese have a saying that harmony of the heart produces harmony of the breath, harmony of the breath produces harmony of the voice, and that the voice is symbolic of the ineffable harmony existing between heaven and earth. The Oriental generally believes that music without poetry is scarcely music, and that worship without poetry is no worship at all.

The element of fitness which inevitably surrounds eastern musical expression is very impressive. Although the vast shimmer of sound which is inseparable from all Oriental neighborhoods bespeaks the spontaneous expression of natural emotions it largely follows characteristic forms. The milliner has his own music, made with a drum to whose upper side is affixed a "T'ao-Ku" or gong. When the milliner makes the musical noises typically associated with his calling there is no likelihood of his being mistaken, let us say, for the candy merchant who has a small "lo" or gong of a different type as aid to his business. And it would not be possible in all the east to find a milliner who would relinquish his drum and "T'ao-Ku" for the simple "lo."

Fitness is a predominant characteristic of the music of India too. For a time one Abdul Kahrim, an Hindu musician of Persian extraction, was going about on a musical pilgrimage from the north through the south, teaching those he could interest in the ancient music of his people. He was singing with the utmost simplicity and virtuosity, many folk songs that had come down across the centuries, dependent for perpetuation in the knowledge of succeeding generations upon such devotees of their beauties as he. He was known to be able to sing one song in particular about a blue flower. Abdul Kahrim was one of the few who knew the song. And one day an Occidental ran across him and asked him to sing the song of the blue flower. Abdul Kahrim smiled with gentle gravity after an instant's silence, and then he said that the song about the blue flower might only be sung at 2 o'clock upon a certain afternoon after the rice harvest. At 2 o'clock upon the afternoon after the rice harvest the Occidental would be gone from the country. . . . So he never heard the song about the blue flower.

The original five notes of China denote the essence of five major planets in heaven and on earth, the soul of the five elements, and, in a man, the sound of his five organs. They correspond also to the five virtues.

Professional musicians are happily numerous, travelling in groups or singly. The individual musicians are an important part of the Oriental picture, various portions of their persons having affixed instruments sufficient to make a small but complete band; bells are attached to their heads, bones to their ankles, cymbals to their knees and they carry fiddles or flutes to play as well. Blind musicians invariably play only secular music; music is practically the only occupation open to them and the mission schools have classes for them. Then there are the troubadours which come to the villages at eventide and play while one of their number tells legends of the great life of their countries, or the stories of famous men and women. The accompaniment is upon two or three instruments, a sort of guitar, a fiddle, perchance a flute and any of a variety of drums. The villagers, their work finished, gather around the musicians in some convenient place and give an hour or two to the most apparent enoyment of the incident. In the cities numerous bands parade the streets and offer their services wherever there seems to be something going on. The most wrapt attention is given the ballad singers as they exhibit emotion, picturing suffering or laughing heartily as the occasion requires, and the bands have a variety of cheap, simple instruments with which addition is made to the din.

Eastern music has pronounced seasonal significance. There is, for example, a certain kind of music heard in China at the Winter Solstice, "when the sun commences to beat warmly and to revive all things." There is music for the passing of the Summer Solstice, "to provide a sort of solemn recessional for the sun." The Chinese relate their music to the twelve moons of the year, and there are various kinds of music to suit the five types of etiquette; for joyful occasions, for calamity, for martial pageants, for congratulations and for a welcome to guests. Music for ancestral worship is, of course, a survival of the very earliest periods of civilization in the Orient.

When the Oriental worships Confucius his music is slow, and the notes traverse a small compass. Confucius was perhaps the greatest exponent of the "Doctrine of the Mean," and it would be manifestly unseemly, therefore, to worship him with elaborate or sumptuous music.

The composer desiring to secure in the Orient themes to be made intelligible to audiences 12,000 miles away to the West must go to the East empty-handed. He must go looking for everything yet looking for nothing. He must have forgotten the classics of the West, he must have forgotten the major and minor scales, particularly in China, for the Chinese scale is made up of irregular, untempered intervals and has no leading notes in it, so that it may not be called either major or minor, although it has suggestions of both. Chinese instruments are often not carefully made although they are frequently made of the richest materials imaginable. The melody of Chinese tunes is never supported by the chords and harmonies we believe give substance and richness to Western music. Our chords and intricate harmonies have earned for us in the Orient a reputation for toleration of barbarous sound. Our progress in scientific and other fields is pointed to and it is considered pitiable that we have remained musically at a standstill. Our melodic principles are generally conceded to be the symbol not of artistic virtue but of arrested development.

Thinness of sound is basic in the free-voiced music of the East. Western melodic line has no approximation and a quite different balance of instruments replaces the sumptuous instrumental resources common to the conventional Western symphony orchestra.

Instruments of the Orient fall into eight classifications. Metal, stone, earthen or porcelain, silk or stringed, melon or wind, leather, bambo and wood. In 785, in the reign of the Emperor Teh Tsung, jade instruments were used in India by the Buddhists and some were taken at that time into China. In 1056 the Emperor TuTsung had a flute made of a substance resembling tortoise shell. Often Eastern instruments have been made of red ivory, sometimes of the bark of beech trees or leaves. The "sung" is made of perfect reeds. There is the "sho" which is a traditional instrument continuing in use today. There are harps and musical stones, the considerable variety of bells and drums, the moon-shaped guitar, three stringed guitar, two stringed violin, clarinet, cymbals and flutes. The marimba, which is a kind of xylophone, is probably of Javanese origin, discovered in 1704 on one of Churchill's voyages. On the Emerald Buddhist Temple in Siam, where the King of Siam worships when he is in Bankok, four bells hang and when they wave in the wind they make an irregular and much admired sound. The roofs of the Temple are of Chinese Imperial Yellow tile bordered with indigo blue pillars of exquisite mosaic, and the centre of interest is the Emerald Buddha, that green jade figure enthroned under golden umbrellas and surrounded by praying devas. The image was unearthed at Kiong-Hai nearly five centuries ago, was subsequently stolen by invading Cambodians and later recovered by the Siamese. The temple was begun in 1785 and there was a considerable period during which it remained half finished. In 1879 the King vowed to complete it and it was dedicated April 21, 1882.

In Java all things are done with the utmost subtlety and glowing beauty. For sheer musical beauty Java is particularly rich. Its music is one of the most lovely treasuries of sound to be found anywhere in the East. The "gamelang" or theater of Java is possibly unsurpassed, with its combined music and acting. The two are wedded to such a degree of perfection that they seem to have advanced far beyond European culture. Even "Pelleas and Melisande" is unlikely to give such pleasure as this extra-stage art of Java which has the Noh drama of Japan for its only rival. The Javanese orchestra consists of wind, string and percussion instruments, the latter in preponderance to the other two.

The only possible means of reproducing the music of the Orient in the West is by borrowing a few of the more readily mastered instruments, such as bells, cymbals, small gongs and native drums and of approximating the sounds of others with instruments commonly in use by Western players. The typical attenuation of sound can be produced by the use of a few players instead of many; the fragile tones of the "chao" psaltery, "which begin and end on the bridge of the silver-crested love pheasant" (a purely symbolic term meaning, of course, that the instrument is the proper one for the playing of love songs) can be reproduced reasonably accurately with reed or string. It would be useless to try to bring from the East into the West the "Yu-ti" and "Yu-hsio," flutes of marble, so made because they are less susceptible to changes of temperature; the "Hai-lo" or soldier's conch finds a very excellent likeness in the European bugle. And, curiously enough, although it requires considerable experimenting with tonal quality, Chinese woodblock, the piccolo, flutes, oboes, the English horn, bassoons, harps and a variety of cymbals and drums will very creditably reproduce characteristic street sounds of the East; the song of the water carrier who balances his waterpots upon a bambo rod swung across his neck; the strange chant of the aged man busy with his evening prayers; the whining melody of the street musician playing his "ekeh" or reed instrument of bamboo; the shrill cries of female peddlers and the rhythmic, somber song of boatmen maneuvering their boats about cluttered yellow streams; and the more consequential temple music, and still more nerve-stretching fascinations of Chinese dins which gradually sort themselves and fall into arrangements than can be fixed and verified.

JANET MABIE

THANKS for a Show
That's RKO

TALK
SING
JEIS

Globe

from Symphony Hall as guest conductor. For two pairs at mid-season guest leaders are invited. This year the Russian composer Glazunov will lead those in the week of Jan 13. It is said that Mr Arbos, the admirable Spanish conductor heard here last season, may again appear as guest leader in January. One hope that he will, remembering the remarkably fine playing of the orchestra under his baton last Winter. For this week's concert Mr Burgin now proposes a revised program with Wetzler's "Basque Venus" as its novelty. Thibaud will appear as soloist, lest subscribers complain that no notable figure is to take part in the concert.

The Wetzler work is taken from an opera of the same name which had its premiere at the Leipzig Stadttheatre Nov 18, 1928. The libretto was written by the composer's wife, Lini Wetzler, after the Merimee book, "La Venus d'Ile." The story deals with the pervasive and evil influence of every one coming within range of a statue of the Goddess of Love, which had been unearthed on the ancestral estate of a Basque nobleman. The excerpt from the opera which will be played by the Symphony Orchestra, is a dance elaborately developed from four themes.

Trans Nov 29

Concert-Chronicle

Straussian Delirium

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday two new works (at least to Boston) were originally listed—from Schmitt and Hindemith. Both are now replaced by a very new novelty from the German, Hermann Hans Wetzler—the "Symphonic Dance" from his opera, "The Basque Venus," lately played in New York under Toscanini, then rivaling Ravel's "Bolero" as generator of excitement.

Wetzler was born at Frankfort-on-the Main, Sept. 8, 1870. But he spent his childhood years in America. In 1882, at the age of twelve, he was sent back to Frankfort to study music at the Conservatory. There his teacher for the piano was Clara Schumann; for the violin, Hugo Heermann; in composition, Engelbert Humperdinck. In 1892 he returned to America, and from 1897 to 1901 was organist of Trinity Church in New York. In 1903 he established the Wetzler Symphony Concerts, in the orchestra of which Richard Strauss conducted during his first visit to this country. It was with this orchestra that he gave the first performance anywhere of his "Sinfonia Domestica," March 1, 1904. The following year Wetzler returned to Germany, where he has held important positions as operatic conductor.

"Die Baskische Venus," Wetzler's fourteenth work, is based on Prosper Merimée's story, "La Venus d'Ille." The quality of [illegible] for the first and only time to the Guild's performance of M. Rolland's play. [The Evening Post libretto was written by the composer's wife. Actually there is no "Basque Venus," except in the imaginations of composer and librettist; for Merimée's story runs course in southern France. For purposes of their own, the Wetzlers moved the scene slightly—across the Pyrenees. Thus the composer could delve deeply into that now fashionable source of materia musica—Spanish dances, rhythms and "local color." Thus furnished, he could give the opera the treatment he desired.

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

In the program book of the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Gilman summarizes the action of the opera: "It springs from the discovery of a bronze statue, supposed to have been made by the Greek sculptor Myron. The chief actor in the tale takes a ring from his finger during a game of tennis, and places it on one of the fingers of the statue. Remembering, late in the evening, where he had put it, he reports with much perturbation that the Venus has closed her hand on the ring, and that he is unable to remove it. The next day he is found crushed to death, presumably after having been embraced by the bronze Venus." The opera was first performed at the Municipal Opera House in Leipzig, Nov. 18, 1928.

The "Symphonic Dance in Basque Style," as the title on the flyleaf runs, occurs at the beginning of the second act. The score, published separately, calls for a large, Straussian orchestra. In concert it was played first by Dr. Muck at Hamburg, Jan. 7, 1929. It has been heard in America from the Chicago Orchestra (Feb. 8, 1929), from the Detroit Orchestra (Oct. 31, 1929), from the Philharmonic Society of New York (Nov. 14, 1929). Among the many currents of modern music, it flows out of the Straussian channel. Though the dance is played without pause, it runs in five divisions: I. Basque Fandango; II. Zortziko; III. Andante-Misterioso; IV. Espata-Dantza; V. Arin-Arin. The instrumentation of all five is full and brilliant. Wetzler prefaces the music with an anlytical summary:

> Basque youths and maidens dance the characteristic national dances before the guests at the wedding-feast in the castle. They are under the spell of the demoniacal force of the mysterious antique bronze statue of Venus, the silver eyes of which exercise a magic influence upon all the actors and events of the opera. Under this weird influence the dance assumes an ever-changing character.
>
> At the beginning, the sprightly strains of the Basque fandango are gradually worked to a climax of amorous ecstasy. The bold spirited Zortziko [a dance accompanied by tambourines, fifes and a kind of flageolet] which follows, is interrupted by a suggestion of the mysterious power that emanates from the staue and takes hold of the dancers. It is followed by an Ezpata-dantza [a sword-dance] on a Basque theme. Towards the end, the wild Arin-Arin [a highly rhythmical dance] grows more and more impetuous and reaches a climax of orgiastic frenzy.
>
> This dance-fantasy is the crystallization, in free symphonic form, of the impressions which the composer received from the ancient national dances of the Basque people. With the exception of the melody in the Sword-Dance, which is symphonically developed, no original Basque themes have been employed.

Forthcoming Programs

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in Symphony Hall:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Concerto for Piano with Orchestra in A minor.....Schumann
(Pianist: Martha Baird)
Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ("The Pathetic").....Chaikovsky

From Mr. Iturbi, the notable pianist, who will be heard for the first time in Boston next Monday afternoon and who has reconsidered the program originally proposed

Sonata in A major.....Mozart
Arabesque.....Schumann
Waltz in G-flat—Polonaise in A-flat.....Chopin
Variations on a Theme of Paganini.....Brahms
(Abridges Version by The Pianist)
Pavane.....Ravel
Danse de la prayeur.....de Falla
Corpus-Christi at Seville.....Albeniz
Pelele (The Basque Game).....Granados

From Beatrice Harrison, the eminent

The Round of Concerts Now Running Full

Ravel's Impending "Bolero," The Harvard Glee Club Widens Its Field

Trans. Nov. 29

NEARLY every musical year brings its sensational piece. Within memory, it was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," or more particularly the high-rhythmed crescendo, in the fourth division, of legionaries marching the Appian Way. Now, it is "Bolero," Ravel's tour de force, originally brief ballet for Mme. Ida Rubinstein in Paris, heard as symphonic piece two week's ago from Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society in New York; to be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts next week. At the first performance and at several repetitions the Manhattanese shouted their pleasure, and talked of little else in the concert. Yet a few hissed, inasmuch as "Bolero" is modernistic and devoid of that precious commodity, "spirituality." Whether Bostonians will rise to like pitch remains to be seen; but they are little likely to hiss, since Ravel's music has long been sanctified among them.

Having heard "Bolero," Mr. Gilman wrote in The Herald Tribune: "The problem that Ravel set himself was to repeat a single theme incessantly over a basso ostinato, without the relief of any trick of development, of any change in rhythm, of any change of key (until a dozen bars before the end) and without any incidental passage, contenting himself with giving different colors to the motif by the most varied play of instrumentation, thus achieveing a sonorous progression uninterrupted virtually until the close.

"The outcome is irresistible. Ravel has turned off, in his brilliant and fluent way, an astonishing piece of bravura, captivating to the sense and the fancy. Its result may not survive among the imperishable products of Ravel's assured and meritorious art, but it is likely to remain with us and yield us joy. The insolent disdain of monotony's dire peril; the wit (if sly too) of the manner in which the saxophones are employed; the long and insidious crescendo; the effect of the modulation to E major just before the end—these things are irresistible; and Tuesday night they quite took the house by storm, and Ravel turned out to be the hero of the evening—not unaided, perhaps, by the Milanese mage."

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dec. 6 and 7:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, in G major for String Orchestra.....Bach
Chants Nègres.....Fairchild
Bolero.....Ravel
Symphony, No. 2, in C major.....Schumann

About "Bolero" there is a note elsewhere in these columns. Mr. Fairchild is a Parisian composer of American origin, whose music has seldom made way westward. Not before, in Boston has the conductor set his hand to Schumann's Symphony "of a dark time."

From Dr Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major for String Orchestra.....Bach
Symphony No. 2, in C major.....Schumann
"Mother Goose" (Five Children's Pieces)..Ravel
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the first supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Dec. 10:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, for String Orchestra.....Bach
Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543).....Mozart
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

From Mr. Kreisler for his concert of the Durell Quartet.

Dr. Koussevitsky and the Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert in New York on Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, for the profit of the Russian exiles, famillar charity in Boston as well. . . . The Senate of the Free City of Hamburg has commanded a portrait of Dr. Muck, to be hung in the Rathaus as memorial of his services to music as conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society.

The Associated Press devotes a considerable telegram to the approaching performance in Cincinnati of a Symphony by Frederick the Great, quite innocent of the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky produced it last winter in both Boston and New York. Even the New York Times, which usually remembers things, caught at the bait. . . . Mr. Kreisler lately sent a draft of $3500 to the High School of Music in Vienna as principle of a scholarship for young violinists.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky has put on this week's Symphony program in the regular series Ravel's Bolero, the concert version of ballet music written two years ago for Mme Rubinstein. Played the other day in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Toscanini this piece made a sensation described by the reviewers as unequalled since the first New York performances of Stravinsky's "Sacre" some years ago. It is built up from a single rhythmic figure. In the working out Ravel has employed some of the procedures of American jazz, with which he was greatly impressed on his tour of this country. Other novelties will be the "Chants Negres" of the American composer Blair Fairchild, long resident in France.

The soloist at the second of the Boston Symphony's Monday concerts tomorrow night will be Martha Baird, a pianist from California who won the Mason and Hamlin prize at the New England Conservatory several years ago, and has since been heard here in several Jordan Hall recitals. The management of the orchestra has apparently gone back to the time-hallowed policy of allowing young and aspiring artists the privilege of becoming soloists in the Monday series, the original excuse for which was that American audiences demanded soloists. But the Monday concerts are sold out for the current season, and no soloists were announced in advance.

Jose Iturbi, who will make his Boston debut tomorrow afternoon at the Statler in a charity concert, is the most notable new pianist of the current musical season in this country, if his Chicago and Philadelphia press notices may be trusted. Reviewers in those cities speak of him as of the eminence of Horowitz and Gieseking.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 13 1929

SYMPHONY FUND NEARS FIRST GOAL

New Guarantees of $1020 Raise Total to $3939 of $4000 Minimum Needed.

ADDITIONAL SUM WANTED

Desired to Underwrite Popular Concert Series Here in Addition to Boston Orchestra Season

Within reach of its first objective, the Music Association last night acknowledged new guarantees totalling $1020 and turned its efforts to securing the last sums necessary to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season. A minimum of $4000 is needed to continue this winter concert series that has become the feature of the year's music, and $3939 have been subscribed to date.

It is the hope of the association, however, that an additional three or four thousand dollars will be forthcoming to underwrite a concert group to correspond with that which has included the enormously successful appearances of Jascha Heifetz, Dusolina Giannini and Alexander Brailowsky this spring. The Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli are still to fill engagements under the Music Association's auspices.

Any surplus from the Symphony underwriting will be diverted to another popular series, and officers of the association are appealing for more subcriptions with that in mind.

Seven major guarantees are cited on the latest list, including one of $150 from Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, and six of $100 each from Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel, Wilson G. Wing, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., James C. Collins, and Donald E. Jackson.

The complete roster of new guarantors follows:

Mary Carver Smith	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel	100.00
Annette M. Ham	25.00
Mrs. William B. M. Miller	10.00
Mrs. Walter Savage Ball	10.00
Evangeline Larry	5.00
A. P. S.	25.00
Mrs. Henry B. Gardner	10.00
Mrs. C. J. Steedman	25.00
W. H. P. Faunce	20.00
Monday Morning Musical Club	10.00
Wilson G. Wing	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Marshall	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe	150.00
Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.	100.00
James C. Collins	100.00
John O. Ames	50.00
Donald E. Jackson	100.00
Total	$1020.00
Previously acknowledged	2919.00
Total to date	$3939.00

Herald Dec, 5

pieces by Lecuona in a way to give real pleasure.

There was a large audience. Mr. Thomas had to add to his program.

CONCERTS—OPERAS

Dr. Koussevitzky will bring out at the Symphony concerts this week Ravel's Bolero which made a sensation when it was performed recently by the Philharmonic Society of New York. The work is practically a repetition of a dance theme, given to various instruments in turn, then in groups, without change of key—a long crescendo with a final modulation and a stentorian climax. This Bolero was first performed in Paris when Ida Rubenstein danced it with more and more excited spectators on the stage. Blair Fairchild—he was born at Belmont and has lived and composed many years in Paris—has scored his piano piece "Chants Negres" for orchestra. The performance this week will be the first. Mr. Fairchild wrote that the tunes have been familiar to him for many years, but he has forgotten the titles. The program will also comprise Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in two movements, and Schumann's Symphony, G major, No. 2, which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct for the first time in this country.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Bax, Symphony No. 2 (first performance); Lizst, Piano Concerto No. 1 (Jose Iturbi, pianist); Respighi, "The Pines of Rome."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PLATTSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN
MAY 21 1929

CONDUCTOR QUITS IN OPERA QUARREL

PARIS, May 20 (UP)— Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera Boris Godunof at the Paris opera has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAY 12

Music Public Growing, Survey of Season Shows

100,000 a Week Hear Programs; Men Numerous

By Martha Dreiblatt

over $1,000,000 worth of tickets, according to Mr. Heck.

As an indication of the increased popularity of concerts, Mr. Heck points to the fact that for the first time the Boston Symphony series is completely sold out this year, as well as the Philharmonic series. The Philadelphia Symphony has for some years been fully sold out.

Another proof advanced by Mr. Heck

6 Paris Herald May 8

Rise of American Music Noted by Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Director Inspired by "Phenomenal Renaissance."

INTENSITY AIDS ART

Sees Active Temperament as Great Stimulant to Production of Worthy Work.

"On travaille—on désire," were the two phrases used last night by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to describe the "phenomenal musical renaissance" in America. Mr. Koussevitzky arrived on the Cunarder Mauretania and went directly to his home at 8 avenue du Conseiller Colignon. He plans to stay in Europe only a month "because America is now the country which has the most intense musical development in the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky is so decided in his opinions that every phrase he uttered rang with definition. "Americans have 'le tempérament actif'—the active temperament" he declared. Instead of retarding their artistic perceptions as is insisted by so many bitten with the back-to-Europe-for-art's-sake - phobia, Mr. Koussevitzky, stressed that this very activity has been salvation of America's artistic development.

"Everyone is active, and especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

In this connection Mr. Koussevitzky made the following statement: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one finds always a certain circle who attend concerts but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave as specific instances of America's musical development "her twenty superb orchestras," and also "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." The conductor believes that jazz has finished its major rôle as an influence in American music and will henceforth be relegated to the realm of dance. He also considers Stravinsky as perhaps the outstanding influence in modern music in America. However, no matter how much modern musicians have been influenced by this composer, they are always striving to break away from him too. A real musician is always influenced by evolution but not by imitation."

Mr. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra at the Opera here during the forthcoming performance of Boris Godunoff. Next year the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a European tour of six weeks under his direction.

One of the ultimate springtime joys in Paris, consists in attending the Tuesday and Friday evening concerts at the Salle Pleyel. The present series is under the direction of M. Pierre Monteux, who in recent years has become as well known in America as in Europe. After leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years and being engaged at the Metropolitan in New York for several years, he also conducted for some time the Philadelphia Symphony. He has more recently been sharing with Mengelberg the direction of the famous Concertgebouw of Amsterdam. Few conductors possess such prestige as Pierre Monteux; he has, along with the chosen few great living wielders of the baton, the power of galvanizing not only his band but his audience. He is also, as those familiar with his work know, a deviser of most interesting programs. Last night he led an all-Russian program, the two features of which were Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, all too rarely heard. The scherzo, with the pizzicati ensemble, quite reproduces the effect of the balalaika. This seemed a surprise to the groundlings. The other feature of the program was Rachmaninoff's great Concerto in B Minor, probably played as brilliantly by Wladimir Horowitz as anyone could play it except that supreme master, the composer himself. Horowitz's execution last night elicited ten minutes of enthusiastic applause.

For the rest of the season the series is equally promising. Next Friday night the program includes Beethoven's Leonore No. 3, César Franck's B. Minor Symphony, Florent Schmitt's Mirages, and Richard Strauss' Salome dances. The soloist, Mme. Elizabeth Schumann, will sing Schubert's Salve Regina, and a group of songs by Strauss. Tuesday of next week will be an all-Wagner affair, with the usual favorites. The Tristan music, as well as the familiar selections from the Crépuscule des Dieux, will be sung by Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, long an outstanding figure at the Metropolitan Opera.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
MAY 11 1929

Symphony Needs Aid

IT costs about $270,000 to run the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra a year. In Boston last year the Boston Symphony's DEFICIT was $261,000, which is within $9,000 of the entire amount spent by the local one. That shows that our orchestra is run economically.

In Los Angeles one private citizen gives $20,000 a year to support the Symphony Orchestra.

The Board of Supervisors here, knowing that the San Francisco Symphony is economically managed, should have no hesitation about budgeting at least $25,000 a year for it. That would help to meet the inevitable $60,000 deficit which has to be met every year. It would assure the permanence of an institution which gives us all pleasure, and which does much to make our city famous.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISES US.

Says America Leads World in Appreciation of Good Music.

PARIS, May 23 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudonow," before starting on his Summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who before his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State Orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which, instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement, just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America, and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS

CONDUCTOR QUITS IN OPERA QUARREL

PARIS, May 20 (UP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera Boris Godunof at the Paris opera has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 9 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY CANCELS PARIS OPERA CONTRACT

Paris, May 19.—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was invited to conduct the Paris Opera, has cancelled his contract, it was learned here today.

The contract was terminated when members of the orchestra here refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two for the opera "Boris Gudunow."

BLANK PAGE

INCORRECT PAGINATION

120

BLANK PAGE

INCORRECT PAGINATION

122

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ITEM
MOBILE, ALA.

JUN 2 8 1929

MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston Symphony Orchestra May Make Trip if Plans Work Out.

BOSTON, June 28.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris [illegible] orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIRROR
ALTOONA, PA.
JUN 6 1929

MUSICAL PROGRESS

(Chicago Evening News.)

IN AN INTERVIEW with a French newspaper representative the other day, Sergei Koussevitzky, the eminent director of the Bost[illegible] orchestra, asserted that leadership in appreciation of good music, in all its forms and varieties, had passed from Europe to the United States.

Though this may seem to many an extraordinary claim, traveled lovers of music know it is true. The remarkable change has been effected in the last two decades. There are perhaps only two or three orchestras in Europe today that deserve to be placed in the same category with the several first-rate American orchestras. Even the best old-world orchestras cannot achieve the technical and interpretative perfection which is conceded to be characteristic of American performances at their best. And American audiences are conceded to be more critical and more exacting than are those of European music capitals.

These notable and gratifying results are due, of course, to many factors, but the principal one is American generosity. Great orchestras are not self-supporting, and have to be subsidized by governments or private citizens of culture, wealth and public spirit. Without elaborate preparation, thorough rehearsing and painstaking direction, the performances of the best orchestra are mechanical and uninspired. Rehearsals cost money.

American concert and opera audiences demand the best obtainable music regardless of cost, and they are willing to foot the bills, directly or indirectly. The United States is supporting at least ten symphony orchestras and several opera companies. The summer season of opera at Ravinia park, near Chicago, for example, is the wonder of European visitors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JUN 1 3 1929

Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra may [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, returning next week to receive Harvard degree, is able to carry out plan. He eager to "show" Paris properly rearsed orchestra, according to Judge ederick Cabot of trustees. Is all

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
EVE. LEADER
LOWELL, MASS.
JUN 14 1929

speaks well for the attainments he Boston Symphony orchestra its conductor, [illegible]rge Koussevitis reported to be anxious that it ld make a European tour. He that he wants to show musicians there what may be accomplished a properly rehearsed orchestra. no secret that in many of the pean music centres preparation ublic performance is of the most nctory sort, complicated by the ice of orchestra musicians of shing substitutes in their chairs they are filling another enent. The trustees of the n organization have consistupheld the desire of emiconductors for adequate reals. The results have placed rchestra in the first rank. Mr. evitzky's plan is a compliment e men who play under his din and to the judgment of the ement.

f the states are complaining

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JUN 14 1929

Europe may have an opportunity next spring to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra if Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is able to carry out his plans to take the musicians abroad with him for a concert tour.

Next week he will visit Boston for a few days to receive an honorary degree from Harvard university. Although friends of the conductor and officers in charge of the Symphony hall management declined to comment on the possibility of the orchestra's leaving the country, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said that it is a matter of raising sufficient funds.

"If some individual or group comes forward with money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together, and I think it probable that they would vote to sanction the tour," he said. "I think it would be a very desirable thing to make the trip."

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent experiences in Paris are said to have added impetus to plans that he had held for several years to take the orchestra abroad.

He cancelled his performance of "Boris Godounoff" at the opera because players who had not rehearsed under his direction were substituted at the last moment for musicians of the orchestra who had other engagements. Rebelling against this custom, he is said to have determined and declared that a year hence he will show Paris what can be done wiht a properly rehearsed orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is quoted as saying that the tour he plans will include Great Britain, France and Germany, with each city of the European circuit to be thought of as a special problem.

"A piece by an American composer at every concert," he said, according to dispatches from Paris, "the modern school of American composition. That's the idea."

Final decision on the tour rests with the trustees, according to Judge Cabot, who further explained:

"We conceive it to be our duties as trustees to provide for the maintenance of the orchestra at home. Since the orchestra operates at a deficit, which we must ask the public to make up, we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

Although Mr. Koussevitzky has not disclosed where the money is to come from, dispatches indicate that he is quite confident that he can carry out his plans. The sum required would be much more than $100,000, according to Judge Cabot.

Walter Damrosch succeeded in taking the New York Symphony orchestra [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

JUN 1[illegible]

It speaks well for the attainments of the Boston Symphony orchestra that its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is reported to be anxious that it should make a European tour. He says that he wants to show musicians over there what may be accomplished with a properly rehearsed orchestra. It is no secret that in many of the European music centres preparation for public performance is of the most perfunctory sort, complicated by the practice of orchestra musicians of furnishing substitutes in their chairs while they are filling another engagement. The trustees of the Boston organization have consistently upheld the desire of eminent conductors for adequate rehearsals. The results have placed the orchestra in the first rank. Mr. Koussevitzky's plan is a compliment to the men who play under his direction and to the judgment of the management.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
JUN 1 8 1929

Serge Koussevitsky Returns for Degree

ON BOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE, June 17 (By Radio).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the Ile de France bound for the United States, making the trip from Europe for the sole purpose of receiving an LL.D from Harvard University. When the liner docks tomorrow he will go directly to Boston. He will receive his degree at Harvard on Thursday and sail from New York for Europe again Friday on the Majestic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JUN 15 [illegible]

Charity at Home.

From the Boston Herald.

It has been known for some time that Mr. Koussevitzky is eager to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in cities of Europe. It is natural that he should wish to do this: To acquaint foreign audiences with the remarkable plasticity and euphony of the orchestra that he has shaped to perfection; to show what as conductor, as interpreter, he can do with his superb band of musicians.

It has been rumored for some months that one or more public spirited Bostonians are prepared to defray the cost of the tour. The expense would necessarily be great. Although Mr. Koussevitzky's poetic and magnetic nature was fully recognized before he came to Boston; although the fame of our orchestra has spread throughout the musical world, it is doubtful whether receipts from European concerts would materially lessen the expense. Even if curiosity alone filled the concert halls to overflowing, there would still be a loss. There would possibly be an American rival in the field, for it has been stated that the Philharmonic Society of New York, led by Mr. Toscanini, will tour Europe at the end of next season.

Boston would rejoice in the triumph of its orchestra in foreign cities. Boston would applaud the generosity of the citizens who would largely aid in making this triumph possible. Yet some may say, and not in a carping spirit why should not these lovers of music, these friends and admirers of the conductor and his men, first put the orchestra on a firm foundation in Boston, their home; lead in procuring an endowment fund, so that there would not be a deficit with appeals for pecuniary assistance at the end of each season? Other American cities proud of their orchestras, have given this substantial token of appreciation. Surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state with Mr. Koussevitzky, its inspired and inspiring leader, deserves the recognition that would ensure the utmost freedom in the giving of concerts and provide for a long continuance of its glorious reputation.

And some may say that charity begins at home—nor is the proverb musty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 16 [illegible]

A project to send the Boston Symphony orchestra on a European tour is being discussed. This would require a subscription at home, as the returns from all concerts which might be given abroad would hardly equal the expenses of the undertaking. Some weeks ago it was intimated that the New York Philharmonic orchestra, under Mr Toscanini, might make a tour of Europe next year, and it is natural that some Bostonians should desire to exhibit to Europe the fine achievement of their own orchestra. In view of the fact that deficits in the home season have to be met by public subscription, some may question the desirability of a further subscription for the purpose of exhibiting the orchestra abroad. It is now recognized that American symphony orchestras are unsurpassed in the world. While they are still European in leadership and to a great extent in personnel, they do at least testify to America's desire for musical excellence and willingness to back this desire with money.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JUN 18 1929

KOUSSEVITSKY ON WAY TO GET HARVARD DEGREE

ON BOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE, June 18.—(By Radio)—U. S.—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the Ile De France bound for the United States, making the trip from Europe for the sole purpose of receiving an LL. D. from Harvard University.

When the liner docks today he will go directly to Boston. He will receive his degree at Harvard Thursday and sail from New York for Europe again Friday on the Majestic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 20 1929

KOUSEVITZKY PLANS A TOUR OF EUROPE

Brings Provisional Itinerary for Boston Symphony—To Receive Degree From Harvard.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., June 19.—Serge Kousevitzky, who has come to Boston for a two days' stay to receive an honorary degree from Harvard, has brought with him a provisional itinerary for a European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Spring.

The second Continental visit of an American orchestral group will take the Boston musicians to Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland, provided some one donates funds and provided the trustees will permit the trip.

His proposed schedule provides for an opening in London and a final concert in Paris, with enough concerts in each city visited to make a little season. In Great Britain the planned itinerary calls for concerts in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh, as well as London. The last concert will be at the Sorbonne in Paris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS BEE
JUL 21 1929

Boston Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GAZETTE

ope oston ke a isse-
his how re-

JUN [illegible] 1929

A remarkable contrast is offered [illegible] the cost of recordings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Until a few years ago members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their services free for phonograph recordings. The records were made at Camden, N. J., at only such times as the orchestra being in New York on tour, might stop off long enough to make a record or two. Since then the system has radically changed so that each member of the orchestra, aside from some extra arrangement for Conductor Koussevitsky, received $15 per session. A session was usualy three hours of playing.

The Beethoven Pastoral Symphony was made in from one and a half to two sessions, it is said, and cost for the salaries of the members of the orchestra, alone, something more than $1575. Now the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, it is claimed, has altogether changed system of contracts. Instead of a uniform rate for all musicians, some of whom are recognized virtuosi and some merely hack players, the system is to pay each man 25 per cent of his weekly salary for every recording of two and a half and three hours.

The members of this orchestra, because of certain union rulings, it is said, received until this new arrangement, $20 a man for each two and a half or three-hour session. The information is also that while the Boston Symphony Orchestra made nine recordings last year, the Philadelphia Symphony made 33.

* * * *

Snappy Songs

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS
JUN 29 1929

MAY TOUR EUROPE.

BOSTON.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is to carry out his plan Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

122

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ITEM
MOBILE, ALA.

JUN 28 1929

MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston Symphony Orchestra May Make Trip if Plans Work Out.

BOSTON, June 28.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

[illegible] reputation which is conceded to be characteristic of American performances at their best. And American audiences are conceded to be more critical and more exacting than are those of European music capitals.

These notable and gratifying results are due, of course, to many factors, but the principal one is American generosity. Great orchestras are not self-supporting, and have to be subsidized by governments or private citizens of culture, wealth and public spirit. Without elaborate preparation, thorough rehearsing and painstaking direction, the performances of the best orchestra are mechanical and uninspired. Rehearsals cost money.

American concert and opera audiences demand the best obtainable music regardless of cost, and they are willing to foot the bills, directly or indirectly. The United States is supporting at least ten symphony orchestras and several opera companies. The summer season of opera at Ravinia park, near Chicago, for example, is the wonder of European visitors.

The time has come for the United States to mobilize its musical resources and organize annual music festivals on the model of Salzburg and Munich. It has the artists, the auditors and the means to make such festivals brilliantly successful.

FADING OF THE MAYFLOWER.

[illegible] Commissioner, according to Judge Frederick Cabot of trustees. Is all matter of raising funds.

Finance Commission forwards report District Attorney on investigation land-taking and urges Mayor to City Appraiser Warren F. [illegible] saying he pla[illegible]tion [illegible]

[illegible] properly rehea[illegible]
[illegible] no secret that in many of the pean music centres preparation ublic performance is of the most nctory sort, complicated by the lce of orchestra musicians of shing substitutes in their chairs they are filling another enent. The trustees of the n organization have consistupheld the desire of emiconductors for adequate reals. The results have placed rchestra in the first rank. Mr. ovitzky's plan is a compliment men who play under his din and to the judgment of the ement.

[illegible] of the states are complaining

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JUN 14 1929

Europe may have an opportunity next spring to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra if Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is able to carry out his plans to take the musicians abroad with him for a concert tour.

Next week he will visit Boston for a few days to receive an honorary degree from Harvard university. Although friends of the conductor and officers in charge of the Symphony hall management declined to comment on the possibility of the orchestra's leaving the country, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said that it is a matter of raising sufficient funds.

"If some individual or group comes forward with money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together, and I think it probable that they would vote to sanction the tour," he said. "I think it would be a very desirable thing to make the trip."

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent experiences in Paris are said to have added impetus to plans that he had held for several years to take the orchestra abroad.

He cancelled his performance of "Boris Godounoff" at the opera because players who had not rehearsed under his direction were substituted at the last moment for musicians of the orchestra who had other engagements. Rebelling against this custom, he is said to have determined and declared that a year hence he will show Paris what can be done wiht a properly rehearsed orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is quoted as saying that the tour he plans will include Great Britain, France and Germany, with each city of the European circuit to be thought of as a special problem.

"A piece by an American composer at every concert," he said, according to dispatches from Paris, "the modern school of American composition. That's he idea."

Final decision on the tour rests with he trustees, according to Judge Cabot, tho further explained:

"We conceive it to be our duties as trustees to provide for the maintenance of the orchestra at home. Since the orchestra operates at a deficit, which we must ask the public to make up, we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

Although Mr. Koussevitzky has not disclosed where the money is to come from, dispatches indicate that he is quite confident that he can carry out his plans. The sum required would be much more than $100,000, according to Judge Cabot.

Walter Damrosch succeeded in taking the New York Symphony orchestra across Europe and the Cleveland orchestra has visited Cuba, but in spite of the efforts of Leopold Stokowski to obtain authorization to take his Philadelphia orchestra abroad, the management could not see its way clear to provide the funds.

[illegible] consistently [illegible] the desire of eminent conductors for adequate rehearsals. The results have placed the orchestra in the first rank. Mr. Koussevitzky's plan is a compliment to the men who play under his direction and to the judgment of the management.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JUN 18 1929

Serge Koussevitsky Returns for Degree

ON BOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE, June 17 (By Radio).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the Ile de France bound for the United States, making the trip from Europe for the sole purpose of receiving an LL.D from Harvard University. When the liner docks tomorrow he will go directly to Boston. He will receive his degree at Harvard on Thursday and sail from New York for Europe again Friday on the Majestic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 15 [illegible]

Charity at Home.

From the Boston Herald.

It has been known for some time that Mr. Koussevitzky is eager to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in cities of Europe. It is natural that he should wish to do this: To acquaint foreign audiences with the remarkable plasticity and euphony of the orchestra that he has shaped to perfection; to show what as conductor, as interpreter, he can do with his superb band of musicians.

It has been rumored for some months that one or more public spirited Bostonians are prepared to defray the cost of the tour. The expense would necessarily be great. Although Mr. Koussevitzky's poetic and magnetic nature was fully recognized before he came to Boston; although the fame of our orchestra has spread throughout the musical world, it is doubtful whether receipts from European concerts would materially lessen the expense. Even if curiosity alone filled the concert halls to overflowing, there would still be a loss. There would possibly be an American rival in the field, for it has been stated that the Philharmonic Society of New York, led by Mr. Toscanini, will tour Europe at the end of next season.

Boston would rejoice in the triumph of its orchestra in foreign cities. Boston would applaud the generosity of the citizens who would largely aid in making this triumph possible. Yet some may say, and not in a carping spirit why should not these lovers of music, these friends and admirers of the conductor and his men, first put the orchestra on a firm foundation in Boston, their home; lead in procuring an endowment fund, so that there would not be a deficit with appeals for pecuniary assistance at the end of each season? Other American cities, proud of their orchestras, have given this substantial token of appreciation. Surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state with Mr. Koussevitzky, its inspired and inspiring leader, deserves the recognition that would ensure the utmost freedom in the giving of concerts and provide for a long continuance of its glorious reputation.

And some may say that charity begins at home—nor is the proverb musty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 16 [illegible]

A project to send the Boston Symphony orchestra on a European tour is being discussed. This would require a subscription at home, as the returns from all concerts which might be given abroad would hardly equal the expenses of the undertaking. Some weeks ago it was intimated that the New York Philharmonic orchestra, under Mr Toscanini, might make a tour of Europe next year, and it is natural that some Bostonians should desire to exhibit to Europe the fine achievement of their own orchestra. In view of the fact that deficits in the home season have to be met by public subscription, some may question the desirability of a further subscription for the purpose of exhibiting the orchestra abroad. It is now recognized that American symphony orchestras are unsurpassed in the world. While they are still European in leadership and to a great extent in personnel, they do at least testify to America's desire for musical excellence and willingness to back this desire with money.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUN 18 1929

KOUSSEVITSKY ON WAY TO GET HARVARD DEGREE

ON BOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE, June 18.—(By Radio)—U. S.—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the Ile De France bound for the United States, making the trip from Europe for the sole purpose of receiving an LL. D. from Harvard University.

When the liner docks today he will go directly to Boston. He will receive his degree at Harvard Thursday and sail from New York for Europe again Friday on the Majestic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JUN 20 1929

KOUSEVITZKY PLANS A TOUR OF EUROPE

Brings Provisional Itinerary for Boston Symphony—To Receive Degree From Harvard.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., June 19.—Serge Kousevitzky, who has come to Boston for a two days' stay to receive an honorary degree from Harvard, has brought with him a provisional itinerary for a European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Spring.

The second Continental visit of an American orchestral group will take the Boston musicians to Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland, provided some one donates funds and provided the trustees will permit the trip.

His proposed schedule provides for an opening in London and a final concert in Paris, with enough concerts in each city visited to make a little season. In Great Britain the planned itinerary calls for concerts in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh, as well as London. The last concert will be at the Sorbonne in Paris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
NEWS BEE

JUN 21 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 20.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is able to carry out his plan.

Koussevitsky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra.

[illegible] the system has radically changed so that each member of the orchestra, aside from some extra arrangement for Conductor Koussevitsky, received $15 per session. A session was usualy three hours of playing.

The Beethoven Pastoral Symphony was made in from one and a half to two sessions, it is said, and cost for the salaries of the members of the orchestra, alone, something more than $1575. Now the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, it is claimed, has altogether changed system of contracts. Instead of a uniform rate for all musicians, some of whom are recognized virtuosi and some merely hack players, the system is to pay each man 25 per cent of his weekly salary for every recording of two and a half and three hours.

The members of this orchestra, because of certain union rulings, it is said, received until this new arrangement, $20 a man for each two and a half or three-hour session. The information is also that while the Boston Symphony Orchestra made nine recordings last year, the Philadelphia Symphony made 33.

* * * *

Snappy Songs

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

JUN 29 1929

MAY TOUR EUROPE.

BOSTON.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is to carry out his plan Koussevitsky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JUN 22 1929

Boston Symphony May Go to Europe

Koussevitsky Confident of Surmounting Financial Difficulties.

Special to The Springfield Union.

BOSTON, June 21—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and special pet of Boston's musical set, in Boston after having made a flying trip from Paris to receive the degree of Doctor of Laws from Harvard University, is planning for a European trip of the Boston orchestra next summer.

There is only one hitch to the Koussevitsky program, a lack of funds, but the fiery Russian conductor seems perfectly confident that the money to make the trip will be forthcoming. Trustees of the orchestra are perfectly willing that the orchestra should go abroad to show Europe how a really great American band can play, but are not in a position to use the funds of the orchestra, whose annual deficit is made up by contributions, for the purpose.

If the plan on which Koussevitsky is now working materializes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in England, France, Holland, Germany and Austria. American music will be featured but not overfeatured.

Of course, the expense of transportation of more than 100 men, the lower admission prices charged in Europe and some of the large jumps that the orchestra will have to take, will make a deficit certain. Administrators of the finances of the orchestra believe that this deficit will be at least $100,000. No intimation is made as to what music lover will contribute the

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
JUN 27 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

(International News Service)
BOSTON, June 27.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE TIMES
JUN 27 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, June 27. (INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OIL CITY, PA.
OIL CITY BLIZZARD
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 28.—(INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.
JOURNAL
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROP

BOSTON, June 28. (INS)—Bosto symphony orchestra may make tour of Europe if Serge Koussevit zky is able to carry out his plan Koussevitzky is eager to show th people of Paris a properly re hearsed orchestra. Raising o funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL
JUN 30 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 29.—(I.N.S.)—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL
JUN 30

Rumor has it, that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to make a European tour next summer under the direction of Koussevitzky. Boston, by the way, will offer its citizenry free orchestral concerts for the first time this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, June 29.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD

MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 29.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Kaussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUN 30 1929

* * * *

Nothing is heard of the spring European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was talked of last winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
JUN 25 1929

ORCHESTRA CONCERT PRICES

New Orleans Times Picayune

We hesitate to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office. For one season such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than 50 years the organization was strictly philanthropic? That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON / 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

MUSICAL LEADER

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

123

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

If some individual of civic pride will provide $100,000 or more for traveling expenses, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make a European tour and show Paris and a few other continental cities what we have in America in the way of symphonic organizations. The Boston conductor is said to have cancelled a performance of Boris Godunoff because the rehearsals were not properly attended. Judge Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony trustees, said that in his opinion the sum required for the tour would be considerably in excess of $100,000. He also said: "We conceive it to be our duties as trustees to provide for the maintenance of the orchestra at home. Since the orchestra operates at a deficit, which we must ask the public to make up, we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

The deficit last year was $110,000 and Bostonians agree with Judge Cabot that the home season must be given first consideration.

Some time ago it was rumored that the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra was planning a European tour, but the management balked at the enormous expense involved and the idea was abandoned.

* * *

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

MUSICAL PROGRESS IN AMERICA

In an interview with a French newspaper representative the other day, Sergel Koussevitsky, the eminent director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, asserted that leadership in appreciation of good music, in all its forms and varieties, had passed from Europe to the United States.

Though this may seem to many an extraordinary claim, traveled lovers of music know it is true. The remarkable change has been effected in the last two decades. There are perhaps only two or three orchestras in Europe today that deserve to be placed in the same category with the several first-rate American orchestras. Even the best old-world orchestras cannot achieve the technical and interpretative perfection which is conceded to be characteristic of American performances at their best. And American audiences are conceded to be more critical and more exacting than are those of European music capitals.

These notable and gratifying results are due, of course, to many factors, but the principal one is American generosity. Great orchestras are not self-supporting, and have to be subsidized by governments or private citizens of culture, wealth and public spirit. Without elaborate preparation, thorough rehearsing and painstaking direction, the performances of the best orchestra are mechanical and uninspired. Rehearsals cost money.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ELWOOD CITY, PA.
LEDGER
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON. — (INS) — Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

Usually you can tell by the look on a man's face that his wife takes in boarders.

A village is a place where the banker seems embarrassed and apologetic when he says "no."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PLYMOUTH, INDIANA
DEMOCRAT
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, June 27. —Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JUN 22 1929

Boston Symphony May Go to Europe

Koussevitsky Confident of Surmounting Financial Difficulties.

Special to The Springfield Union.

BOSTON, June 21—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and special pet of Boston's musical set, in Boston after having made a flying trip from Paris to receive the degree of Doctor of Laws from Harvard University, is planning for a European trip of the Boston orchestra next summer.

There is only one hitch to the Koussevitsky program, a lack of funds, but the fiery Russian conductor seems perfectly confident that the money to make the trip will be forthcoming. Trustees of the orchestra are perfectly willing that the orchestra should go abroad to show Europe how a really great American band can play, but are not in a position to use the funds of the orchestra, whose annual deficit is made up by contributions for the purpose.

If the plan on which Koussevitsky is now working materializes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in England, France, Holland, Germany and Austria. American music will be featured but not overfeatured.

Of course, the expense of transportation of more than 100 men, the lower admission prices charged in Europe and some of the large jumps that the orchestra will have to take, will make a deficit certain. Administrators of the finances of the orchestra believe that this deficit will be at least $100,000. No intimation is made as to what music lover will contribute the

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
New Castle, Pa.
2
JUN 27 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

(International News Service)
BOSTON, June 27.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE TIMES
JUN 27 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, June 27. (INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OIL CITY, PA.
OIL CITY BLIZZARD
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 28.—(INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.
JOURNAL
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROP

BOSTON, June 28. (INS)—Bosto symphony orchestra may make tour of Europe if Serge Koussevi zky is able to carry out his plar Koussevitzky is eager to show th people of Paris a properly re hearsed orchestra. Raising o funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL
JUN 30 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 29.—(I.N.S.)—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL
JUN 30 1929

Rumor has it, that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to make a European tour next summer under the direction of Koussevitzky. Boston, by the way, will offer its citizenry free orchestral concerts for the first time this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
JUN 30

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, June 29.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD
JUN 30 1929

MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, June 29.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Kaussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUN 30 1929

* * * *

Nothing is heard of the spring European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was talked of last winter. The idea has been dropped, apparently.

* * * *

...nation is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office. For one season such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than 50 years the organization was strictly philanthropic? That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO. 501 McCORMICK BUILDING 332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

123

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

If some individual of civic pride will provide $100,000 or more for traveling expenses, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make a European tour and show Paris and a few other continental cities what we have in America in the way of symphonic organizations. The Boston conductor is said to have cancelled a performance of Boris Godunoff because the rehearsals were not properly attended. Judge Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony trustees, said that in his opinion the sum required for the tour would be considerably in excess of $100,000. He also said: "We conceive it to be our duties as trustees to provide for the maintenance of the orchestra at home. Since the orchestra operates at a deficit, which we must ask the public to make up, we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

The deficit last year was $110,000 and Bostonians agree with Judge Cabot that the home season must be given first consideration.

Some time ago it was rumored that the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra was planning a European tour, but the management balked at the enormous expense involved and the idea was abandoned.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
N 26 1929

MUSICAL PROGRESS IN AMERICA

In an interview with a French newspaper representative the other day, Sergel Koussevitsky, the eminent director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, asserted that leadership in appreciation of good music, in all its forms and varieties, had passed from Europe to the United States.

Though this may seem to many an extraordinary claim, traveled lovers of music know it is true. The remarkable change has been effected in the last two decades. There are perhaps only two or three orchestras in Europe today that deserve to be placed in the same category with the several first-rate American orchestras. Even the best old-world orchestras cannot achieve the technical and interpretative perfection which is conceded to be characteristic of American performances at their best. And American audiences are conceded to be more critical and more exacting than are those of European music capitals.

These notable and gratifying results are due, of course, to many factors, but the principal one is American generosity. Great orchestras are not self-supporting, and have to be subsidized by governments or private citizens of culture, wealth and public spirit. Without elaborate preparation, thorough rehearsing and painstaking direction, the performances of the best orchestra are mechanical and uninspired. Rehearsals cost money.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ELWOOD CITY, PA.
LEDGER
JUN 28 1929

Usually you can tell by the look on a man's face that his wife takes in boarders.

A village is a place where the banker seems embarrassed and apologetic when he says "no."

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON. — (INS) — Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PLYMOUTH, INDIANA
DEMOCRAT
JUN 28 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, June 27. —Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WAUKEGAN, ILL.
SUN
JUL 2 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR ENROPE

Boston—(INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitsky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JUL 3 - 1929

Two American Symphony Orchestras to Visit Europe

A tour of Europe will be made next spring by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, immediately after the close of the season of 1929-1930 here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has practically decided to tour Europe in the coming spring under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JUL 5 - 1929

Boston

More than 5,000 hear first of series of concerts on Esplanade by members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, and made possible by philanthropy of citizens' group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
BILLBOARD
JUL 6 1929

Boston

Charlie Van, property man at the Shubert Theater for the last 20 years, was given a testimonial banquet at the Elks Hotel by stage and vaudeville artists assembled from near and far, including Joe Cook, Paul McCullough of Clark and McCullough; Fred Dempsey, national vice-president of the Theatrical Stage Employees, and others. Samuel Dody, who helped arrange the affair, presented a white gold wrist watch and purse of gold to Van on behalf of the guests. The committee in charge of this testimonial included George Johnson, director of public celebrations in Boston; George E. Curran, former member of the governor's council; Attorney Samuel Dody, Edward Wollenberg, William Goldston, Victor Morris, Joseph Brennan, Charles Winston and Samuel Shepherd.

Serge Kousevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Europe following the Harvard University commencement at which he received the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE STAR
MARION, O.
1
JUL 6 1929

mercial aviation field.

Boston Orchestra May Make Tour of Europe

BOSTON—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan, Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE
SUN
JUL 7 - 1929

Koussevitzky Would Take Men Abroad

European Tour For Boston Symphony Under Advisement And Itinerary Is Planned

Series Of Concerts In England And On The Continent Urged As Desirable Now

By LESLIE HARRIS
Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning from his sojourn in Europe for a three-day visit to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University, brought with him some plans which have aroused considerable interest in musical circles here—plans for taking the Boston Symphony on a tour of Europe next spring.

Rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans had preceded him across the Atlantic, and eager music critics who went down to meet him on the Ile de France were greeted with the assurance that an itinerary had been completed for a two-month tour, including Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria and Switzerland. It remains only to secure the consent of the board of trustees of the orchestra and moderate financial backing—matters which seemed to give Mr. Koussevitzky little concern.

TIME CALLED RIPE

As he presented the matter, the time has arrived for such a tour, and it should prove a source of pleasure and inspiration to European listeners and of satisfaction to American musicians and to those who have fostered the development of our orchestras. It cannot be denied that American orchestral performance has shown an extraordinary development of late, and that the "American orchestral idea," as it is termed, should have international recognition. In addition, there is the advantage to American composers, as Mr. Koussevitzky has always given due attention to the modern American school of composition and has promised to include a number by an American composer on every program he gives abroad.

But, in view of another piece of news which reached this country about Mr. Koussevitzky's doings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

METHODS LAX THERE

European orchestras, it is said, have long suffered from inadequate rehearsals and the custom of "substitution" of players. This latter custom permits players who have more remunerative engagements to send substitutes to rehearsals, and even to concerts themselves. Thus a conductor is frequently faced at a final performance by players who have not rehearsed under his baton at all. On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky's domination as conductor of the Boston Symphony is unrestricted, and his men are under very strict regulations, not being allowed to accept engagements which would interfere in any way with their obligations to the orchestra.

Such were the nature and the causes of his rebellion against the customs at the Opera, and the artistic result of the American symphonic order is what he must prove to Paris. But he is confident enough, having said recently to an American critic who met him in Paris: "A picked body of players, works that enchain attention, persuasive handling of the baton, assure positive success in Paris."

ITINERARY LAID OUT

But to return to the itinerary. It starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to compose a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

With regard to the other details which must be arranged, it does not seem that any insurmountable difficulties need be expected. The writer chanced to be in Boston when the first rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans reached this shore, and the eagerness of the daily press to find out exactly how the matter stood drew forth from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president and spokesman of the board of trustees, the encouraging statement that he was well disposed to such an idea.

(Continued on page 2.)

(Continued from page 1.)

"If," he said, "some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

QUESTION OF FUNDS

And so the question becomes one of funds. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, but those who have considered the subject seriously declare that it would be well worth the cost. Mr. Koussevitzky himself has not spoken on this subject; undoubtedly he is sufficiently certain of the means to have gone so far with his plans.

A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the Boston Symphony for at least twenty-five years, and a similar ambition existed as long in the New York Philharmonic, recently merged with the New York Symphony. Unwilling to be outdone by the Boston organization, it is rumored here that similar plans are under consideration by the present New York orchestra.

With Arturo Toscanini as a guiding influence, the latter organization is possibly nearer its goal than ever before.

DAMROSCH'S TOUR

If the Boston orchestra does go abroad, it will not be the first American symphony to do such a thing. Soon after the close of the war Walter Damrosch took the New York Symphony on a similar tour, but not with the degree of success which should be attained by the Boston orchestra with its present standards of performance and the recognition already accorded its conductor abroad.

Once such a precedent has been established with marked success it may become a regular thing for all of the larger American orchestras to make springtime voyages across the Atlantic. The Cleveland Orchestra has already visited Cuba, and several others have made trips into Canada. Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala, in Milan, to this country for a tour of the larger cities several years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
JUL 7 - 1929

Orchestras Abroad

FIVE concerts will be offered in Berlin next summer by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society with Arturo Toscanini conducting. Official confirmation of the foreign invasion by the local orchestra came last week, several days after Herbert M. Johnson, director of the Chicago Civic Opera Association sent word to this effect.

Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the orchestra's directors, confirmed Mr. Johnson's announcement by stating that the Philharmonic is expected to tour in May and June, returning in time for the annual Stadium series.

Walter Damrosch took the Symphony Society abroad in 1920 and gave concerts in France, Belgium, Italy, Holland and England, marking the first foreign tour by an American symphonic organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is also expected to travel next summer with Serge Koussevitsky directing the concerts, but of the trips of both orchestras are still being worked out.

According to Mr. Johnson's dispatches from Berlin, Giorgio Polacco, musical director of the Chicago organization, is scoring a distinct hit abroad as an orchestral conductor, despite the glamor of Toscanini.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Photoplay Magazine
JUL - 1929

WRITE your own headline. Jascha Heifetz recently played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a distinguished audience. Many people remained after the performance to congratulate him.

But when they recognized Florence Vidor, his wife, Jascha was almost forgotten. Oh, well, even famous violinists ought to get used to playing second fiddle to lovely wives.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JUL 7 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra Considering European Trip

BOSTON, July 6—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOUNT VERNON, ILL.
HERALD
JUL 7 - 1929

TO TOUR EUROPE

By International News Service

BOSTON, Mass., July 7.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD POST

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, (INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S WEEKLY
JUL 13 1929

New York and Boston Orchestras Plan Tour

Reports that the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would make a European tour after the close of the season of 1929-'30 were confirmed this week by an announcement from Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New Yok, stating that arrangements had been virtually completed for such a tour in April, May and June, 1930.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, uder Serge Koussevitzky, also is expected to play in Europe next

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JUL 14 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO TOUR EUROPE?

From various sources it is heard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may tour Europe next spring and that Serge Koussevitsky has all the arrangements made except the money. The Boston Globe says:

Mr. Koussevitsky is very anxious to take the Boston Symphony on tour in Europe next May or June. The trustees of the orchestra do not feel justified in spending the large sum needed to defray the inevitable deficit on such a tour, but have intimated that they would raise no objection if others should desire to pay the expenses.

Leslie Harris, New York correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, says that the Symphony's director believes the time and that the "Amer- ," as it is termed, ational recognition. an advantage to 's, whose works the nised to include on nother piece of news country about Mr. ings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance, the Sun's correspondent continues. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

The Itinerary, says the Sun's writer, starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to comprise a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh, Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President and spokesman of the board of trustees, was quoted as saying: "If some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

And so the question becomes one of funds, the account continues. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

American Orchestras Will Tour in Europe

Two American orchestras are to tour in Europe next spring, it is declared in the East. The New York Philharmonic - Symphony is definitely announced to be arranging a tour in April, May and June, with all concerts led by Arturo Toscanini. The Boston Symphony, it is said less definitely, is to go abroad at about the same time, headed by Serge Koussevitzky.

Walter Damrosch led his New York Symphony Orchestra in a European tour in 1920. John Powell, pianist, and Albert Spalding, violinist, both Americans, were featured as soloists in France, Italy, Belgium, Holland and England. Harry Harkness Flagler footed the bill. European orchestras have toured in this country on several occasions, the London Symphony, under Arthur Nikisch in 1912; the Paris Conservatoire in 1918, under Andre Messager, and the Milan La Scala, under Toscanini in 1920.

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WAUKEGAN, ILL.
SUN

JUL 2 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR ENROPE

Boston—(INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitsky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of runds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JUL 3 -

Two American Symphony Orchestras to Visit Europe

A tour of Europe will be made next spring by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, immediately after the close of the season of 1929-1930 here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has practically decided to tour Europe in the coming spring under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JUL 5 - 1929

Boston

More than 5,000 hear first of series of concerts on Esplanade by members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, and made possible by philanthropy of citizens' group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
BILLBOARD

JUL 6

Boston

Charlie Van, property man at the Shubert Theater for the last 20 years, was given a testimonial banquet at the Elks Hotel by stage and vaudeville artists assembled from near and far, including Joe Cook, Paul McCullough of Clark and McCullough; Fred Dempsey, national vice-president of the Theatrical Stage Employees, and others. Samuel Dody, who helped arrange the affair, presented a white gold wrist watch and purse of gold to Van on behalf of the guests. The committee in charge of this testimonial included George Johnson, director of public celebrations in Boston; George E. Curran, former member of the governor's council; Attorney Samuel Dody, Edward Wollenberg, William Goldston, Victor Morris, Joseph Brennan, Charles Winston and Samuel Shepherd.

Serge Kousevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Europe following the Harvard University commencement at which he received the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE STAR
MARION, O.

1 JUL 6 1929

mercial aviation field.

Boston Orchestra May Make Tour of Europe

BOSTON—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE
SUN

JUL 7 - 1929

Koussevitzky Would Take Men Abroad

European Tour For Boston Symphony Under Advisement And Itinerary Is Planned

Series Of Concerts In England And On The Continent Urged As Desirable Now

By LESLIE HARRIS
Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning from his sojourn in Europe for a three-day visit to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University, brought with him some plans which have aroused considerable interest in musical circles here—plans for taking the Boston Symphony on a tour of Europe next spring.

Rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans had preceded him across the Atlantic, and eager music critics who went down to meet him on the Ile de France were greeted with the assurance that an itinerary had been completed for a two-month tour, including Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria and Switzerland. It remains only to secure the consent of the board of trustees of the orchestra and moderate financial backing—matters which seemed to give Mr. Koussevitzky little concern.

TIME CALLED RIPE

As he presented the matter, the time has arrived for such a tour, and it should prove a source of pleasure and inspiration to European listeners and of satisfaction to American musicians and to those who have fostered the development of our orchestras. It cannot be denied that American orchestral performance has shown an extraordinary development of late, and that the "American orchestral idea," as it is termed, should have international recognition. In addition, there is the advantage to American composers, as Mr. Koussevitzky has always given due attention to the modern American school of composition and has promised to include a number by an American composer on every program he gives abroad.

But, in view of another piece of news which reached this country about Mr. Koussevitzky's doings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

METHODS LAX THERE

European orchestras, it is said, have long suffered from inadequate rehearsals and the custom of "substitution" of players. This latter custom permits players who have more remunerative engagements to send substitutes to rehearsals, and even to concerts themselves. Thus a conductor is frequently faced at a final performance by players who have not rehearsed under his baton at all. On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky's domination as conductor of the Boston Symphony is unrestricted, and his men are under very strict regulations, not being allowed to accept engagements which would interfere in any way with their obligations to the orchestra.

Such were the nature and the causes of his rebellion against the customs at the Opera, and the artistic result of the American symphonic order is what he must prove to Paris. But he is confident enough, having said recently to an American critic who met him in Paris: "A picked body of players, works that enchain attention, persuasive handling of the baton, assure positive success in Paris."

ITINERARY LAID OUT

But to return to the itinerary. It starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to compose a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

With regard to the other details which must be arranged, it does not seem that any insurmountable difficulties need be expected. The writer chanced to be in Boston when the first rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans reached this shore, and the eagerness of the daily press to find out exactly how the matter stood drew forth from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president and spokesman of the board of trustees, the encouraging statement that he was well disposed to such an idea.

(Continued on page 2.)
(Continued from page 1.)

"If," he said, "some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

QUESTION OF FUNDS

And so the question becomes one of funds. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, but those who have considered the subject seriously declare that it would be well worth the cost. Mr. Koussevitzky himself has not spoken on this subject; undoubtedly he is sufficiently certain of the means to have gone so far with his plans.

A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the Boston Symphony for at least twenty-five years, and a similar ambition existed as long in the New York Philharmonic, recently merged with the New York Symphony. Unwilling to be outdone by the Boston organization, it is rumored here that similar plans are under consideration by the present New York orchestra.

With Arturo Toscanini as a guiding influence, the latter organization is possibly nearer its goal than ever before.

DAMROSCH'S TOUR

If the Boston orchestra does go abroad, it will not be the first American symphony to do such a thing. Soon after the close of the war Walter Damrosch took the New York Symphony on a similar tour, but not with the degree of success which should be attained by the Boston orchestra with its present standards of performance and the recognition already accorded its conductor abroad.

Once such a precedent has been established with marked success it may become a regular thing for all of the larger American orchestras to make springtime voyages across the Atlantic. The Cleveland Orchestra has already visited Cuba, and several others have made trips into Canada. Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala, in Milan, to this country for a tour of the larger cities several years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

JUL 7 - 1929

Orchestras Abroad

FIVE concerts will be offered in Berlin next summer by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society with Arturo Toscanini conducting. Official confirmation of the foreign invasion by the local orchestra came last week, several days after Herbert M. Johnson, director of the Chicago Civic Opera Association sent word to this effect.

Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the orchestra's directors, confirmed Mr. Johnson's announcement by stating that the Philharmonic is expected to tour in May and June, returning in time for the annual Stadium series.

Walter Damrosch took the Symphony Society abroad in 1920 and gave concerts in France, Belgium, Italy, Holland and England, marking the first foreign tour by an American symphonic organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is also expected to travel next summer with Serge Koussevitsky directing the concerts. Details of the trips of both orchestras are still being worked out.

According to Mr. Johnson's dispatches from Berlin, Giorgio Polacco, musical director of the Chicago organization, is scoring a distinct hit abroad as an orchestral conductor, despite the glamor of Toscanini.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Photoplay Magazine

McIntyre asked, "What's Monte swore under his bre
"All right, thanks," came
And next morning they tol
a microphone, repeating a lin
studio the day before.

[illegible]ARY COOPER and Er

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JUL 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra Considering European Trip

BOSTON, July 6—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOUNT VERNON, ILL.
HERALD

TO TOUR EUROPE
By International News Service

BOSTON, Mass., July 7.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD POST

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston, (INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S WEEKLY
JUL 13 1929

New York and Boston Orchestras Plan Tour

Reports that the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would mtke a Euopean tour after the close of the season of 1929-'30 were confirmed this week by an announcement from Clarence H. Hackay, chairman of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New Yok, stating that arrangements had been virtually completed for such a tour in April, May and June, 1930.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, uder Serge Koussevitzky, also is expected to play in Europe next

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO TOUR EUROPE?

From various sources it is heard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may tour Europe next spring and that Serge Koussevitsky has all the arrangements made except the money. The Boston Globe says:

Mr. Koussevitsky is very anxious to take the Boston Symphony on tour in Europe next May or June. The trustees of the orchestra do not feel justified in spending the large sum needed to defray the inevitable deficit on such a tour, but have intimated that they would raise no objection if others should desire to pay the expenses.

Leslie Harris, New York correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, says that the Symphony's director believes the time ripe for such a tour and that the "American orchestral idea," as it is termed, should have international recognition. There will also be an advantage to American composers, whose works the conductor has promised to include on his programs.

But, in view of another piece of news which reached this country about Mr. Koussevitsky's doings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance, the Sun's correspondent continues. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

The Itinerary, says the Sun's writer, starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to comprise a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh, Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President and spokesman of the board of trustees, was quoted as saying: "If some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

And so the question becomes one of funds, the account continues. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, but those who have considered the subject seriously declare that it would be well worth the cost. Mr. Koussevitzky himself has not spoken on this subject; undoubtedly he is sufficiently certain of the means to have gone so far with his plans.

[illegible] Philharmonic - Symphony is definitely announced to be arranging a tour in April, May and June, with all concerts led by Arturo Toscanini. The Boston Symphony, it is said less definitely is to go abroad at about the same time, headed by Serge Koussevitzky.

Walter Damrosch led his New York Symphony Orchestra in a European tour in 1920. John Powell, pianist, and Albert Spalding, violinist, both Americans, were featured as soloists in France, Italy, Belgium, Holland and England. Harry Harkness Flagler footed the bill. European orchestras have toured in this country on several occasions, the London Symphony, under Arthur Nikisch in 1912; the Paris Conservatoire in 1918, under Andre Messager, and the Milan La Scala, under Toscanini in 1920.

[illegible] least) sweet

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WAUKEGAN, ILL.
SUN

1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR ENROPE

Boston—(INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitsky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitsky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of runds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JUL 3 -

Two American Symphony Orchestras to Visit Europe

A tour of Europe will be made next spring by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, immediately after the close of the season of 1929-1930 here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has practically decided to tour Europe in the coming spring under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JUL 5 - 1929

Boston

More than 5,000 hear first of series of concerts on Esplanade by members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, and made possible by philanthropy of citizens' group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
BILLBOARD

JUL

Boston

Charlie Van, property man at the Shubert Theater for the last 20 years, was given a testimonial banquet at the Elks Hotel by stage and vaudeville artists assembled from near and far, including Joe Cook, Paul McCullough of Clark and McCullough; Fred Dempsey, national vice-president of the Theatrical Stage Employees, and others. Samuel Dody, who helped arrange the affair, presented a white gold wrist watch and purse of gold to Van on behalf of the guests. The committee in charge of this testimonial included George Johnson, director of public celebrations in Boston; George E. Curran, former member of the governor's council; Attorney Samuel Dody, Edward Wollenberg, William Goldston, Victor Morris, Joseph Brennan, Charles Winston and Samuel Shepherd.

Serge Kousevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Europe following the Harvard University commencement at which he received the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE STAR
MARION, O.

1 JUL 6 1929

mercial aviation field.

Boston Orchestra May Make Tour of Europe

BOSTON—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE
SUN

JUL 7 - 1929

Koussevitzky Would Take Men Abroad

European Tour For Boston Symphony Under Advisement And Itinerary Is Planned

Series Of Concerts In England And On The Continent Urged As Desirable Now

By LESLIE HARRIS
Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning from his sojourn in Europe for a three-day visit to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University, brought with him some plans which have aroused considerable interest in musical circles here—plans for taking the Boston Symphony on a tour of Europe next spring.

Rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans had preceded him across the Atlantic, and eager music critics who went down to meet him on the Ile de France were greeted with the assurance that an itinerary had been completed for a two-month tour, including Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria and Switzerland. It remains only to secure the consent of the board of trustees of the orchestra and moderate financial backing—matters which seemed to give Mr. Koussevitzky little concern.

TIME CALLED RIPE

As he presented the matter, the time has arrived for such a tour, and it should prove a source of pleasure and inspiration to European listeners and of satisfaction to American musicians and to those who have fostered the development of our orchestras. It cannot be denied that American orchestral performance has shown an extraordinary development of late, and that the "American orchestral idea," as it is termed, should have international recognition. In addition, there is the advantage to American composers, as Mr. Koussevitzky has always given due attention to the modern American school of composition and has promised to include a number by an American composer on every program he gives abroad.

But, in view of another piece of news which reached this country about Mr. Koussevitzky's doings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

METHODS LAX THERE

European orchestras, it is said, have long suffered from inadequate rehearsals and the custom of "substitution" of players. This latter custom permits players who have more remunerative engagements to send substitutes to rehearsals, and even to concerts themselves. Thus a conductor is frequently faced at a final performance by players who have not rehearsed under his baton at all. On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky's domination as conductor of the Boston Symphony is unrestricted, and his men are under very strict regulations, not being allowed to accept engagements which would interfere in any way with their obligations to the orchestra.

Such were the nature and the causes of his rebellion against the customs at the Opera, and the artistic result of the American symphonic order is what he must prove to Paris. But he is confident enough, having said recently to an American critic who met him in Paris: "A picked body of players, works that enchain attention, persuasive handling of the baton, assure positive success in Paris."

ITINERARY LAID OUT

But to return to the itinerary. It starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to compose a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

With regard to the other details which must be arranged, it does not seem that any insurmountable difficulties need be expected. The writer chanced to be in Boston when the first rumors of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans reached this shore, and the eagerness of the daily press to find out exactly how the matter stood drew forth from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president and spokesman of the board of trustees, the encouraging statement that he was well disposed to such an idea.

(Continued from page 1.)

"If," he said, "some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

QUESTION OF FUNDS

And so the question becomes one of funds. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, but those who have considered the subject seriously declare that it would be well worth the cost. Mr. Koussevitzky himself has not spoken on this subject; undoubtedly he is sufficiently certain of the means to have gone so far with his plans.

A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the Boston Symphony for at least twenty-five years, and a similar ambition existed as long in the New York Philharmonic, recently merged with the New York

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

JUL 7 - 1929

Orchestras Abroad

FIVE concerts will be offered in Berlin next summer by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society with Arturo Toscanini conducting. Official confirmation of the foreign invasion by the local orchestra came last week, several days after Herbert M. Johnson, director of the Chicago Civic Opera Association sent word to this effect.

Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the orchestra's directors, confirmed Mr. Johnson's announcement by stating that the Philharmonic is expected to tour in May and June, returning in time for the annual Stadium series.

Walter Damrosch took the Symphony Society abroad in 1920 and gave concerts in France, Belgium, Italy, Holland and England, marking the first foreign tour by an American symphonic organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is also expected to travel next summer with Serge Koussevitsky directing the con[illegible] of the trips of both orchestras are still being worked out.

According to Mr. Johnson's dispatches from Berlin, Giorgio Polacco, musical director of the Chicago organization, is scoring a distinct hit abroad as an orchestral conductor, despite the glamor of Toscanini.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Photoplay Magazine

McIntyre asked, "What's Monte swore under his br
"All right, thanks," came
And next morning they tol
a microphone, repeating a lin
studio the day before.

[illegible]ARY COOPER and Er

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JUL 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra Considering European Trip

BOSTON, July 6—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOUNT VERNON, ILL.
HERALD

TO TOUR EUROPE

By International News Service

BOSTON, Mass., July 7.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD POST

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

Boston. (INS)—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

Symphony. Unwilling to be outdone by the Boston organization, it is rumored here that similar plans are under consideration by the present New York orchestra.

With Arturo Toscanini as a guiding influence, the latter organization is possibly nearer its goal than ever before.

DAMROSCH'S TOUR

If the Boston orchestra does go abroad, it will not be the first American symphony to do such a thing. Soon after the close of the war Walter Damrosch took the New York Symphony on a similar tour, but not with the degree of success which should be attained by the Boston orchestra with its present standards of performance and the recognition already accorded its conductor abroad.

Once such a precedent has been established with marked success it may become a regular thing for all of the larger American orchestras to make springtime voyages across the Atlantic. The Cleveland Orchestra has already visited Cuba, and several others have made trips into Canada. Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala, in Milan, to this country for a tour of the larger cities several years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S WEEKLY

JUL 13 1929

New York and Boston Orchestras Plan Tour

Reports that the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would mtke a Euopean tour after the close of the season of 1929-'30 were confirmed this week by an announcement from Clarence H. Hackay, chairman of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New Yok, stating that arrangements had been virtually completed for such a tour in April, May and June, 1930.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, uder Serge Koussevitzky, also is expected to play in Europe next

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO TOUR EUROPE?

From various sources it is heard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may tour Europe next spring and that Serge Koussevitsky has all the arrangements made except the money. The Boston Globe says:

Mr. Koussevitsky is very anxious to take the Boston Symphony on tour in Europe next May or June. The trustees of the orchestra do not feel justified in spending the large sum needed to defray the inevitable deficit on such a tour, but have intimated that they would raise no objection if others should desire to pay the expenses.

Leslie Harris, New York correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, says that the Symphony's director believes the time ripe for such a tour and that the "American orchestral idea," as it is termed, should have international recognition. There will also be an advantage to American composers, whose works the conductor has promised to include on his programs.

But, in view of another piece of news which reached this country about Mr. Kousse itsky's doings abroad, the project assumes still greater significance, the Sun's correspondent continues. Refusing recently to go on with preparations for a performance at the Opera in Paris because the players would not practice enough and because they were allowed to send substitutes to rehearsals, he laid emphasis on the conflict between the high orchestral standards here and the laxity in such things in Europe. He has, as a consequence, accepted a challenge, and, according to his own words, has a "particular proof to make" in Paris.

The Itinerary, says the Sun's writer, starts at London and ends at Paris, with enough concerts in each place to comprise a little season. Besides London, British cities to be visited are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Crossing to the Continent, the orchestra will make a circular tour, beginning and ending with Paris. In between there will be stops at Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva. After the last public concert in Paris there will be a special program given at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the tour as it is now planned.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President and spokesman of the board of trustees, was quoted as saying: "If some individual or group comes forward with sufficient money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together and I think it very probable that they would vote to sanction the trip."

And so the question becomes one of funds, the account continues. The amount necessary has been estimated at anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, but those who have considered the subject seriously declare that it would be well worth the cost. Mr. Koussevitzky himself has not spoken on this subject; undoubtedly he is sufficiently certain of the means to have gone so far with his plans.

[illegible] Philharmonic - Symphony is definitely announced to be arranging a tour in April, May and June, with all concerts led by Arturo Toscanini. The Boston Symphony, it is said less defi[illegible] to go abroad at about the same time, headed by Serge Koussevitzky.

Walter Damrosch led his New York Symphony Orchestra in a European tour in 1920. John Powell, pianist, and Albert Spalding, violinist, both Americans, were featured as soloists in France, Italy, Belgium, Holland and England. Harry Harkness Flagler footed the bill. European orchestras have toured in this country on several occasions, the London Symphony, under Arthur Nikisch in 1912; the Paris Conservatoire in 1918, under Andre Messager, and the Milan La Scala, under Toscanini in 1920.

least) sweet

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR

JUL 14 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans European Tour

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in Washington once during the coming season as an attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, has announced that a European tour is planned for next Spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, recently returned from Europe for a three-day sojourn in America to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University. Newspaper writers who greeted Mr. Koussevitzky as he landed were assured that an itinerary has been completed for a two-month tour to include Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland.

The only details lacking, Mr. Koussevitzky told the reporters, were the consent of the orchestra's board of trustees and the necessary financial backing. The conductor betrayed no concern over surmounting these difficulties.

Mr. Koussevitzky desires to take the Boston Symphony on a European tour to obtain international recognition for the merits of the so-called "American orchestral idea," the "idea" consisting, it appears, of the American method of orchestral rehearsing which does not permit the easy-going European practice of permitting players tc send substitutes to rehearsal.

As Mr. Koussevitzky presented the matter, a European tour of the Boston Symphony should provide pleasure to European listeners and satisfaction to American musicians and those who have fostered the development of American orchestras. It is thought that Mr. Koussevitzky would enjoy demonstrating the efficiency of Boston rehearsal methods, especially in Paris, for it is at the Paris Opera where, according to reports, Mr. Koussevitzky declined to go on with preparations for a performance on the ground that the players who were rehearsing might not, under the Paris rules, be the same players at all who faced him when the time came for the regular performance.

The amount necessary to take the Boston Symphony abroad has been estimated as being anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of and spokesman for the board of trustees, has shown himself favorably disposed toward the enterprise. A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the ranks of the Boston Symphony for 25 years.

The New York Phil...

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

JUL 21 1929

Concerts Canceled.

Why did Serge Koussevitzky decide not to conduct at the Opera in Paris? We have heard many stories, but cannot seem to get the true one. Is the Boston Orchestra going abroad in the fall? B. C.

Worcester, Mass.

The story that the Paris Herald printed declared that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted three rehearsals for Moussorgsky's "Boris," and the men would only give him two.

Privately, he thought they needed four. So he canceled the engagements altogether, feeling that poor p eparation would make for bad performances.

It is not certain as to whether the Boston band will make the trip across the ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MORN. WORLD

JUL 21 1929

Serge Koussivitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the recent guest of honor of the Association Francaise d'Expansion at Exchanges Artistiques at the Restaurant Laurent, Champs-Elysees. Among those present were M. Francois Poncet, Under Secretary of Fine Arts, and Emile Hamblot, President of the society, who delivered a speech and extended a cordial welcome to all American ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR TELEGRAM

JUL 21 1929

Is it true that some of the American orchestras are going to Europe next year? I have heard rumors about the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Orchestra. Are they the only ones? What happened to the Philadelphia Orchestra's plans to tour abroad? R. Y.

It is practically settled that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini and th Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky are to tour in the early summer in Europe. Dates are not yet announced. The Philadelphians' plans went a-glimmering, much to the disgust, it is said, of Leopold Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JUL 15 1929

Boston Orchestra Plans Tour Abroad

BOSTON, July 14.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 21 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 18 (INS).—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post-Intelligencer

JUL 28 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 27.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMMOND, IND.
LAKE CO. TIMES

AUG ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

AUG ...

and rate of descent.

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, Mass., August 5.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 10 1929

* * *

From Boston comes the word that there are now seventy-one beneficiaries of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, receiving a little more than $17,000 annually. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid $750, but this, even with the aid of the annual pension fund concert, would be entirely inadequate without the aid of numerous gifts made by public spirited citizens of Boston. The maximum pension paid is only $500, a sum which it is hoped to increase in the near future. Only musicians who have served with the orchestra for ten years or more are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

AUG 26 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, Aug. 26.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Kou... vitzky is eager to ... of ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

JUL 9 ...

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 9—(I. N. S.).—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
MILWAUKEE, WIS.

AUG 24 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON — Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

◆ ◆ ◆

Felix Salmond, the English cellist, has ... with the Boston ... a pair of con... in Boston.

...mphony ...t to Open Its 49th Season

Plans Already Under Consideration for Festival on Fiftieth Anniversary

BOSTON, Sept. 21.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, if forty years younger than the Philharmonic, of New York, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type, is approaching the end of its first half century. The beginning of the fiftieth season is still a year off, but plans for special events tc commemorate the semi-centennial are already under consideration. One feature is to be a Bach festival in the spring of 1931, including the B minor Mass. Professor Archibald T. Davidson, it is said, has already been engaged in conducting preliminary rehearsals of Harvard and Radcliffe students for the choral parts of this work.

According to "The Boston Evening Transcript," Serge Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of this orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come here from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert. Official announcement of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans for the semi-centennial season, and of the new or unfamiliar music he intends to produce during the forty-ninth season, beginning next month, awaits the Russian conductor's return next week.

During the season of 1929-'30, the Boston Symphony will pay its usual five visits to New York, giving five evening concerts and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts in the Brooklyn Philharmonic series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. There will be one exception to the usual schedule of Thursday nights and Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall and Friday nights at the Academy, the evening dates of the orchestra's third trip being transposed, since the Academy was not available that particular Friday.

The dates of the concerts are: Carnegie Hall, evenings: Thursday, November 21, January 9; Friday, February 7, Thursday, March 8, April 10; Saturday afternoons, November 23, January 11, February 8, March 8, April 12.

Brooklyn Academy: Friday, November 22, January 10; Thursday, February 6; Friday, March 7, April 11.

In Boston, the orchestra will give the usual twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, as well as six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon performances. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of children's concerts.

Towards the end of October, the orchestra will tour the central states, paying its second visit to Chicago and what is believed to be its first to Minneapolis, and will also play in Indianapolis, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

In February Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians will visit Richmond, Baltimore and Washington. Four concerts will be given in Providence and occasional appearances will be made in New England college cities, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the concerts on tour and all those in Boston, except for a two weeks' vacation, when he will be relieved by guests. The Boston Symphony, however, has never gone in for intensive guest conducting in the way pursued, by choice or necessity, by some other American orchestras. It is said that a Brahms festival is under consideration next spring as a culminating feature of the Boston season.

Mr. W. H. Brennan, who has been manager of the Boston Symphony for twenty years, said yesterday that the orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts have been sold out by subscription, and all its Boston concerts except for a few places in the recently established Tuesday afternoon series, which caters particularly to residents in Boston's suburbs.

From 1881 to 1918 the orchestra was supported by its founder, the late Major Henry L. Higginson. It has since been supported by contributions from a large number of patrons.

F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 22 1929

Boston Symphony Is About to Open Its 49th Season

Plans Already Under Consideration for Festival on Fiftieth Anniversary

BOSTON, Sept. 21.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, if forty years younger than the Philharmonic, of New York, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type, is approaching the end of its first half century. The beginning of the fiftieth season is still a year off, but plans for special events tc commemorate the semi-centennial are already under consideration. One feature is to be a Bach festival in the spring of 1931, including the B minor Mass. Professor Archibald T. Davidson, it is said, has already been engaged in conducting preliminary rehearsals of Harvard and Radcliffe students for the choral parts of this work.

According to "The Boston Evening Transcript," Serge Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of this orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come here from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert. Official announcement of Mr. Koussevitzky's plans for the semi-centennial season, and of the new or unfamiliar music he intends to produce during the forty-ninth season, beginning next month, awaits the Russian conductor's return next week.

During the season of 1929-'30, the Boston Symphony will pay its usual five visits to New York, giving five evening concerts and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts in the Brooklyn Philharmonic series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, as well as six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon performances. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of children's concerts.

Towards the end of October, the orchestra will tour the central states, paying its second visit to Chicago and what is believed to be its first to Minneapolis, and will also play in Indianapolis, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

In February Mr. Koussevitzky will visit Richmond, Baltimore and Washington. Four concerts will be given in Providence and occasional appearances will be made in New England college cities, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the concerts on tour and all those in Boston, except for a two weeks' vacation, when he will be relieved by guests. The Boston Symphony, however, has never gone in for intensive guest conducting in the way pursued, by choice or necessity, by some other American orchestras. It is said that a Brahms festival is under consideration next spring as a culminating feature of the Boston season.

Mr. W. H. Brennan, who has been manager of the Boston Symphony for twenty years, said yesterday that the orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts have been sold out by subscription, and all its Boston concerts except for a few places in the recently established Tuesday afternoon series, which caters particularly to residents in Boston's suburbs.

From 1881 to 1918 the orchestra was supported by its founder, the late Major Henry L. Higginson. It has since been supported by contributions from a large number of patrons.

F. D. P.

Eleonora de Cisneros has been added to the faculty of the vocal department of the Malkin Conservatory of Music, which has taken up new and enlarged quarters at 316 Riverside Drive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR

JUL 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans European Tour

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in Washington once during the coming season as an attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, has announced that a European tour is planned for next Spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, recently returned from Europe for a three-day sojourn in America to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University. Newspaper writers who greeted Mr. Koussevitzky as he landed were assured that an itinerary has been completed for a two-month tour to include Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland.

The only details lacking, Mr. Koussevitzky told the reporters, were the consent of the orchestra's board of trustees and the necessary financial backing. The conductor betrayed no concern over surmounting these difficulties.

Mr. Koussevitzky desires to take the Boston Symphony on a European tour to obtain international recognition for the merits of the so-called "American orchestral idea," the "idea" consisting, it appears, of the American method of orchestral rehearsing which does not permit the easy-going European practice of permitting players to send substitutes to rehearsal.

As Mr. Koussevitzky presented the matter, a European tour of the Boston Symphony should provide pleasure to European listeners and satisfaction to American musicians and those who have fostered the development of American orchestras. It is thought that Mr. Koussevitzky would enjoy demonstrating the efficiency of Boston rehearsal methods, especially in Paris, for it is at the Paris Opera where, according to reports, Mr. Koussevitzky declined to go on with preparations for a performance on the ground that the players who were rehearsing might not, under the Paris rules, be the same players at all who faced him when the time came for the regular performance.

The amount necessary to take the Boston Symphony abroad has been estimated as being anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of and spokesman for the board of trustees, has shown himself favorably disposed toward the enterprise. A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the ranks of the Boston Symphony for 25 years.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, not to be outdone by Boston, is said to be planning a European tour of its own. Walter Damrosch took the New York Symphony on a similar tour on the close of the World War.

Worcester, Mass.

The story that the Paris Herald printed declared that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted three rehearsals for Moussorgsky's "Boris," and the men would only give him two.

Privately, he thought they needed four. So he canceled the engagements altogether, feeling that poor p eparation would make for bad performances.

It is not certain as to whether the Boston band will make the trip across the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MORN. WORLD

JUL 21 1929

Serge Koussivitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the recent guest of honor of the Association Francaise d'Expansion at Exchanges Artistiques at the Restaurant Laurent, Champs-Elysees. Among those present were M. Francois Poncet, Under Secretary of Fine Arts, and Emile Hamblot, President of the society, who delivered a speech and extended a cordial welcome to all American artists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR TELEGRAM

JUL 21 1929

Is it true that some of the American orchestras are going to Europe next year? I have heard rumors about the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Orchestra. Are they the only ones? What happened to the Philadelphia Orchestra's plans to tour abroad? R. Y.

It is practically settled that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini and th Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky are to tour in the early summer in Europe. Dates are not yet announced. The Philadelphians' plans went a-glimmering, much to the disgust, it is said, of Leopold Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JUL 15 1929

Boston Orchestra Plans Tour Abroad

BOSTON, July 14.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 21 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post-Intelligencer

JUL 28 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 27.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMMOND, IND.
LAKE CO. TIMES

AUG

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

AUG 5

and rate of descent.

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, Mass., August 5.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 10

* * *

From Boston comes the word that there are now seventy-one beneficiaries of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, receiving a little more than $17,000 annually. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid $750, but this, even with the aid of the annual pension fund concert, would be entirely inadequate without the aid of numerous gifts made by public spirited citizens of Boston. The maximum pension paid is only $500, a sum which it is hoped to increase in the near future. Only musicians who have served with the orchestra for ten years or more are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

AUG 6

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, Aug. 26.—Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

JUL 9

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 9—(I. N. S.).—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
MILWAUKEE, WIS.

AUG 24 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON — Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

◆ ◆ ◆

Felix Salmond, the English cellist, has been engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a pair of concerts on Dec. 27 and 28 in Boston.

◆ ◆ ◆

Boston Symphony Is About to Open

come her . . . but it might quite as pertinently be said that Peasett himself is to be congratulated upon a partner who so instantly comprehends and carries out his ideals. Not all of these Munich costumes, part and parcel as they are of the local settings and backgrounds, will be worn in New York. With what scant information he can obtain concerning our scenery, plus an acute natural perception, Mr. Peasett is already at work upon several new ones to be carried across the sea. And we may rest assured that they will be both expressive and beautiful.

When she arrives in New York early in January the new soprano will have not only her imported family about her, but will be welcomed by two

The Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

Music and also as musical director of the Curtis Institute of Music, has new duties as head of the orchestra just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

Emil Mlynarski, Polish composer and operatic conductor, has just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

The Westchester Choral Society resumes activities this week with a campaign for new members planned by Mrs. Eugene Meyer, chairman of the society, and Mrs. Kate A. Wasserscheid, executive secretary. The society is planning to hold the 1930 music festival in the new county center on the Bronx River Parkway. This will be the sixth annual festival of the

The American Opera Artists, Inc., an association organized last spring as a protective league for the benefit of singers, will hold their first meeting of the season at Mecca Temple on September 30 at 8:30 p. m. A campaign to double the present membership will be launched at that time.

Music Notes

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

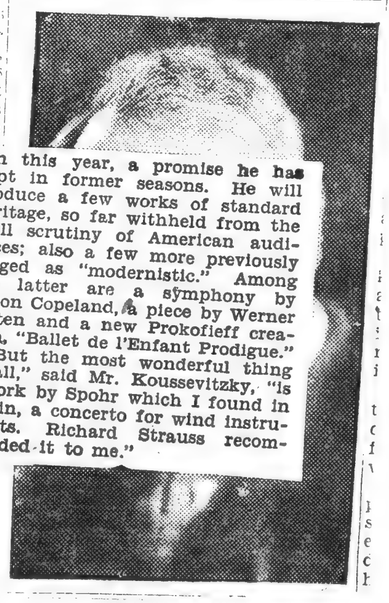
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

CONDUCTOR of Boston Symphony Orchestra Here to Resume Baton

SERGE A. KOUSSEVITZKY

The seasonal future of the Boston Symphony seems to be assured, for Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, its conductor, has returned from Europe for his annual American pilgrimage. He arrived yesterday on the Ile de France and paused for remarks before taking train for Philadelphia and Boston. He promises new works for Boston this year, a promise he has kept in former seasons. He will produce a few works of standard heritage, so far withheld from the chill scrutiny of American audiences; also a few more previously tagged as "modernistic." Among the latter are a symphony by Aaron Copeland, a piece by Werner Josten and a new Prokofieff creation, "Ballet de l'Enfant Prodigue."

"But the most wonderful thing of all," said Mr. Koussevitzky, "is a work by Spohr which I found in Berlin, a concerto for wind instruments. Richard Strauss recommended it to me."



THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

The Budapest and Cologne papers announce that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Sergei Koussevitzky, is scheduled to tour Europe next season.

The Westchester Choral Society resumes activities this week with a campaign for new members planned by Mrs. Eugene Meyer, chairman of the society, and Mrs. Kate A. Wasserscheid, executive secretary. The society is planning to hold the 1930 music festival in the new county center on the Bronx River Parkway. This will be the sixth annual festival of the

The American Opera Artists, Inc., an association organized last spring as a protective league for the benefit of singers, will hold their first meeting of the season at Mecca Temple on September 30 at 8:30 p. m. A campaign to double the present membership will be launched at that time.

Emil Mlynarski, Polish composer and operatic conductor, has just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

Music Notes

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

RETURNS TO AMERICA—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has returned from a summer in Europe to open rehearsals for the tour of the Boston Symphony this season, the itinerary of which will include Richmond.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR

JUL 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans European Tour

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in Washington once during the coming season as an attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course, has announced that a European tour is planned for next Spring.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, recently returned from Europe for a three-day sojourn in America to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University. Newspaper writers who greeted Mr. Koussevitzky as he landed were assured that an itinerary has been completed for a two-month tour to include Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland.

The only details lacking, Mr. Koussevitzky told the reporters, were the consent of the orchestra's board of trustees and the necessary financial backing. The conductor betrayed no concern over surmounting these difficulties.

Mr. Koussevitzky desires to take the Boston Symphony on a European tour to obtain international recognition for the merits of the so-called "American orchestral idea," the "idea" consisting, it appears, of the American method of orchestral rehearsing which does not permit the easy-going European practice of permitting players to send substitutes to rehearsal.

As Mr. Koussevitzky presented the matter, a European tour of the Boston Symphony should provide pleasure to European listeners and satisfaction to American musicians and those who have fostered the development of American orchestras. It is thought that Mr. Koussevitzky would enjoy demonstrating the efficiency of Boston rehearsal methods, especially in Paris, for it is at the Paris Opera where, according to reports, Mr. Koussevitzky declined to go on with preparations for a performance on the ground that the players who were rehearsing might not, under the Paris rules, be the same players at all who faced him when the time came for the regular performance.

The amount necessary to take the Boston Symphony abroad has been estimated as being anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of and spokesman for the board of trustees, has shown himself favorably disposed toward the enterprise. A European tour is an ambition which has existed within the ranks of the Boston Symphony for 25 years.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, not to be outdone by Boston, is said to be planning a European tour of its own. Walter Damrosch took the New York Symphony

JUL

Concerts Canceled.

Why did Serge Koussevitzky decide not to conduct at the Opera in Paris? We have heard many stories, but cannot seem to get the true one. Is the Boston Orchestra going abroad in the fall? B. C.

Worcester, Mass.

The story that the Paris Herald printed declared that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted three rehearsals for Moussorgsky's "Boris," and the men would only give him two.

Privately, he thought they needed four. So he canceled the engagements altogether, feeling that poor p eparation would make for bad performances.

It is not certain as to whether the Boston band will make the trip across the water. It depends mostly on Boston.

blot, President of ... livered a speech and extended a cordial welcome to all American ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR TELEGRAM

JUL 21 1929

Is it true that some of the American orchestras are going to Europe next year? I have heard rumors about the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Orchestra. Are they the only ones? What happened to the Philadelphia Orchestra's plans to tour abroad? R. Y.

It is practically settled that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini and th Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky are to tour in the early summer in Europe. Dates are not yet announced. The Philadelphians' plans went a-glimmering, much to the disgust, it is said, of Leopold Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JUL 15 1929

Boston Orchestra Plans Tour Abroad

BOSTON, July 14.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 21 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post-Intelligencer

JUL 28 1929

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 27.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMMOND, IND.
LAKE CO. TIMES

AUG

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

AUG 10

and rate of descent.

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, Mass., August 5.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 10 1929

* * *

From Boston comes the word that there are now seventy-one beneficiaries of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, receiving a little more than $17,000 annually. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid $750, but this, even with the aid of the annual pension fund concert, would be entirely inadequate without the aid of numerous gifts made by public spirited citizens of Boston. The maximum pension paid is only $500, a sum which it is hoped to increase in the near future. Only musicians who have served with the orchestra for ten years or more are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

AUG 6 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON, Aug. 26.—Boston Cymphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chie

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

JUL 9

Boston Orchestra May Tour Europe

BOSTON, July 9—(I. N. S.).—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
MILWAUKEE, WIS.

AUG 24 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON — Boston Symphony orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

◈ ◈ ◈

Felix Salmond, the English cellist, has been engaged as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a pair of concerts on Dec. 27 and 28 in Boston.

◈ ◈ ◈

Boston Symphony Is About to Open

come her . . . but it might quite as pertinently be said that Pasetti himself is to be congratulated upon a partner who so instantly comprehends and carries out his ideals. Not all of these Munich costumes, part and parcel as they are of the local settings and backgrounds, will be worn in New York. With what scant information he can obtain concerning our scenery, plus an acute natural perception, Mr. Pasetti is already at work upon several new ones to be carried across the sea. And we may rest assured that they will be both expressive and beautiful.

When she arrives in New York early in January the new soprano will have not only her important family about her, but will be welcomed by two

The Westchester Choral Society recently announced plans for a campaign for new members by which it hopes to double the present membership with a view to increasing its activities this week with a campaign for new members planned by Mrs. Eugene Meyer, chairman of the society, and Mrs. Kate A. Wasserscheid, executive secretary. The society is planning to hold the 1930 music festival in the new county center on the Bronx River Parkway. This will be the sixth annual festival of the Emil Mlynarski, Polish composer and operatic conductor, has just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

The American Opera Artists, Inc., an association organized last spring as a protective league for the benefit of singers, will hold their first meeting of the season at Mecca Temple on September 30 at 8:30 p. m. A campaign to double the present membership will be launched at that time.

Music Notes

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

S

Marriage of Miss Alva E. Kingsland on Sept. 12 Is Announced Society was much interested in the

SERGE A. KOUSSEVITZKY

The seasonal future of the Boston Symphony seems to be assured, for Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, its conductor, has returned from Europe for his annual American pilgrimage. He arrived yesterday on the Ile de France and paused for remarks before taking train for Philadelphia and Boston. He promises new works for Bos-come her . . . but it might quite as pertinently be said that Pasetti himself is to be congratulated upon a partner who so instantly comprehends and carries out his ideals. Not all of these Munich costumes, part and parcel as they are of the local settings and backgrounds, will be worn in New York. With what scant information he can obtain concerning our scenery, plus an acute natural perception, Mr. Pasetti is already at work upon several new ones to be carried across the sea. And we may rest assured that they will be both expressive and beautiful.

DOS

When she arrives in New York early in January the new soprano will have not only her important family about her, but will be welcomed by two

The American Opera Artists, Inc., an association organized last spring as a protective league for the benefit of singers, will hold their first meeting of the season at Mecca Temple on September 30 at 8:30 p. m. A campaign to double the present membership will be launched at that time.

Emil Mlynarski, Polish composer and operatic conductor, has just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

The Westchester Choral Society recently announced plans for a campaign for new members by which it hopes to double the present membership with a view to increasing its activities this week with a campaign for new members planned by Mrs. Eugene Meyer, chairman of the society, and Mrs. Kate A. Wasserscheid, executive secretary. The society is planning to hold the 1930 music festival in the new county center on the Bronx River Parkway. This will be the sixth annual festival of the

Music Notes

The American Opera Artists, Inc., an association organized last spring as a protective league for the benefit of singers, will hold their first meeting of the season at Mecca Temple on September 30 at 8:30 p. m. A campaign to double the present membership will be launched at that time.

Emil Mlynarski, Polish composer and operatic conductor, has just arrived in this country to assume his new duties as head of the orchestral department of the Curtis Institute of Music and also as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

The Westchester Choral Society recently announced plans for a campaign for new members by which it hopes to double the present membership with a view to increasing its activities this week with a campaign for new members planned by Mrs. Eugene Meyer, chairman of the society, and Mrs. Kate A. Wasserscheid, executive secretary. The society is planning to hold the 1930 music festival in the new county center on the Bronx River Parkway. This will be the sixth annual festival of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

RETURNS TO AMERICA—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has returned from a summer in Europe to open rehearsals for the tour of the Boston Symphony this season, the itinerary of which will include Richmond.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

The Budapest and Cologne papers announce that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Sergei Koussevitzky, is scheduled to tour Europe next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 9

Music Notes

Reminder of Coming Boston Symphony Season in Return of Koussevitzky from Abroad. Local Series Starts Nov. 19. Items on Musical Activities

With the return of Serge Koussevitsky last week from his summer in Europe Providence concertgoers are reminded of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. Early in the summer local subscribers were notified that the books were open for the re-engagement of seats. Until Oct. 15 remittances may be forwarded to the Boston office in Symphony Hall. The dates for the Providence concerts, as arranged, are the Tuesdays of Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1. The E. F. Albee Theatre continues as the concert hall.

The Boston season opens on Oct. 11. This will be the 49th year of the celebrated orchestra and its sixth under the noted Russian conductor. Koussevitsky said to reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the summer conferred with the foremost living composers and, accordingly, has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Wood-wind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of last Tuesday in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitsky, aboard the Ile de France, to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the liner had landed in New York. The letter was carried via seaplane by Lieut. Leon Domergue who flew from the decks of the vessel when she was 150 miles out. He made the flight in 1 hour and 45 minutes, it was reported, and carried three sacks of mail to the port of Boston, establishing a regular air mail service, according to the announcement of the French Line.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 9

League of [illegible]

TEN BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten New York concerts this season, and from what Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, told me when he returned from Europe last week, there will be some extraordinarily interesting features on the program. Each program will include at least one new work, although this will not always be a modern composition. He has, among those he brought from Europe, several interesting scores of nineteenth-century compositions which never have been played in the United States.

Among the modern composers to be represented on his programs this year will be a number of Americans, including Aaron Copeland and Roger Sessions.

"I will play a new symphony by Copeland which is quite extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "and will undoubtedly be the most interesting of the new things to be heard in the United States this winter."

Dr. Koussevitzky said that leading musicians throughout Europe are becoming more and more interested in the work of contemporary American composers.

I asked him about the rumor that hev was going to postpone his European tour with the orchestra until the spring of 1931 because the Philharmonic Symphony had announced a European trip for next April. His expression was sufficient to contradict any such rumor.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad this year or never," hed said firmly. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and not for any other American organization." He will take up the matter of the European trip with the trustees as soon as he returns to Boston, he said.

MR. KOUSSEVITSKI RETURNS
Leader Of The Boston Symphony As He Landed At New York From Europe
(Acme)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, though forty years younger than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type and is approaching the end of its first half century.

Although the beginning of the fiftieth season still is a year off plans to commemorate the semi-centennial already are on foot. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special works for the occasion. It also is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to return to Boston from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 21

Boston Symphony to Present 3 New American Works

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give three new works by American composers during the coming Boston season: a symphony by Aaron Copland, of New York; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, and a tone poem by Professor Werner Josten, of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also will be played. European scores new to America include Prokofieff's third symphony, a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar and a ballet suite arranged by Honegger from music of Bach.

Among works not often played to be given by the Boston Symphony this season are Mahler's ninth symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martydom of Saint Sebastian" with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also offer an unknown concerto for wind in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Koussevitzky Returns From European Trip

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Come Here on Feb. 3

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of th Boston Symphony Orchestra, has re turned to this country after spendin the greater part of the summer i Europe, where he has been filling en gagements as guest conductor for lead ing orchestras and enjoying his cus tomary summer holiday in the Ol World. He will bring his aggregatio of 112 musicians to the Mosque fo their annual visit Monday, February 3 under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene and T. Michaux Moody, as sisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Mr. Koussevitzky crossed the Atlantic four times last summer. Having gone to Europe earlier in the season than usual, he returned for a brief stay to receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws whic hwas conferred upon him at the Harvard University commencement exercises held June 20. Other celebrities who then received similar degrees were Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York State, and Secretaries Adams and Kellogg. The conductor of the oBston Symphony Orchestra then sailed again for Europe.

He is now assembling the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for the opening of the forty-ninth season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This will be the sixth American season for the Russian conductor. The annual visit of the Boston Symphony to Richmond will be as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, reservations for which are now available at Walter D. Moses & Company.

The course will open on January 8, when Lucrezia Bori will give a costume recital. On February 10 Jascha Heifetz, famous violinist, will come here for the first time in many years. On March 3 Emma Otero, new Cuban coloratura soprano, will be at the Mosque, and one week later John Charles Thomas, the widely-known baritone, will complete the list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCKFORD, ILL.
REPUBLIC
JAN 30 1928

Boston Symphony To Appear In Europe

New York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has just returned here from Europe on board the steamship Ile de France, of the French Line, and, on his return to Boston, will recommend to the trustees of the orchestra organization that they authorize the European trip for the orchestra which he has long been planning for next spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky categorically denied reports that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour of Europe would be postponed until 1931 because of the plans of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra to go abroad in April.

"You can quote me as saying that the Boston Symphony orchestra will go to Europe this spring or never," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Furthermore, Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony orchestra and not for any other American organization."

Further announcements, he said, would be made on this subject after he returns to Boston and confers with the trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 3

Three New Compositions by Young Americans Secured by Koussevitzky

"THE young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," said Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso, by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martryrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America. The conductor is rehearsing for the opening on October 11, when he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue and also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" Overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

Boston Symphony To Play New Works Here

Serge Koussevitzky, just back from his Summer in Europe, let it be known today that the ten concerts which his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York are to bring forward a number of new compositions by young Americans as well as novelties by other modern composers.

A new symphony by Aaron Copland, now well known here as one of the leaders of the American modernists; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, also among the more prominent of these composers; a tone poem by Werner Josten head of the music department of Smith College; the violinist Samuel Gardner's "Broadway"; the Third Symphony of Serge Prokofieff the Russian radical; a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar, a young Rumanian, and a ballet suite made by Arthur Hoenegger from music of Bach.

Some of the notable revivals which will be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky this season include Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his cycle "Death Songs of Childhood"; Bruckner's uncompleted Ninth Symphony; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" (which Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic will play tomorrow), and the music written by Debussy for d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony's season begins in Boston on October 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 9

Music Notes

Reminder of Coming Boston Symphony Season in Return of Koussevitzky from Abroad. Local Series Starts Nov. 19. Items on Musical Activities

With the return of Serge Koussevitsky last week from his summer in Europe Providence concertgoers are reminded of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. Early in the summer local subscfibers were notified that the books were open for the re-engagement of seats. Until Oct. 15 remittances may be forwarded to the Boston office in Symphony Hall. The dates for the Providence concerts, as arranged, are the Tuesdays of Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1. The E. F. Albee Theatre continues as the concert hall.

The Boston season opens on Oct. 11. This will be the 49th year of the celebrated orchestra and its sixth under the noted Russian conductor. Koussevitsky said to reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the summer conferred with the foremost living composers and, accordingly, has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Wood-wind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of last Tuesday in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitsky, aboard the Ile de France, to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the liner had landed in New York. The letter was carried via seaplane by Lieut. Leon Domergue who flew from the decks of the vessel when she was 150 miles out. He made the flight in 1 hour and 45 minutes, it was reported, and carried three sacks of mail to the port of Boston, establishing a regular air mail service, according to the announcement of the French Line.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 9

League of ... ad

TEN BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten New York concerts this season, and from what Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, told me when he returned from Europe last week, there will be some extraordinarily interesting features on the program. Each program will include at least one new work, although this will not always be a modern composition. He has, among those he brought from Europe, several interesting scores of nineteenth-century compositions which never have been played in the United States.

Among the modern composers to be represented on his programs this year will be a number of Americans, including Aaron Copeland and Roger Sessions.

"I will play a new symphony by Copeland which is quite extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "and will undoubtedly be the most interesting of the new things to be heard in the United States this winter."

Dr. Koussevitzky said that leading musicians throughout Europe are becoming more and more interested in the work of contemporary American composers.

I asked him about the rumor that hev was going to postpone his European tour with the orchestra until the spring of 1931 because the Philharmonic Symphony had announced a European trip for next April. His expression was sufficient to contradict any such rumor.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad this year or never," hed said firmly. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and not for any other American organization." He will take up the matter of the European trip with the trustees as soon as he returns to Boston, he said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29

MR. KOUSSEVITSKI RETURNS
Leader Of The Boston Symphony As He Landed At New York From Europe
(Acme)

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, though forty years younger than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type and is approaching the end of its first half century.

Although the beginning of the fiftieth season still is a year off plans to commemorate the semi-centennial already are on foot. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special works for the occasion. It also is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to return to Boston from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Koussevitzky Returns From European Trip

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Come Here on Feb. 3

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to this country after spending the greater part of the summer in Europe, where he has been filling engagements as guest conductor for leading orchestras and enjoying his customary summer holiday in the Old World. He will bring his aggregation of 112 musicians to the Mosque for their annual visit Monday, February 3, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Mr. Koussevitzky crossed the Atlantic four times last summer. Having gone to Europe earlier in the season than usual, he returned for a brief stay to receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws whic hwas conferred upon him at the Harvard University commencement exercises held June 20. Other celebrities who then received similar degrees were Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York State, and Secretaries Adams and Kellogg. The conductor of the oBston Symphony Orchestra then sailed again for Europe.

He is now assembling the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for the opening of the forty-ninth season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This will be the sixth American season for the Russian conductor. The annual visit of the Boston Symphony to Richmond will be as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, reservations for which are now available at Walter D. Moses & Company.

The course will open on January 8, when Lucrezia Bori will give a costume recital. On February 10 Jascha Heifetz, famous violinist, will come here for the first time in many years. On March 3 Emma Otero, new Cuban coloratura soprano, will be at the Mosque, and one week later John Charles Thomas, the widely-known baritone, will complete the list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
...RD, ILL.
...BLIC
30 1929

...Symphony To ...pear In Europe

...York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston ...phony orchestra, has just returned here from Europe on board the steamship Ile de France, of the French Line, and, on his return to Boston, will recommend to the trustees of the orchestra organization that they authorize the European trip for the orchestra which he has long been planning for next spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky categorically denied reports that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour of Europe would be postponed until 1931 because of the plans of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra to go abroad in April.

"You can quote me as saying that the Boston Symphony orchestra will go to Europe this spring or never," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Furthermore, Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony orchestra and not for any other American organization."

Further announcements, he said, would be made on this subject after he returns to Boston and confers with the trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 3

Three New Compositions by Young Americans Secured by Koussevitzky

"THE young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," said Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the na... of three compositions by young Amer... as which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso, by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America. The conductor is rehearsing for the opening on October 11, when he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue and also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" Overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 21

Boston Symphony to Present 3 New American Works

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give three new works by American composers during the coming Boston season: a symphony by Aaron Copland, of New York; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, and a tone poem by Professor Werner Josten, of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also will be played. European scores new to America include Prokofieff's third symphony, a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar and a ballet suite arranged by Honegger from music of Bach.

Among works not often played to be given by the Boston Symphony this season are Mahler's ninth symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martydom of Saint Sebastian" with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also offer an unknown concerto for wind in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony To Play New Works Here

Serge Koussevitzky, just back from his Summer in Europe, let it be known today that the ten concerts which his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York are to bring forward a number of new compositions by young Americans as well as novelties by other modern composers.

A new symphony by Aaron Copland, now well known here as one of the leaders of the American modernists; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, also among the more prominent of these composers; a tone poem by Werner Josten head of the music department of Smith College; the violinist Samuel Gardner's "Broadway"; the Third Symphony of Serge Prokofieff the Russian radical; a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar, a young Rumanian and a ballet suite made by Arthur Hoenegger from music of Bach.

Some of the notable revivals which will be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky this season include Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his cycle "Death Songs of Childhood"; Bruckner's uncompleted Ninth Symphony; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" (which Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic will play tomorrow), and the music written by Debussy for d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony's season begins in Boston on October 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 29 1929

Music Notes

Reminder of Coming Boston Symphony Season in Return of Koussevitzky from Abroad. Local Series Starts Nov. 19. Items on Musical Activities

With the return of Serge Koussevitsky last week from his summer in Europe Providence concertgoers are reminded of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. Early in the summer local subscribers were notified that the books were open for the re-engagement of seats. Until Oct. 15 remittances may be forwarded to the Boston office in Symphony Hall. The dates for the Providence concerts, as arranged, are the Tuesdays of Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1. The E. F. Albee Theatre continues as the concert hall.

The Boston season opens on Oct. 11. This will be the 49th year of the celebrated orchestra and its sixth under the noted Russian conductor. Koussevitsky said to reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the summer conferred with the foremost living composers and, accordingly, has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Wood-wind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of last Tuesday in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitsky, aboard the Ile de France, to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the liner had landed in New York. The letter was carried via seaplane by Lieut. Leon Domergue who flew from the decks of the vessel when she was 150 miles out. He made the flight in 1 hour and 45 minutes, it was reported, and carried three sacks of mail to the port of Boston, establishing a regular air mail service, according to the announcement of the French Line.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29 [illegible]

TEN BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten New York concerts this season, and from what Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, told me when he returned from Europe last week, there will be some extraordinarily interesting features on the program. Each program will include at least one new work, although this will not always be a modern composition. He has, among those he brought from Europe, several interesting scores of nineteenth-century compositions which never have been played in the United States.

Among the modern composers to be represented on his programs this year will be a number of Americans, including Aaron Copeland and Roger Sessions.

"I will play a new symphony by Copeland which is quite extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "and will undoubtedly be the most interesting of the new things to be heard in the United States this winter."

Dr. Koussevitzky said that leading musicians throughout Europe are becoming more and more interested in the work of contemporary American composers.

I asked him about the rumor that hev was going to postpone his European tour with the orchestra until the spring of 1931 because the Philharmonic Symphony had announced a European trip for next April. His expression was sufficient to contradict any such rumor.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad this year or never," hed said firmly. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and not for any other American organization." He will take up the matter of the European trip with the trustees as soon as he returns to Boston, he said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29 1929

MR. KOUSSEVITSKI RETURNS
Leader Of The Boston Symphony As He Landed At New York From Europe
(Acme)

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, though forty years younger than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type and is approaching the end of its first half century.

Although the beginning of the fiftieth season still is a year off plans to commemorate the semi-centennial already are on foot. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special works for the occasion. It also is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to return to Boston from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
SEP 29 [illegible]

Koussevitzky Returns From European Trip

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Come Here on Feb. 3

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to this country after spending the greater part of the summer in Europe, where he has been filling engagements as guest conductor for leading orchestras and enjoying his customary summer holiday in the Old World. He will bring his aggregation of 112 musicians to the Mosque for their annual visit Monday, February 3 under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Mr. Koussevitzky crossed the Atlantic four times last summer. Having gone to Europe earlier in the season than usual, he returned for a brief stay to receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws whic hwas conferred upon him at the Harvard University commencement exercises held June 20. Other celebrities who then received similar degrees were Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York State, and Secretaries Adams and Kellogg. The conductor of the oBston Symphony Orchestra then sailed again for Europe.

He is now assembling the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for the opening of the forty-ninth season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This will be the sixth American season for the Russian conductor. The annual visit of the Boston Symphony to Richmond will be as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, reservations for which are now available at Walter D. Moses & Company.

The course will open on January 8, when Lucrezia Bori will give a costume recital. On February 10 Jascha Heifetz, famous violinist, will come here for the first time in many years. On March 3 Emma Otero, new Cuban coloratura soprano, will be at the Mosque, and one week later John Charles Thomas, the widely-known baritone, will complete the list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCKFORD, ILL.
REPUBLIC
SEP 30 1929

Boston Symphony To Appear In Europe

New York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has just returned here from Europe on board the steamship Ile de France, of the French Line, and, on his return to Boston, will recommend to the trustees of the orchestra organization that they authorize the European trip for the orchestra which he has long been planning for next spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky categorically denied reports that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour of Europe would be postponed until 1931 because of the plans of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra to go abroad in April.

"You can quote me as saying that the Boston Symphony orchestra will go to Europe this spring or never," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Furthermore, Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony orchestra and not for any other American organization."

Further announcements, he said, would be made on this subject after he returns to Boston and confers with the trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
OCT 3 [illegible]

Three New Compositions by Young Americans Secured by Koussevitzky

"THE young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," said Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso, by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martryrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America. The conductor is rehearsing for the opening on October 11, when he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue and also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" Overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 21

Boston Symphony to Present 3 New American Works

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give three new works by American composers during the coming Boston season: a symphony by Aaron Copland, of New York; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, and a tone poem by Professor Werner Josten, of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also will be played. European scores new to America include Prokofieff's third symphony, a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar and a ballet suite arranged by Honegger from music of Bach.

Among works not often played to be given by the Boston Symphony this season are Mahler's ninth symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martydom of Saint Sebastian" with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also offer an unknown concerto for wind in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony To Play New Works Here

Serge Koussevitzky, just back from his Summer in Europe, let it be known today that the ten concerts which his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York are to bring forward a number of new compositions by young Americans as well as novelties by other modern composers.

A new symphony by Aaron Copland, now well known here as one of the leaders of the American modernists; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, also among the more prominent of these composers; a tone poem by Werner Josten head of the music department of Smith College; the violinist Samuel Gardner's "Broadway"; the Third Symphony of Serge Prokofieff the Russian radical; a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar, a young Rumanian, and a ballet suite made by Arthur Hoenegger from music of Bach.

Some of the notable revivals which will be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky this season include Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his cycle "Death Songs of Childhood"; Bruckner's uncompleted Ninth Symphony; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" (which Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic will play tomorrow), and the music written by Debussy for d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony's season begins in Boston on October 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 29

Music Notes

Reminder of Coming Boston Symphony Season in Return of Koussevitzky from Abroad. Local Series Starts Nov. 19. Items on Musical Activities

With the return of Serge Koussevitsky last week from his summer in Europe Providence concertgoers are reminded of the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. Early in the summer local subscribers were notified that the books were open for the re-engagement of seats. Until Oct. 15 remittances may be forwarded to the Boston office in Symphony Hall. The dates for the Providence concerts, as arranged, are the Tuesdays of Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1. The E. F. Albee Theatre continues as the concert hall.

The Boston season opens on Oct. 11. This will be the 49th year of the celebrated orchestra and its sixth under the noted Russian conductor. Koussevitsky said to reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the summer conferred with the foremost living composers and, accordingly, has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Wood-wind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of last Tuesday in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitsky, aboard the Ile de France, to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the liner had landed in New York. The letter was carried via seaplane by Lieut. Leon Domergue who flew from the decks of the vessel when she was 150 miles out. He made the flight in 1 hour and 45 minutes, it was reported, and carried three sacks of mail to the port of Boston, establishing a regular air mail service, according to the announcement of the French Line.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29

League of ... and ...

TEN BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten New York concerts this season, and from what Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, told me when he returned from Europe last week, there will be some extraordinarily interesting features on the program. Each program will include at least one new work, although this will not always be a modern composition. He has, among those he brought from Europe, several interesting scores of nineteenth-century compositions which never have been played in the United States.

Among the modern composers to be represented on his programs this year will be a number of Americans, including Aaron Copeland and Roger Sessions.

"I will play a new symphony by Copeland which is quite extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "and will undoubtedly be the most interesting of the new things to be heard in the United States this winter."

Dr. Koussevitzky said that leading musicians throughout Europe are becoming more and more interested in the work of contemporary American composers.

I asked him about the rumor that hev was going to postpone his European tour with the orchestra until the spring of 1931 because the Philharmonic Symphony had announced a European trip for next April. His expression was sufficient to contradict any such rumor.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad this year or never," hed said firmly. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and not for any other American organization." He will take up the matter of the European trip with the trustees as soon as he returns to Boston, he said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
SEP 29 1929

MR. KOUSSEVITSKI RETURNS
Leader Of The Boston Symphony As He Landed At New York From Europe
(Acme)

THIS CL. PING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, though forty years younger than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, is one of the four or five oldest among extant American organizations of this type and is approaching the end of its first half century.

Although the beginning of the fiftieth season still is a year off plans to commemorate the semi-centennial already are on foot. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special works for the occasion. It also is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to return to Boston from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
9

Koussevitzky Returns From European Trip

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Come Here on Feb. 3

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to this country after spending the greater part of the summer in Europe, where he has been filling engagements as guest conductor for leading orchestras and enjoying his customary summer holiday in the Old World. He will bring his aggregation of 112 musicians to the Mosque for their annual visit Monday, February 3, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Mr. Koussevitzky crossed the Atlantic four times last summer. Having gone to Europe earlier in the season than usual, he returned for a brief stay to receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws whic hwas conferred upon him at the Harvard University commencement exercises held June 20. Other celebrities who then received similar degrees were Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York State, and Secretaries Adams and Kellogg. The conductor of the oBston Symphony Orchestra then sailed again for Europe.

He is now assembling the personnel of the orchestra in preparation for the opening of the forty-ninth season in Boston on October 11 and 12. This will be the sixth American season for the Russian conductor. The annual visit of the Boston Symphony to Richmond will be as the second attraction in the artists' course of five concerts, reservations for which are now available at Walter D. Moses & Company.

The course will open on January 8, when Lucrezia Bori will give a costume recital. On February 10 Jascha Heifetz, famous violinist, will come here for the first time in many years. On March 3 Emma Otero, new Cuban coloratura soprano, will be at the Mosque, and one week later John Charles Thomas, the widely-known baritone, will complete the list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
...RD, ILL.
...BLIC
30 1929

...a Symphony To ...pear In Europe

York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston ...phony orchestra, has just returned here from Europe on board the steamship Ile de France, of the French Line, and, on his return to Boston, will recommend to the trustees of the orchestra organization that they authorize the European trip for the orchestra which he has long been planning for next spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky categorically denied reports that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour of Europe would be postponed until 1931 because of the plans of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra to go abroad in April.

"You can quote me as saying that the Boston Symphony orchestra will go to Europe this spring or never," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "It is not interested in imitating other organizations. Furthermore, Europe has been waiting for the Boston Symphony orchestra and not for any other American organization."

Further announcements, he said, would be made on this subject after he returns to Boston and confers with the trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
OCT 3

Three New Compositions by Young Americans Secured by Koussevitzky

"THE young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," said Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso, by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martryrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America. The conductor is rehearsing for the opening on October 11, when he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue and also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" Overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 21

Boston Symphony to Present 3 New American Works

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give three new works by American composers during the coming Boston season: a symphony by Aaron Copland, of New York; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, and a tone poem by Professor Werner Josten, of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also will be played. European scores new to America include Prokofieff's third symphony, a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar and a ballet suite arranged by Honegger from music of Bach.

Among works not often played to be given by the Boston Symphony this season are Mahler's ninth symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martydom of Saint Sebastian" with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also offer an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, which he discovered in Berlin.

The orchestra will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall on November 21. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts have been fully subscribed. Five concerts will also be given on Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

...e known today that the ten concerts which his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York are to bring forward a number of new compositions by young Americans as well as novelties by other modern composers.

A new symphony by Aaron Copland, now well known here as one of the leaders of the American modernists; a tone poem by Roger Sessions, also among the more prominent of these composers; a tone poem by Werner Josten head of the music department of Smith College; the violinist Samuel Gardner's "Broadway"; the Third Symphony of Serge Prokofieff the Russian radical; a concerto grosso by Filip Lazar, a young Rumanian, and a ballet suite made by Arthur Hoenegger from music of Bach.

Some of the notable revivals which will be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky this season include Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his cycle "Death Songs of Childhood"; Bruckner's uncompleted Ninth Symphony; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" (which Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic will play tomorrow), and the music written by Debussy for d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony's season begins in Boston on October 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
OCT 4 - 1929

Along With the Teams

Are orchestras going to climb in public estimation to a parity with the baseball teams? There is something quite exhilarating in the note of asperity that begins to be heard from Boston and New York in connection with the plans for European tours by the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic Symphony. The Boston Symphony tour was discussed last season as probable either in 1930 or 1931; nothing much at that time was heard from New York.

But quite suddenly this season comes the announcement that the New York orchestra is to be heard in Europe next Spring with Toscanini conducting. And now comes Koussevitski, newly returned to Boston, to say that the Boston Symphony will tour Europe in 1930 or not at all; that Europe has long waited for the Boston Symphony and that this is the orchestra it wants to hear.

There seems little cause to doubt that Europe would welcome the Boston Symphony of which it knows much; it has sent a number of its most noted conductors to lead that orchestra. Many of its well known orchestral players have come over to play in it; Koussevitski is a known quantity. But there can be as little doubt as to the welcome which will await the New York Philharmonic with Toscanini as conductor. He is easily the most admired of opera conductors of today; where he has been heard as orchestra conductor he has been equally admired. There is more curiosity about his interpretations and about the technical results he secures than about those of any conductor.

On the whole, a little civic rivalry, a stir in the press that leads to considerable public attention, a centralizing of interest consequent on the civic phase of the [illegible], all [illegible]. "Far[illegible]. But [illegible] will [illegible].

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
OCT 4 - 1929

MPORTANT BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Koussevitzky Discloses Plans Of Notable Organization Which Is To Play Here.

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young American." This opinion was given out to Serge Koussevitsky in interviews when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston last Friday, September 27, on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston Symphony season. These are a Symphony by Aaron Copland, and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss' "Don Quixote," and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer, to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitsky was most enthusiastic about this piece and had it copied, and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals next week for the opening of the Boston Symphony season, in Symphony Hall, on October 11th. This will be the 49th season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion, he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude & Fugue, and also play Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Eggmont" Overture.

The Boston Symphony, along with Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Roland Hayes and Elizabeth Rethberg will comprise the Woolsey Hall Concert Series this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 4 - 1929

NOTED CONDUCTOR IN N. Y. WITH NEW SYMPHONY WORKS

The Ile de France brought to New York Tuesday as perhaps its most distinguished passenger, Serge Koussevitzky, who returned from Europe prepared for the opening of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 11. This will be the sixth American season of the great Russian leader.

Koussevitzky told reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the Summer conferred with the foremost living composers, and accordingly has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff. "L'Enfant Prodigue", which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Woodwind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of September 24 in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitzky to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the steamer had landed in New York. This letter was carried by seaplane from the Ile de France when its pilot, Lieutenant Leon Domergue, flew from the decks of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
OCT 6 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS WITH NEW CLASSICS

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make but one appearance in Washington during the coming season of 1929-30, when it appears here as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course of afternoon concerts at Poli's Theater, it is highly probable that Mr. Koussevitzky will offer Washington one or more of the superb group of new American and European compositions he obtained during his summer holiday abroad.

Koussevitzky arrived in Boston last week to open his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, incidentally, is about to launch out on its forty-ninth season. Almost immediately upon his arrival, Koussevitzky spoke at length on his plans for the coming season and was not at all reluctant to say that he finds the work of young American composers more interesting than their European confreres.

By way of illustrating his interest in the native composers, Koussevitzky will offer, during the coming season, a symphony by Aaron Copland, several tone poems by Werner Josten, and Roger Sessions, as well as a remarkable new composition by a fourth American, Samuel Gardner, called "Broadway," which will require four expert saxophonists for its rendition. At least one saxophonist of the requisite virtuosity will have to be engaged specially for this performance.

However, there are a number of European works that Koussevitzky has brought back for presentation in America this season. There will be a concerto grosso by the Roumanian, Lazar, whose name has appeared before on Koussevitzky programs, and Prokofieff's Third Symphony is another scheduled for performance. Mr Koussevitzky's portfolio includes a prelude and fugue by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, whose name is a new one in American ears. Honegger, the composer of that much-discussed "Pacific 231," has composed a suite of Bach transcriptions which Koussevitzky, who usually "detests" Bach transcriptions, calls "too charming to be resisted."

The older composers will be heard from, too. Boston will hear for the first time this winter—and possibly, Washington also—the Ninth Symphony, by Mahler, as well as a Mahler cycle of five songs with orchestra There will be played also a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which has lain in the archives of the Berlin State Opera until last summer, when Richard Strauss commended the work to Koussevitzky, who had the work copied forthwith.

From Strauss' own music Koussevitzky has selected a revival of "Don Quixote," while from Bruckner will come the unfinished Ninth Symphony. During the winter, the symphony will also give a performance of Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the choral portions of which will be heard in America for the first time

Last Friday afternoon Koussevitzky assembled the Boston Symphony for its rehearsal, and the season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 11 and 12.

In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course of concerts will include concerts by Horowitz, the pianist; La Argentina, danseuse; Lucrezia Bori, soprano, and Gigli, the "Met" tenor star.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1929

"The young American [illegible] are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," Serge Koussevitzky remarked when he arrived here September 27 from Europe to begin his sixth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He plans to give first performances during the Boston season of works by three Americans: a symphony by Aaron Copland, a tone-poem by Roger Sessions and a tone-poem by Werner Josten, of the music faculty of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played. European scores new to America on the Boston Symphony list include Serge Prokofieff's Third Symphony, a Concerto Grosso by Filip Lazar, and a ballet suite arranged from music of Bach by Honegger.

Among works not often played, Mr. Koussevitzky will offer Mahler's Ninth Symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony and Debussy's incidental music for "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" including the choral numbers. When in Berlin last summer, Richard Strauss drew Koussevitzky's attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will give it in this country.

The Boston season opens next Friday with a program including Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" overture.

The New York concerts begin at Carnegie Hall on November 21-23, and November 22 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
OCT 9 1929

Boston Programs.

Friday and Saturday this week come the first concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixth [illegible] under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. The program will include Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue; Debussy's "La Mer;" Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Koussevitzky plans during the season to present a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten besides Samuel Gardner's "Broadway."

According to the New York Times, European scores new to America will be the Third symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER
OCT 12 [illegible]

Boston Symphony To Be at Mosque

Music lovers are looking forward to the appearance of Ethel Leginska, distinguished pianist-composer-conductor, who is to bring her Boston Woman's Symphony orchestra to the Mosque the night of Monday, Oct. 21, one week from next Monday at 8:30 o'clock. The box office at Walter D. Moses and Company reports a tremendous business for the first concert of the season, which is being presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Leginska is known as one of the world's most dynamic artists, and those who have seen her conduct declare that her rare magnetism and sound musicianship carry all before them. She has just returned from England and will open her autumn concert tour next Monday night.

The Boston Woman's Symphony orchestra is the first orchestra in this country, the complete personnel of which, including conductor, is composed entirely of women. It is now in its fourth season. At her concert here she will appear as soloist as well as conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 13 [illegible]

Serge Koussevitzky Prefers Young American Composers

"The Young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans." This opinion was given out by Serge Koussevitzky to interviewers when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston a few days ago on his return from Europe. In support of this belief he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony of Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores news to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concorto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin lyast summer to attend the Strauss festival there the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spehr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT [illegible]

GARDNER'S "BROADWAY" BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence friends of Samuel Gardner will be interested to know that his "Broadway" is among the works by American composers Serge Koussevitzky has announced for the Boston Symphony concerts this season, which began last week in Boston. Interviewed in Boston on his return from abroad the Russian conductor said: "The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans.

In support of this belief he disclosed the names of three compositions which he is to give their first performances. These are a Symphony by Aaron Copeland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. European scores new to this country will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a "Concerto Grosso," by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composers's song cycle "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied, and will produce it in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 13 1929

Next season the Boston Symphony will celebrate a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. Stravinsky and Prokofieff have been commissioned to write new works for the event, which will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
OCT 4 - 1929

Along With the Teams

Are orchestras going to climb in public estimation to a parity with the baseball teams? There is something quite exhilarating in the note of asperity that begins to be heard from Boston and New York in connection with the plans for European tours by the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic Symphony. The Boston Symphony tour was discussed last season as probable either in 1930 or 1931; nothing much at that time was heard from New York.

But quite suddenly this season comes the announcement that the New York orchestra is to be heard in Europe next Spring with Toscanini conducting. And now comes Koussevitski, newly returned to Boston, to say that the Boston Symphony will tour Europe in 1930 or not at all; that Europe has long waited for the Boston Symphony and that this is the orchestra it wants to hear.

There seems little cause to doubt that Europe would welcome the Boston Symphony of which it knows much; it has sent a number of its most noted conductors to lead that orchestra. Many of its well known orchestral players have come over to play in it; Koussevitski is a known quantity. But there can be as little doubt as to the welcome which will await the New York Philharmonic with Toscanini as conductor. He is easily the most admired of opera conductors of today; where he has been heard as orchestra conductor he has been equally admired. There is more curiosity about his interpretations and about the technical results he secures than about those of any conductor.

On the whole, a little civic rivalry, a stir in the press that leads to considerable public attention, a centralizing of interest consequent on the civic phase of the matter, all will tend to aid orchestral affairs. "Fans" belong in the sports, not the arts. But a little spirit like to that of fandom will not harm the civic status of the arts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 4 - 1929

NOTED CONDUCTOR IN N. Y. WITH NEW SYMPHONY WORKS

The Ile de France brought to New York Tuesday as perhaps its most distinguished passenger, Serge Koussevitzky, who returned from Europe prepared for the opening of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 11. This will be the sixth American season of the great Russian leader.

Koussevitzky told reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store. He has in the course of the Summer conferred with the foremost living composers, and accordingly has brought back in his portfolio a Suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue", which he will give its first American performance. New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a Symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Woodwind Concerto of Spohr, which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

The morning mail of September 24 in Boston brought a letter from Koussevitzky to W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, even before the steamer had landed in New York. This letter was carried by seaplane from the Ile de France when its pilot, Lieutenant Leon Domergue, flew from the decks of the liner when it was 150 miles at sea, in an hour and 45 minutes, and brought three sacks of mail to the port of Boston. This new precedent in airmail delivery establishes, according to the announcement of the French line, a regular advance airmail service.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1929

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans," Serge Koussevitzky remarked when he arrived here September 27 from Europe to begin his sixth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He plans to give first performances during the Boston season of works by three Americans: a symphony by Aaron Copland, a tone-poem by Roger Sessions and a tone-poem by Werner Josten, of the music faculty of Smith College. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played. European scores new to America on the Boston Symphony list include Serge Prokofieff's Third Symphony, a Concerto Grosso by Filip Lazar, and a ballet suite arranged from music of Bach by Honegger.

Among works not often played, Mr. Koussevitzky will offer Mahler's Ninth Symphony and song cycle "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony and Debussy's incidental music for "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" including the choral numbers. When in Berlin last summer, Richard Strauss drew Koussevitzky's attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will give it in this country.

The Boston season opens next Friday with a program including Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Egmont" overture.

The New York concerts begin at Carnegie Hall on November 21-23, and November 22 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 13

Serge Koussevitzky Prefers Young American Composers

"The Young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans." This opinion was given out by Serge Koussevitzky to interviewers when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston a few days ago on his return from Europe. In support of this belief he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony of Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores news to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin lyast summer to attend the Strauss festival there the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spehr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied and will produce it in America.

SYMPHONY SEASON

Koussevitzky Discloses Plans Of Notable Organization Which Is To Play Here.

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young American." This opinion was given out to Serge Koussevitsky in interviews when the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston last Friday, September 27, on his return from Europe. In support of this belief, he disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which he is to give their first performances in the course of the pending Boston Symphony season. These are a Symphony by Aaron Copland, and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" will also be played.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composer's song cycle "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss' "Don Quixote," and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer, to attend the Strauss festival there, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitsky was most enthusiastic about this piece and had it copied, and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals next week for the opening of the Boston Symphony season, in Symphony Hall, on October 11th. This will be the 49th season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion, he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude & Fugue, and also play Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and "Eggmont" Overture.

The Boston Symphony, along with Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Roland Hayes and Elizabeth Bethberg will comprise the Woolsey Hall Concert Series this season.

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make but one appearance in Washington during the coming season of 1929-30, when it appears here as one of the attractions of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course of afternoon concerts at Poli's Theater, it is highly probable that Mr. Koussevitzky will offer Washington one or more of the superb group of new American and European compositions he obtained during his summer holiday abroad.

Koussevitzky arrived in Boston last week to open his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, incidentally, is about to launch out on its forty-ninth season. Almost immediately upon his arrival, Koussevitzky spoke at length on his plans for the coming season and was not at all reluctant to say that he finds the work of young American composers more interesting than their European confreres.

By way of illustrating his interest in the native composers, Koussevitzky will offer, during the coming season, a symphony by Aaron Copland, several tone poems by Werner Josten, and Roger Sessions, as well as a remarkable new composition by a fourth American, Samuel Gardner, called "Broadway," which will require four expert saxophonists for its rendition. At least one saxophonist of the requisite virtuosity will have to be engaged specially for this performance.

However, there are a number of European works that Koussevitzky has brought back for presentation in America this season. There will be a concerto grosso by the Roumanian, Lazar, whose name has appeared before on Koussevitzky programs, and Prokofieff's Third Symphony is another scheduled for performance. Mr Koussevitzky's portfolio includes a prelude and fugue by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, whose name is a new one in American ears. Honegger, the composer of that much-discussed "Pacific 231," has composed a suite of Bach transcriptions which Koussevitzky, who usually "detests" Bach transcriptions, calls "too charming to be resisted."

The older composers will be heard from, too. Boston will hear for the first time this winter—and possibly, Washington also—the Ninth Symphony, by Mahler, as well as a Mahler cycle of five songs with orchestra. There will be played also a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which has lain in the archives of the Berlin State Opera until last summer, when Richard Strauss commended the work to Koussevitzky, who had the work copied forthwith.

From Strauss' own music Koussevitzky has selected a revival of "Don Quixote," while from Bruckner will come the unfinished Ninth Symphony. During the winter, the symphony will also give a performance of Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the choral portions of which will be heard in America for the first time.

Last Friday afternoon Koussevitzky assembled the Boston Symphony for its rehearsal, and the season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 11 and 12.

In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course of concerts will include concerts by Horowitz, the pianist; La Argentina, danseuse; Lucrezia Bori, soprano, and Gigli, the "Met" tenor star.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
OCT 9 1929

Boston Programs.

Friday and Saturday this week come the first concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixth under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. The program will include Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue; Debussy's "La Mer;" Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Koussevitzky plans during the season to present a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten besides Samuel Gardner's "Broadway."

According to the New York Times, European scores new to America will be the Third symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER
OCT 12 1929

Boston Symphony To Be at Mosque

Music lovers are looking forward to the appearance of Ethel Leginska, distinguished pianist-composer-conductor, who is to bring her Boston Woman's Symphony orchestra to the Mosque the night of Monday, Oct. 21, one week from next Monday at 8:30 o'clock. The box office at Walter D. Moses and Company reports a tremendous business for the first concert of the season, which is being presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

Leginska is known as one of the world's most dynamic artists, and those who have seen her conduct declare that her rare magnetism and sound musicianship carry all before them. She has just returned from England and will open her autumn concert tour next Monday night.

The Boston Woman's Symphony orchestra is the first orchestra in this country, the complete personnel of which, including conductor, is composed entirely of women. It is now in its fourth season. At her concert here she will appear as soloist as well as conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 13

GARDNER'S "BROADWAY" BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence friends of Samuel Gardner will be interested to know that his "Broadway" is among the works by American composers Serge Koussevitzky has announced for the Boston Symphony concerts this season, which began last week in Boston. Interviewed in Boston on his return from abroad the Russian conductor said: "The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans.

In support of this belief he disclosed the names of three compositions which he is to give their first performances. These are a Symphony by Aaron Copeland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. European scores new to this country will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a "Concerto Grosso," by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach, by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, and the same composers's song cycle "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last summer to attend the Strauss festival, the famous composer drew his attention to an unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Koussevitzky was most enthusiastic about the piece and had it copied, and will produce it in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 13 1929

Next season the Boston Symphony will celebrate a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. Stravinsky and Prokofieff have been commissioned to write new works for the event, which will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PEORIA, ILL.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 13 1929

LINES and SPACES

By
WILLIAM E. DONOVAN
JOURNAL-TRANSCRIPT
MUSIC EDITOR

There is a new movie now with the elegant title of "The Cock Eyed W[illegible]." This being so, we feel that we would be quite competent to [illegible] some Cock Eyed incidental music to it, what with furnishing a new studio and the way the Cubs let us down in the Worlds Serious, in our minds.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Next year the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a jubilee to honor its fiftieth birthday. This great occasion will be made greater due to the fact that new compositions by Stravinsky and Prokofieff, two of the foremost living composers will be performed for the first time. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the orchestra has commissioned these masters to write especially for the event, the compositions to remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

If the proper arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will conduct at least a part of the program, to add to the glory of the occasion. Sir George, now a venerable old man, is residing in London and Scotland, enjoying the best of health and maintaining a close contact with prominent musicians and leading musical events.

We have heard the Boston symphony a countless number of times, during our student and teaching years in Boston. From 1912 to 1918 Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor. At the outbreak of the war, Doctor Muck was accused of Pro-Germanism and was banished from Boston to be interned at Atlanta, Ga. The charges against him were never proven and never could be because they were founded on a false supposition. At the conclusion of the war, Doctor Muck returned to Germany, a broken hearted man but still retaining the high musical ideals of the artist he is. He is now residing in Hamburg where he conducts the Philharmonic orchestra as well as some performances at the Stats-Oper. He is also one of the leading conductors of Wagnerian Opera at the annual Bayreuth festival, each year. Doctor Muck is a man of striking appearance and has a profile that bears a close resemblance to Wagner, so much so, that he is said to be the illegitimate son of Mathilde Wessendock and the illustrious Wagner. But as we were about to say above, never, either in this county or Europe, have we heard an orchestra with such a depth and beauty in the string sections, velvet delicacy in the wood wind sections, pomposity and stridency in the brass sections, as the Boston symphony of this period. For great musical conceptions, beautifully rich tone, sheer virtousity and dazzling brilliance none there were who could compare with them.

Then the Deluge

Then came the deluge—the Great war. After Doctor Muck left, several conductors, including Monteux and Rabaud, were engaged, but each went their own way after a space of time. The orchestra was deteriorating in quality because of conductors who lacked vision, personality, magnetism, and because there seemed to be a dearth of good material for the orchestra personnel. After several lean years, during which the attendance at the concerts grew less and the board of directors became near-sighted looking askance at shrinking receipts, along came Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian, whose chief reputation was that he was a virtuoso on that most awkward of instruments, the double bass. He had also conducted some concerts in Paris, known as the Concerts Koussevitzky. The board of directors deemed it wise to try another experiment. They had had both German and French conductors, now they would see what a Russian could do. But Koussevitzky had great courage, vision, personality and an intense magnetism that attracted people to him and held them. We received numerous letters from various friends in Boston saying he was a "prima donna conductor," "knew only a few of the classics," "tried to conduct from memory, forgot and floundered about miserably," etc., etc., ad infinitum. Nevertheless he kept on, new orchestral material in the shape of fine musicians came to him for enlistment in the orchestra. He drove his men, they slaved, he cracked the whip, they responded by doing a little better than before and results began to appear. The old beauty and luster of tone was there, the great virtuosity and brilliance that was once theirs had come back. Finally the people of Boston said: "What mahner of man is this and what miracle has he wrought!" Old Philip Hale, dean of music critics, rubbed his eyes and probably rubbed both of his musical ears. The astonishment was great, for a lowly double virtuoso had achieved the remarkable result in a fairly short space of time. The orchestra's visits to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore grew to be triumphs and ovations were accorded them.

Audience Is Swayed

Two years ago we heard this same orchestra in Chicago. We wanted to see and hear for ourselves, if all the glowing accounts were true. We went, with the glorious memory of the old orchestra under Doctor Muck, in our mind. The orchestra was seated on the stage and had completed that bedlam of noise and sound, known as the pre-concert tuning, a hush fell on the audience as an aristocratic man, slightly stooped and with greying hair, ascended the conductors rostrum. This was Serge Koussevitzky and he was greeted with the customary polite applause [illegible] that some audiences are prone to give, particularly when they are not the products of the home town. Then there was silence as the conductor raised his baton and they began. It was a Concerto Grosso by Bach for the strings alone. We were satisfied that the old quality of the strings was there. People applauded more generously. Then followed a Classique Symphony by Prokofieff the modernist, written in the style of a twentieth century Mozart. We knew then, that here was an orchestra and conductor that compared favorably with our Boston Symphony of other days. The applause that followed was greater and people were beginning to say, "Aha, maybe it is so after all." Following this came that great masterpiece of Ravel's "Dophne et Chloe." It was played in a stunning manner. Never had we experienced such a musical sensation. The atmosphere was charged and supercharged with electricity. People were swayed by the music and the performance as by some great invisible wand. Everbody was tense, our hands gripping the seats were sore for several days afterwards. At the completion of this composition there was a brief silence and then a veritable tornado of applause broke loose. People gesticulated wildly and talked incoherently. Never had they heard anything to equal it for comparisons were useless. During the intermission that followed, our old friend Arne Oldberg of Northwestern University, said that in his musical experience of 40 years, never had he heard anything quite so wonderful. The concert concluded with a performance of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony. The same scenes as above were re-enacted. The orchestra made many bows while Koussevitzky came out again and again for his share of the honors. It was a tremendous ovation and one that will live long in our memory and in the memory of those who were there that evening. Not until the lights were dimmed and lowered did the audience think of going, so loathe were they to leave. The music critics depleted their stock of adjectives in describing the concert for their respective papers the following day.

"A Devil of a Man"

We went to the musicians room after the concert to see one of our old pals, in the orchestra, John Murray, a violinist and one of the finest Scotchman to ever roll an r. We found him and said to him: "John, what do you fellows think of Koussevitzky by this time?" And John replied—"Weel, Willie, he's a devil of a mon to work forrrrrr, but what a musician he is."

And that ladies and gentlemen, is the highest praise a conductor could ever want, coming as it does from

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

BOSTON SYMPHONY SETS BIG JUBILEE

BOSTON.—Next season the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. The occasion will be made glorious by the rendition of new pieces by two of our foremost living composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, for Mrs. Koussevitzky has commissioned these masters to compose pieces especially for the event. The selections will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

If satisfactory arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will wield his old baton for a few moments to add to the glory of the commemoration. Sir Henschel, now living in London and in Scotland, enjoys splendid health, coaches prominent musicians and receives well-merited veneration.

An unofficial report has it that the jubilee programs will include a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
OCT 13 1929

Bach Festival Is Planned By Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Here in February; One of Series of Concerts

Preparations are already underway for the celebration by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its semi-centennial, which is to take place in the season of 1930-31, and will include a Bach festival in the spring with Harvard and Radcliffe students singing the choral parts. Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, has already commissioned Ivor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the celebration, while it is planned to invite the first conductor of this famous orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881-85, to come from England to conduct at least a part of a concert.

Meantime, the great organization with its distinguished conductor will appear at the Mosque next February on its anrual visit as one of the attractions in the "artists' course" of five concerts. During the season now opening the Boston Symphony will pay its usual five visits to New York, giving five evening concerts and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In Boston, the orchestra will give the usual forty-eight Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, as well as six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon performances. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of children's concerts.

This busy orchestra, the 112 members of which are employed full time by Mr. Koussevitzky, will leave Boston the end of this month to tour the central states. It will pay its second visit to Chicago and what is its first to Minneapolis, and will also play in Indianapolis, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. In February, when it comes here it will appear, too, in Washington and Baltimore, all under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who, with T. Michaux Moody, is bringing the Boston to Richmond. Four concerts will be given in Providence and occasional appearances will be made in New England college towns, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the concerts on tour and all t[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 13 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
OCT 6 - 1929

Boston Symphony Leader Features American Works

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky arrived in Boston last week to open his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he spoke at length upon his plans to feature works by young American composers. He stated that he found them much more interesting than those of Europeans who are contemporary. Moreover, it should interest Washingtonians to know that Mr. Koussevitzky has intimated that he will bring one or more of these new works here for the one performance scheduled by this orchestra in the National Capital. It is listed to appear the afternoon of February 4 at Poli's in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artist course.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to launch its forty-ninth season. Almost immediately upon his arrival, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke at length on his plans for the coming season and was not at all reluctant to say that he finds the work of young American composers more interesting than their European confreres.

By way of illustrating his interest in the native composers, Koussevitzky will offer, during the coming season, a symphony by Aaron Copland, several tone poems by Werner Josten and Roser Sessions, and a remarkable new composition by a fourth American, Samuel Gardner, called "Broadway," which will require four expert saxophonists for its rendition. At least one saxophonist of the requisite virtuosity will have to be engaged specially for this performance.

There also are, however, a number of European works which this Russian conductor has brought back for presentation in America this season. There will be a "Concerto Grosso" by the Rumanian, Laz, whose name has appeared before on Koussevitzky programs. Prokofieff's "Third Symphony" is scheduled for performance. Mr. Koussevitzky's portfolio includes a prelude and fugue by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, whose name is a new one in American ears. Honegger, composer of the much-discussed "Pacific 231," and "Rugby," has composed a suite of Bach transcriptions which Koussevitzky, who does not usually care for Bach transcriptions, calls "too charming to be resisted."

Earlier composers of symphonic works will be heard from, too. Boston, it is announced, will hear for the first time this winter—and possibly Washington also will hear—the "Ninth Symphony," by Mahler, as well as a Mahler cycle of five songs with orchestra. There also is listed a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which has lain in the archives of the Berlin State Opera until last Summer, when Richard Strauss commended the work to Koussevitzky, who forthwith had the work copied.

From Strauss' own music, Koussevitzky has selected a revival of "Don Quixote," while from Bruckner will come the unfinished "Ninth Symphony." During the Winter the symphony is to give a performance of Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the choral portions of which, it is said, will be heard in America for the first time.

Last Friday afternoon Koussevitzky assembled the Boston Symphony for its first rehearsal this year. The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 11 and 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 6 - 1929

NEW WORKS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which are to have their first performances in the course of the Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also is announced.

European scores new to America will be the Third symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer to attend the [illegible] Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 11. This will be the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue and will also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 21. The other dates will be Nov. 23, Jan. 9 and 11, Feb. 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
OCT 6 - 1929

The Boston [illegible] Symphony Orchestra is open[illegible] ninth season. Besides its a[illegible]nnual five visits to New York, the or[illegible]chestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, will have tours in the Middle West and in the South. Its concerts in N[illegible]ew York and at home are sold out by subscription.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Boston Symphony To Play New Works

Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which are to have their first performances in the course of the Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also is announced.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the composer drew his attention to a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, said to be the only existing copy, which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall, October 11. This will be the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue and will also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall, November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and [illegible], and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
OCT [illegible] 1929

While the Philharmonic orchestra has reached the venerable age of nearly 90 years, the Boston symphony is preparing to celebrate its first half-century as a musical organization.

A number of momentous plans are being discussed. One is for a Bach festival, which will include the B minor mass, so admirably sung each year at South Bethlehem. The Boston Evening Transcript adds that Serge Koussevitsky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the Boston symphony's semi-centennial, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of this orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come here from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

Orchestras and Ensembles

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PEORIA, ILL.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 13 1929

LINES and SPACES

By
WILLIAM E. DONOVAN
JOURNAL-TRANSCRIPT
MUSIC EDITOR

There is a new movie now with the elegant title of "The Cock Eyed W[illegible]." This being so, we feel that we would be quite competent to some Cock Eyed incidental music to it, what with furnishing a new studio and the way the Cubs let us down in the Worlds Serious, in our minds.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Next year the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a jubilee to honor its fiftieth birthday. This great occasion will be made greater due to the fact that new compositions by Stravinsky and Prokofieff, two of the foremost living composers will be performed for the first time. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the orchestra has commissioned these masters to write especially for the event, the compositions to remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

If the proper arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will conduct at least a part of the program, to add to the glory of the occasion. Sir George, now a venerable old man, is residing in London and Scotland, enjoying the best of health and maintaining a close contact with prominent musicians and leading musical events.

We have heard the Boston symphony a countless number of times, during our student and teaching years in Boston. From 1912 to 1918 Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor. At the outbreak of the war, Doctor Muck was accused of Pro-Germanism and was banished from Boston to be interned at Atlanta, Ga. The charges against him were never proven and never could be because they were founded on a false supposition. At the conclusion of the war, Doctor Muck returned to Germany, a broken hearted man but still retaining the high musical ideals of the artist he is. He is now residing in Hamburg where he conducts the Philharmonic orchestra as well as some performances at the Stats-Oper. He is also one of the leading conductors of Wagnerian Opera at the annual Bayreuth festival, each year. Doctor Muck is a man of striking appearance and has a profile that bears a close resemblance to Wagner, so much so, that he is said to be the illegitimate son of Mathilde Wessendock and the illustrious Wagner. But as we were about to say above, never, either in this county or Europe, have we heard an orchestra with such a depth and beauty in the string sections, velvet delicacy in the wood wind sections, pomposity and stridency in the brass sections, as the Boston symphony of this period. For great musical conceptions, beautifully rich tone, sheer virtousity and dazzling brilliance none there were who could compare with them.

Then the Deluge

Then came the deluge—the Great war. After Doctor Muck left, several conductors, including Monteux and Rabaud, were engaged, but each went their own way after a space of time. The orchestra was deteriorating in quality because of conductors who lacked vision, personality, magnetism, and because there seemed to be a dearth of good material for the orchestra personnel. After several lean years, during which the attendance at the concerts grew less and the board of directors became near-sighted looking askance at shrinking receipts, along came Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian, whose chief reputation was that he was a virtuoso on that most awkward of instruments, the double bass. He had also conducted some concerts in Paris, known as the Concerts Koussevitzky. The board of directors deemed it wise to try another experiment. They had had both German and French conductors, now they would see what a Russian could do. But Koussevitzky had great courage, vision, personality and an intense magnetism that attracted people to him and held them. We received numerous letters from various friends in Boston saying he was a "prima donna conductor," "knew only a few of the classics," "tried to conduct from memory, forgot and floundered about miserably," etc., etc., ad infinitum. Nevertheless he kept on, new orchestral material in the shape of fine musicians came to him for enlistment in the orchestra. He drove his men, they slaved, he cracked the whip, they responded by doing a little better than before and results began to appear. The old beauty and luster of tone was there, the great virtuosity and brilliance that was once theirs had come back. Finally the people of Boston said: "What mahner of man is this and what miracle has he wrought!" Old Philip Hale, dean of music critics, rubbed his eyes and probably rubbed both of his musical ears. The astonishment was great, for a lowly double virtuoso had achieved the remarkable result in a fairly short space of time. The orchestra's visits to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore grew to be triumphs and ovations were accorded them.

Audience Is Swayed

Two years ago we heard this same orchestra in Chicago. We wanted to see and hear for ourselves, if all the glowing accounts were true. We went, with the glorious memory of the old orchestra under Doctor Muck, in our mind. The orchestra was seated on the stage and had completed that bedlam of noise and sound, known as the pre-concert tuning, a hush fell on the audience as an aristocratic man, slightly stooped and with greying hair, ascended the conductors rostrum. This was Serge Koussevitzky and he was greeted with the customary polite applause that some audiences are prone to give, particularly when they are not the products of the home town. Then there was silence as the conductor raised his baton and they began. It was a Concerto Grosso by Bach for the strings alone. We were satisfied that the old quality of the strings was there. People applauded more generously. Then followed a Classique Symphony by Prokofieff the modernist, written in the style of a twentieth century Mozart. We knew then, that here was an orchestra and conductor that compared favorably with our Boston Symphony of other days. The applause that followed was greater and people were beginning to say, "Aha, maybe it is so after all." Following this came that great masterpiece of Ravel's "Dophne et Chloe." It was played in a stunning manner. Never had we experienced such a musical sensation. The atmosphere was charged and supercharged with electricity. People were swayed by the music and the performance as by some great invisible wand. Everbody was tense, our hands gripping the seats were sore for several days afterwards. At the completion of this composition there was a brief silence and then a veritable tornado of applause broke loose. People gesticulated wildly and talked incoherently. Never had they heard anything to equal it for comparisons were useless. During the intermission that followed, our old friend Arne Oldberg of Northwestern University, said that in his musical experience of 40 years, never had he heard anything quite so wonderful. The concert concluded with a performance of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony. The same scenes as above were re-enacted. The orchestra made many bows while Koussevitzky came out again and again for his share of the honors. It was a tremendous ovation and one that will live long in our memory and in the memory of those who were there that evening. Not until the lights were dimmed and lowered did the audience think of going, so loathe were they to leave. The music critics depleted their stock of adjectives in describing the concert for their respective papers the following day.

"A Devil of a Man"

We went to the musicians room after the concert to see one of our old pals, in the orchestra, John Murray, a violinist and one of the finest Scotchman to ever roll an r. We found him and said to him: "John, what do you fellows think of Koussevitzky by this time?" And John replied—"Weel, Willie, he's a devil of a mon to work forrrrrr, but what a musician he is."

And that ladies and gentlemen, is the highest praise a conductor could ever want, coming as it does from one of his own men.

SETS BIG JUBILEE

BOSTON.—Next season the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a grand jubilee in honor of its fiftieth birthday. The occasion will be made glorious by the rendition of new pieces by two of our foremost living composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, for Mrs. Koussevitzky has commissioned these masters to compose pieces especially for the event. The selections will remain the exclusive property of the orchestra.

If satisfactory arrangements can be made, the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, will wield his old baton for a few moments to add to the glory of the commemoration. Sir Henschel, now living in London and in Scotland, enjoys splendid health, coaches prominent musicians and receives well-merited veneration.

An unofficial report has it that the jubilee programs will include a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
OCT 13 1929

Bach Festival Is Planned By Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Here in February; One of Series of Concerts

Preparations are already underway for the celebration by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its semi-centennial, which is to take place in the season of 1930-31, and will include a Bach festival in the spring with Harvard and Radcliffe students singing the choral parts. Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, has already commissioned Ivor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the celebration, while it is planned to invite the first conductor of this famous orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881-85, to come from England to conduct at least a part of a concert.

Meantime, the great organization with its distinguished conductor will appear at the Mosque next February on its annual visit as one of the attractions in the "artists' course" of five concerts. During the season now opening the Boston Symphony will pay its usual five visits to New York, giving five evening concerts and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In Boston, the orchestra will give the usual forty-eight Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, as well as six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon performances. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of children's concerts.

This busy orchestra, the 112 members of which are employed full time by Mr. Koussevitzky, will leave Boston the end of this month to tour the central states. It will pay its second visit to Chicago and what is its first to Minneapolis, and will also play in Indianapolis, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. In February, when it comes here it will appear, too, in Washington and Baltimore, all under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who, with T. Michaux Moody, is bringing the Boston to Richmond. Four concerts will be given in Providence and occasional appearances will be made in New England college towns, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the concerts on tour and all those in Boston except for a two week's vacation, when he will be relieved by guest conductors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
OCT 6 - 1929

Boston Symphony Leader Features American Works

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky arrived in Boston last week to open his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he spoke at length upon his plans to feature works by young American composers. He stated that he found them much more interesting than those of Europeans who are contemporary. Moreover, it should interest Washingtonians to know that Mr. Koussevitzky has intimated that he will bring one or more of these new works here for the one performance scheduled by this orchestra in the National Capital. It is listed to appear the afternoon of February 4 at Poli's in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artist course.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to launch its forty-ninth season. Almost immediately upon his arrival, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke at length on his plans for the coming season and was not at all reluctant to say that he finds the work of young American composers more interesting than their European confreres.

By way of illustrating his interest in the native composers, Koussevitzky will offer, during the coming season, a symphony by Aaron Copland, several tone poems by Werner Josten and Roser Sessions, and a remarkable new composition by a fourth American, Samuel Gardner, called "Broadway," which will require four expert saxophonists for its rendition. At least one saxophonist of the requisite virtuosity will have to be engaged specially for this performance.

There also are, however, a number of European works which this Russian conductor has brought back for presentation in America this season. There will be a "Concerto Grosso" by the Rumanian, Laz, whose name has appeared before on Koussevitzky programs. Prokofieff's "Third Symphony" is scheduled for performance. Mr. Koussevitzky's portfolio includes a prelude and fugue by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, whose name is a new one in American ears. Honegger, composer of the much-discussed "Pacific 231," and "Rugby," has composed a suite of Bach transcriptions which Koussevitzky, who does not usually care for Bach transcriptions, calls "too charming to be resisted."

Earlier composers of symphonic works will be heard from, too. Boston, it is announced, will hear for the first time this winter—and possibly Washington also will hear—the "Ninth Symphony," by Mahler, as well as a Mahler cycle of five songs with orchestra. There also is listed a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, the only existing copy of which has lain in the archives of the Berlin State Opera until last Summer, when Richard Strauss commended the work to Koussevitzky, who forthwith had the work copied.

From Strauss' own music, Koussevitzky has selected a revival of "Don Quixote," while from Bruckner will come the unfinished "Ninth Symphony." During the Winter the symphony is to give a performance of Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," the choral portions of which, it is said, will be heard in America for the first time.

Last Friday afternoon Koussevitzky assembled the Boston Symphony for its first rehearsal this year. The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 11 and 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 6 - 1929

NEW WORKS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which are to have their first performances in the course of the Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also is announced.

European scores new to America will be the Third symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder"; likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the composer drew his attention to a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, said to be the only existing copy, which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 11. This will be the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue and will also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 21. The other dates will be Nov. 23, Jan. 9 and 11, Feb. 7 and 8, March 6 and 8 and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
OCT 6 - 1929

* * * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is opening its forty-ninth season. Besides its annual five visits to New York, the orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, will have tours in the Middle West and in the South. Its concerts in New York and at home are sold out by subscription.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Boston Symphony To Play New Works

Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has disclosed the names of three compositions by young Americans which are to have their first performances in the course of the Boston Symphony season. These are a symphony by Aaron Copland and tone poems by Roger Sessions and Werner Josten. Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" also is announced.

European scores new to America will be the Third Symphony of Prokofieff, a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and a ballet suite drawn from the music of Sebastian Bach by Honegger.

Notable revivals will be the Ninth Symphony of Mahler and the same composer's song cycle, "Kindertotenlieder;" likewise the unfinished Ninth symphony of Bruckner, Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," with choral portions. When Koussevitzky went to Berlin last Summer to attend the Strauss festival there, the composer drew his attention to a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, said to be the only existing copy, which he had discovered in the archives of the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky had it copied and will produce it in America.

The conductor has called rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall, October 11. This will be the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under Koussevitzky's leadership. On this occasion he will introduce Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue and will also play Debussy's "La Mer," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

The New York season of this orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall, November 21. The other dates will be November 23, January 9 and 11, February 7 and 8, March 6 and , and April 10 and 12. The series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts are both fully subscribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
OCT [illegible]

While the Philharmonic orchestra has reached the venerable age of nearly 90 years, the Boston symphony is preparing to celebrate its first half-century as a musical organization.

A number of momentous plans are being discussed. One is for a Bach festival, which will include the B minor mass, so admirably sung each year at South Bethlehem. The Boston Evening Transcript adds that Serge Koussevitsky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for the Boston symphony's semi-centennial, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of this orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come here from England next season to conduct at least part of a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD
COURANT

The Obser

By Walter Brown

Boston Symphony Schedule.

The season's list—that may be slightly revised, but not much—of concerts scheduled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached my desk. And as usual it is an interesting document; for it tells me when and where there will be fine music in the land during the season just beginning. I do not think, of course, that the Boston Orchestra furnishes all the fine music in America, but I do know that wherever that orchestra is, there is fine music!

The subscribers in Boston may, and some of them will, hear no less than 66 concerts in Symphony Hall by the orchestra. The old, old walls of Sanders's Theater in Cambridge will resound with the well-considered applause of Harvard faculty and students on the occasion of nine concerts; New York gets 10 and Brooklyn 5 according to this list, Providence will have four and Pittsburgh must be satisfied with its two.

Hartford, of course, is in the "single" list; our concert by the Boston Orchestra comes on Wednesday evening, April 9, at the new Bushnell Memorial. I think, by the bye, that I called the day as Sunday in one of my hopeful lookings forward toward orchestral music; if so please forgive. Wednesday evening, April 9, looks as interesting to me as any Sunday afternoon that I may have named in error!

Other places in the excellent company of Hartford, Connecticut, on the orchestra's list are, (alphabetically, so as to damage no one's feelings) Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, New Haven, Northampton, Richmond, Springfield, Washington, and Wellesley.

The making up of the orchestra's itinerary must be a big job. The long trip of the season comes early this year, beginning at Buffalo on October 28. The southern trip will be in February, and Hartford will be served between Boston and New York concerts and, consequently, should hear the orchestra in its best condition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 19 1929

ON MONDAY evening, Oct. 26, in Elmwood Music hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty, playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony hall, Boston.

This is the opening program in the Orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical foundation. Complete, it reads as follows:

Concerto in D Mnor ..... Vivaldi
Nocturnes, Clouds and Festvals.....Debussy
Poem of Ecstasy ..... Scriabin
Fifth Symphony ..... Beethoven

On the printed program, which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony; comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The Boston Symphony is an orchestra still unsurpassed in the world.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston, Oct. 12, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensemble now than it has ever been at this time in any other sason.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of tse music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

In the same series Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be welcomed back Dec. 3, after a year's absene, conducting the opening concert for this season of the Detroit Symphony orchestra. The Chicago symphony, Frederic Stock, conductor, comes Jan. 21 to give another brilliant high light in this musical season. The Cincinnati symphony, with Fritz Reiner, and the Cleveland orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
ADVERTISER
MOBILE, ALA.
(1) Register
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

Stravinsky and Prokofieff have been commissioned to write special compositions for the Boston Symphony Jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
OCT 20 1929

Boston Symphony to Fete 50th Birthday

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Sergei Prokofieff to compose pieces in honor of the semicentennial of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930-31. If possible, Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, will be invited from England to wield his old baton for a few moments, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 20 1929

Serge Koussevitzky ... from the Continent ... announces, with his customary impetuous positiveness that brooks no denying, that: "The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans." To prove his faith in his creed, he will lead the Boston Symphony in four new American works during this season. They are a symphony by Aaron Copland, a tone poem by Werner Janssen, a tone poem by Roger Sessions and "Broadway" by Samuel Gardner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
OCT 21 1929

Openings

Boston, according to a recent stater by Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky, "is most esthetic and intellectual city in U. S." Koussevitzky, according to Bostonians who pack his concerts and him what he asks, is king of conduc Hence last week in mutual admira began the fifth season of the Koussevitzky administration, the forty-ninth since the symphony's founding by the late Major Henry Lee Higginson. New music played: a noisy and optimistic Prelude and Fugue, written by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, a Bohemian-born Italian.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COURIER
LOWELL, MASS.
OCT 23 1929

For the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program which will include a Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ by Vivaldix in a version by Siloti, in which Mr. Snow will be the organist; Tone-Poem, "The Jungle" by Mr. Josten of the musical department at Smith College, several of whose compositions in the larger forms have come to the public attention of late, this one to be performed for the first time; Symphony No. 6, in B minor (The Pathetique) Aschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
LEWISTOWN, ME.
(2) OCT 23 1929

ON BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky's glistening schedule of new works for the Boston Symphony is on every tongue says "Top Notes" as follows:

"We like to think that three Americans are given their niches of Boston programs: Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions and Werner Josten, and we shall also hear Samuel Gardner's "Broadway."

"From Europe will come Prokofieff's third symphony, a ballet suite arranged by Honegger from Bach's music and a concerto grosso by Philip Lazar.

"Mahler, Bruckner, Strauss and Debussy are also on the novelty list, for Boston has seldom heard the ninth symphony, the unfinished ninth symphony, and 'Don Quixote' and the 'Martyrdom of St. Sebastian' of the four respective composers."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SMITH TEACHER'S WORK PERFORMED AT BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra Presents Premiere of Prof Werner Josten's "Jungle"

Northampton, Oct. 25—The first presentation of "Jungle," composed by Prof Werner Josten of the Smith college department of music, was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, this afternoon and will be repeated tomorrow night. This composition intended to express the sensations of a European on first entering the jungle, is in accord with the recent announcement by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, that he intends to produce this season several new compositions of contemporary American composers.

"Jungle" is not the first work of Prof Josten's to be performed by the Boston orchestra. April 19 the last two movements of his "Concerto Sacro" were presented at Boston and were received with enthusiasm by the audience and critics as a work of individuality, dramatic beauty and deep religious significance. During the second half of the present season the concerto will be performed in its entirety by the Boston Symphony.

Since 1923 Mr Josten had been professor of fugue and composition at Smith where he has attracted attention by his revivals of the operas of Monteverdi and Handel. Under his direction the college department of music has given the first performances in America of Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppaea," "Combat of Tancred and Clorinda," and "Orpheus," and of Handel's "Julius Caesar," "Xerxes" and "Apollo and Daphne."

This year Prof Josten is to be absent on sabbatical leave and will sail November 1 for Rome. There will be, therefore, no revival of ancient opera at Smith this year, but Mr Josten hopes in the spring of 1931 to present the American premiere of Handel's "Rhodelinde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 27 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
REPUBLICAN
Springfield Mass
OCT 13 1929

Koussevitzky's plans to take the Boston Symphony orchestra abroad will give these foremost American musicians a good chance to visit the scenes of their childhood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

129

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On November 21

Orchestra Is in Its 49th Season; Plans Under Way for Its Golden Jubilee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is nearing its fiftieth anniversary, opened on October 11 its forty-ninth season and its sixth under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This will be its [illegible] season of visits to New York, where it will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings, November 21 and January 9; Friday evening, February 7; Thursday evenings, March 6 and April 10, and on Saturday afternoons, November 23, January 11, February 8, March 8 and April 10. The concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be on the corresponding Friday evenings, except for [illegible] season in Sym- of twenty-four [illegible]oon and Satur- six Monday eve- [illegible] Tuesday after- [illegible]ecently organized [illegible]efit of suburban [illegible]elling will con- [illegible]rts for children. [illegible]duled—a fall trip [illegible] a February visit to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond. The orchestra also gives four concerts in Providence and occasional concerts in New England college cities, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the New York concerts and all the others, except during a two weeks' vacation, when the orchestra will be led by guests.

Among new or unfamiliar American works to be given in Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky this season are Daniel Gregory Mason's overture "Chanticler," Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," Aaron Copland's symphony, Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres," Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" and Werner Josten's Poem for orchestra.

New or unfamiliar European works scheduled for this season include three pieces for strings by Alban Berg, Spohr's suite for wind instruments, the second symphony of Arnold Bax, Prokofieff's third symphony, Hindemith's concerto for wind instruments, Wetzler's "The Basque Venus," a suite by Georges Enesco, Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue, the first performance anywhere of a suite by Albert Roussel, Klein's "Chant de David," Martelli's "Bas-Reliefs," five "Grimaces" by Eric Satie, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso and Schönberg's Variations; also Mahler's ninth symphony and "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's ninth symphony and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also produce a concerto for wind instruments by Louis Spohr, which Richard Strauss discovered in Berlin.

For the golden jubilee season, 1930-'31, there is talk of ambitious plans, although there has yet been no official announcement. It is said that Mr. Koussevitzky has commissioned Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special scores, and that it is hoped to bring over Sir George Henschel from England to conduct at least part of one concert. Henschel, who was born in Breslau in 1850, was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, from 1881 to 1884, before he settled in England; he was also well known as a baritone.

Including Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has had nine conductors. Henschel was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89 and 1897-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, later conductor of the New York Philharmonic, 1893-'97; Dr. Karl Muck, 1906-'08 and 1912-'18; Max Fiedler, 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; [illegible] Monteux, 1919-'24, and Mr

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Oct. 7

For his appearances as solist with the Rochester Symphony on November 15 and the Boston Symphony on December 27 and 28, Felix Salmond will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." In New York the English cellist will give recitals on December 14 and March 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD
COURANT

The Obser

By Walter Brown

Boston Symphony Schedule.

The season's list—that may be slightly revised, but not much—of concerts scheduled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached my desk. And as usual it is an interesting document; for it tells me when and where there will be fine music in the land during the season just beginning. I do not think, of course, that the Boston Orchestra furnishes all the fine music in America, but I do know that wherever that orchestra is, there is fine music!

The subscribers in Boston may, and some of them will, hear no less than 66 concerts in Symphony Hall by the orchestra. The old, old walls of Sanders's Theater in Cambridge will resound with the well-considered applause of Harvard faculty and students on the occasion of nine concerts; New York gets 10 and Brooklyn 5 according to this list. Providence will have four and Pittsburgh must be satisfied with its two.

Hartford, of course, is in the "single" list; our concert by the Boston Orchestra comes on Wednesday evening, April 9, at the new Bushnell Memorial. I think, by the bye, that I called the day as Sunday in one of my hopeful lookings forward toward orchestral music; if so please forgive. Wednesday evening, April 9, looks as interesting to me as any Sunday afternoon that I may have named in error!

Other places in the excellent company of Hartford, Connecticut, on the orchestra's list are, (alphabetically, so as to damage no one's feelings) Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, New Haven, Northampton, Richmond, Springfield, Washington, and Wellesley.

The making up of the orchestra's itinerary must be a big job. The long trip of the season comes early this year, beginning at Buffalo on October 28. The southern trip will be in February, and Hartford will be served between Boston and New York concerts and, consequently, should hear the orchestra in its best condition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 19 1929

ON MONDAY evening, Oct. 26, in Elmwood Music hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty, playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony hall, Boston.

This is the opening program in the Orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical foundation. Complete, it reads as follows:

Concerto in D Mnor ....Vivaldi
Nocturnes, Clouds and Festvals.....Debussy
Poem of Ecstasy ....Scriabin
Fifth Symphony ....Beethoven

On the printed program, which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony; comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The Boston Symphony is an orchestra still unsurpassed in the world.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston, Oct. 12, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensemble now than it has ever been at this time in any other sason.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of tse music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

In the same series Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be welcomed back Dec. 3, after a year's absene, conducting the opening concert for this season of the Detroit Symphony orchestra. The Chicago symphony, Frederic Stock, conductor, comes Jan. 21 to give another brilliant high light in this musical season. The Cincinnati symphony, with Fritz Reiner, and the Cleveland orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
ADVERTISER
MOBILE, ALA.
(1) Register
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

Stravinsky and Prokofieff have been commissioned to write special compositions for the Boston Symphony Jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
OCT 20 1929

Boston Symphony to Fete 50th Birthday

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Sergei Prokofieff to compose pieces in honor of the semicentennial of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930-31. If possible, Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, will be invited from England to wield his old baton for a few moments, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 20 1929

Serge Koussevitzky ... from the Continent ... ances, with his customary impetuous positiveness that brooks no denying, that: "The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans." To prove his faith in his creed, he will lead the Boston Symphony in four new American works during this season. They are a symphony by Aaron Copland, a tone poem by Werner Janssen, a tone poem by Roger Sessions and "Broadway" by Samuel Gardner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
OCT 21 1929

Openings

Boston, according to a recent stater by Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky, "is most esthetic and intellectual city in U. S." Koussevitzky, according to Bostonians who pack his concerts and him what he asks, is king of conduct Hence last week in mutual admira began the fifth season of the Koussevitzk administration, the forty-ninth since the symphony's founding by the late Major Henry Lee Higginson. New music played: a noisy and optimistic Prelude and Fugue, written by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, a Bohemian-born Italian.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COURIER
LOWELL, MASS.
OCT 23 1929

For the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week ... afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program which will include a Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ by Vivaldix in a version by Siloti, in which Mr. Snow will be the organist; Tone-Poem, "The Jungle" by Mr. Josten of the musical department at Smith College, several of whose compositions in the larger forms have come to the public attention of late, this one to be performed for the first time; Symphony No. 6, in B minor (The Pathetique) Aschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
LEWISTOWN, ME.
(2) OCT 23 1929

ON POSTAR WHIST AT DEWITT

Ser... Mrs. C. C. Wilson of Main str... Auburn, was hostess to the memb... sched... of the Star Whist club at the De... ton S... hotel Tuesday afternoon. Lunch... says ... was served at 1 o'clock, follow... "We ... which three tables were in p... icans a... Mrs. George P. Emmons and ... ton pro... H. G. Foss had high score. ... Session... stitutes were Mrs. Harry Stet... shall al... Mrs. Charles E. Day, Mrs. Joh... "Broadw... Coburn, Mrs. Arthur H. Cooper ... "From... Mrs. Emmons.

EIGHT COCOANUTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SMITH TEACHER'S WORK PERFORMED AT BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra Presents Premiere of Prof Werner Josten's "Jungle"

Northampton, Oct. 25—The first presentation of "Jungle," composed by Prof Werner Josten of the Smith college department of music, was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, this afternoon and will be repeated tomorrow night. This composition intended to express the sensations of a European on first entering the jungle, is in accord with the recent announcement by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, that he intends to produce this season several new compositions of contemporary American composers.

"Jungle" is not the first work of Prof Josten's to be performed by the Boston orchestra. April 19 the last two movements of his "Concerto Sacro" were presented at Boston and were received with enthusiasm by the audience and critics as a work of individuality, dramatic beauty and deep religious significance. During the second half of the present season the concerto will be performed in its entirety by the Boston Symphony.

Since 1923 Mr Josten had been professor of fugue and composition at Smith where he has attracted attention by his revivals of the operas of Monteverdi and Handel. Under his direction the college department of music has given the first performances in America of Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppaea," "Combat of Tancred and Clorinda," and "Orpheus," and of Handel's "Julius Caesar," "Xerxes" and "Apollo and Daphne."

This year Prof Josten is to be absent on sabbatical leave and will sail November 1 for Rome. There will be, therefore, no revival of ancient opera at Smith this year, but Mr Josten hopes in the spring of 1931 to present the American premiere of Handel's "Rhodelinde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
OCT 27 1929

In the words of Sergei Koussevitzky, Boston is the ... and intellectual city in the United States. Which is interesting, if true.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On November 21

Orchestra Is in Its 49th Season; Plans Under Way for Its Golden Jubilee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is nearing its fiftieth anniversary, opened on October 11 its forty-ninth season and its sixth under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This will be its ... season of visits to New York, where it will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings, November 21 and January 9; Friday evening, February 7; Thursday evenings, March 6 and April 10, and on Saturday afternoons, November 23, January 11, February 8, March 8 and April 10. The concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be on the corresponding Friday evenings, except for February 6, a Tuesday.

The regular Boston season in Symphony Hall consists of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoon. This last was recently organized for the particular benefit of suburban residents. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of concerts for children.

Two tours are scheduled—a fall trip to the Mid-West and a February visit to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond. The orchestra also gives four concerts in Providence and occasional concerts in New England college cities, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the New York concerts and all the others, except during a two weeks' vacation, when the orchestra will be led by guests.

Among new or unfamiliar American works to be given in Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky this season are Daniel Gregory Mason's overture "Chanticler," Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," Aaron Copland's symphony, Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres," Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" and Werner Josten's Poem for orchestra.

New or unfamiliar European works scheduled for this season include three pieces for strings by Alban Berg, Spohr's suite for wind instruments, the second symphony of Arnold Bax, Prokofieff's third symphony, Hindemith's concerto for wind instruments, Wetzler's "The Basque Venus," a suite by Georges Enesco, Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue, the first performance anywhere of a suite by Albert Roussel, Klein's "Chant de David," Martelli's "Bas-Reliefs," five "Grimaces" by Eric Satie, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso and Schönberg's Variations; also Mahler's ninth symphony and "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's ninth symphony and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also produce a concerto for wind instruments by Louis Spohr, which Richard Strauss discovered in Berlin.

For the golden jubilee season, 1930-'31, there is talk of ambitious plans, although there has yet been no official announcement. It is said that Mr. Koussevitzky has commissioned Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special scores, and that it is hoped to bring over Sir George Henschel from England to conduct at least part of one concert. Henschel, who was born in Breslau in 1850, was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, from 1881 to 1884, before he settled in England; he was also well known as a baritone.

Including Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has had nine conductors. Henschel was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89 and 1897-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, later conductor of the New York Philharmonic, 1893-'97; Dr. Karl Muck, 1906-'08 and 1912-'18; Max Fiedler, 1903-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; ... Monteux, 1919-'24, and Mr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
OCT 27

For his appearances as solist with the Rochester Symphony on November 15 and the Boston Symphony on December 27 and 28, Felix Salmond will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." In New York the English cellist will give recitals on December 14 and March 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD
COURANT
OCT 17 1929

The Obser

By Walter Brown

Boston Symphony Schedule.

The season's list—that may be slightly revised, but not much—of concerts scheduled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached my desk. And as usual it is an interesting document; for it tells me when and where there will be fine music in the land during the season just beginning. I do not think, of course, that the Boston Orchestra furnishes all the fine music in America, but I do know that wherever that orchestra is, there is fine music!

The subscribers in Boston may, and some of them will, hear no less than 66 concerts in Symphony Hall by the orchestra. The old, old walls of Sanders's Theater in Cambridge will resound with the well-considered applause of Harvard faculty and students on the occasion of nine concerts; New York gets 10 and Brooklyn 5 according to this list; Providence will have four and Pittsburgh must be satisfied with its two.

Hartford, of course, is in the "single" list; our concert by the Boston Orchestra comes on Wednesday evening, April 9, at the new Bushnell Memorial. I think, by the bye, that I called the day as Sunday in one of my hopeful lookings forward toward orchestral music; if so please forgive. Wednesday evening, April 9, looks as interesting to me as any Sunday afternoon that I may have named in error!

Other places in the excellent company of Hartford, Connecticut, on the orchestra's list are, (alphabetically, so as to damage no one's feelings) Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, New Haven, Northampton, Richmond, Springfield, Washington, and Wellesley.

The making up of the orchestra's itinerary must be a big job. The long trip of the season comes early this year, beginning at Buffalo on October 28. The southern trip will be in February, and Hartford will be served between Boston and New York concerts and, consequently, should hear the orchestra in its best condition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 19 1929

ON MONDAY evening, Oct. 26, in Elmwood Music hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty, playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony hall, Boston.

This is the opening program in the Orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical foundation. Complete, it reads as follows:

Concerto in D Mnor ..... Vivaldi
Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals.... Debussy
Poem of Ecstasy ..... Scriabin
Fifth Symphony ..... Beethoven

On the printed program, which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony; comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The Boston Symphony is an orchestra still unsurpassed in the world.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston, Oct. 12, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensemble now than it has ever been at this time in any other sason.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

In the same series Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be welcomed back Dec. 3, after a year's absene, conducting the opening concert for this season of the Detroit Symphony orchestra. The Chicago symphony, Frederic Stock, conductor, comes Jan. 21 to give another brilliant high light in this musical season. The Cincinnati symphony, with Fritz Reiner, and the Cleveland orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ADVERTISER
MOBILE, ALA.
Register
OCT 20 1929

IN PRAISE OF AMERICANS

According to statements credited to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, young American composers far surpass the young Europeans. In support of his belief, M. Koussevitsky will this season give three American compositions which will be heard for the first time, a symphony and two-tone poems. It is said that M. Koussevitsky has had copied, and will perform in this country, a hitherto unknown concerto for wind instruments by Spohr, his attention having been called to in Berlin last summer by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE
OCT 20 1929

Stravinsky and Prokofieff have been commissioned to write special compositions for the Boston Symphony Jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
OCT 20 1929

Boston Symphony to Fete 50th Birthday

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Sergei Prokofieff to compose pieces in honor of the semicentennial of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930-31. If possible, Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, will be invited from England to wield his old baton for a few moments, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 20 1929

Serge Koussevitzky ... from the Continen... offices, with his customary impetuous positiveness that brooks no denying, that: "The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans." To prove his faith in his creed, he will lead the Boston Symphony in four new American works during this season. They are a symphony by Aaron Copland, a tone poem by Werner Janssen, a tone poem by Roger Sessions and "Broadway" by Samuel Gardner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
OCT 21 1929

Openings

Boston, according to a recent statement by Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky, "is the most esthetic and intellectual city in the U. S." Koussevitzky, according to the Bostonians who pack his concerts and pay him what he asks, is king of conductors. Hence last week in mutual admiration began the fifth season of the Koussevitzky administration, the forty-ninth since the symphony's founding by the late Major Henry Lee Higginson. New music played: a noisy and optimistic Prelude and Fugue, written by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, a Bohemian-born Italian.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COURIER
LOWELL, MASS.
OCT 23 1929

For the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week F... noon and Saturday evening Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program which will include a Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ by Vivaldix in a version by Siloti, in which Mr. Snow will be the organist; Tone-Poem, "The Jungle" by Mr. Josten of the musical department at Smith College, several of whose compositions in the larger forms have come to the public attention of late, this one to be performed for the first time; Symphony No. 6, in B minor (The Pathetique) Aschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
LEWISTOWN, ME.
OCN 23 1929

ON ...

STAR WHIST AT DEWITT

Mrs. C. C. Wilson of Main str... Auburn, was hostess to the memb... of the Star Whist club at the De... hotel Tuesday afternoon. Lunch... was served at 1 o'clock, follow... which three tables were in p... Mrs. George P. Emmons and ... H. G. Foss had high score. S... stitutes were Mrs. Harry Stet... Mrs. Charles R. Day, Mrs. John... Coburn, Mrs. Arthur H. Cooper ... Mrs. Emmons.

EIGHT COCOANUTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 26 1929

SMITH TEACHER'S WORK PERFORMED AT BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra Presents Premiere of Prof Werner Josten's "Jungle"

Northampton, Oct. 25—The first presentation of "Jungle," composed by Prof Werner Josten of the Smith college department of music, was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, this afternoon and will be repeated tomorrow night. This composition intended to express the sensations of a European on first entering the jungle, is in accord with the recent announcement by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, that he intends to produce this season several new compositions of contemporary American composers.

"Jungle" is not the first work of Prof Josten's to be performed by the Boston orchestra. April 19 the last two movements of his "Concerto Sacro" were presented at Boston and were received with enthusiasm by the audience and critics as a work of individuality, dramatic beauty and deep religious significance. During the second half of the present season the concerto will be performed in its entirety by the Boston Symphony.

Since 1923 Mr Josten had been professor of fugue and composition at Smith where he has attracted attention by his revivals of the operas of Monteverdi and Handel. Under his direction the college department of music has given the first performances in America of Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppaea," "Combat of Tancred and Clorinda," and "Orpheus," and of Handel's "Julius Caesar," "Xerxes" and "Apollo and Daphne."

This year Prof Josten is to be absent on sabbatical leave and will sail November 1 for Rome. There will be, therefore, no revival of ancient opera at Smith this year, but Mr Josten hopes in the spring of 1931 to present the American premiere of Handel's "Rhodelinde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST

...rgei Kousse... ...y in the United ...nteresting, if true.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
OCT 27 ...

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On November 21

Orchestra Is in Its 49th Season; Plans Under Way for Its Golden Jubilee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is nearing its fiftieth anniversary, opened on October 11 its forty-ninth season and its sixth under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This will be its ... season of visits to New York, where it will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings, November 21 and January 9; Friday evening, February 7; Thursday evenings, March 6 and April 10, and on Saturday afternoons, November 23, January 11, February 8, March 8 and April 10. The concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be on the corresponding Friday evenings, except for February 6, a Tuesday.

The regular Boston season in Symphony Hall consists of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoon. This last was recently organized for the particular benefit of suburban residents. Ernest Schelling will conduct a series of concerts for children.

Two tours are scheduled—a fall trip to the Mid-West and a February visit to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond. The orchestra also gives four concerts in Providence and occasional concerts in New England college cities, such as New Haven and Northampton.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct all the New York concerts and all the others, except during a two weeks' vacation, when the orchestra will be led by guests.

Among new or unfamiliar American works to be given in Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky this season are Daniel Gregory Mason's overture "Chanticler," Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," Aaron Copland's symphony, Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres," Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" and Werner Josten's Poem for orchestra.

New or unfamiliar European works scheduled for this season include three pieces for strings by Alban Berg, Spohr's suite for wind instruments, the second symphony of Arnold Bax, Prokofieff's third symphony, Hindemith's concerto for wind instruments, Wetzler's "The Basque Venus," a suite by Georges Enesco, Pick-Mangiagalli's prelude and fugue, the first performance anywhere of a suite by Albert Roussel, Klein's "Chant de David," Martelli's "Bas-Reliefs," five "Grimaces" by Eric Satie, Filip Lazar's Concerto Grosso and Schönberg's Variations; also Mahler's ninth symphony and "Kindertotenlieder," Bruckner's ninth symphony and Debussy's incidental music from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," with the choral portions. Mr. Koussevitzky will also produce a concerto for wind instruments by Louis Spohr, which Richard Strauss discovered in Berlin.

For the golden jubilee season, 1930-'31, there is talk of ambitious plans, although there has yet been no official announcement. It is said that Mr. Koussevitzky has commissioned Stravinsky and Prokofieff to write special scores, and that it is hoped to bring over Sir George Henschel from England to conduct at least part of one concert. Henschel, who was born in Breslau in 1850, was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, from 1881 to 1884, before he settled in England; he was also well known as a baritone.

Including Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has had nine conductors. Henschel was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89 and 1897-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, later conductor of the New York Philharmonic, 1893-'97; Dr. Karl Muck, 1906-'08 and 1912-'18; Max Fiedler, 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Mr. Koussevitzky since 1924.

HERALD-TRIBUNE
... AGO

and the Bo... ber 27 and 28, Felix Salmond will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." In New York the English cellist will give recitals on December 14 and March 9.

127

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
CHICAGO OCT 28 1929 MICHIGAN AVE

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ...ony Orchestra, states that he is ...ew work on each of this season's ...ot all are by modern composers. ...e heard in this country for the

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

NOV 5 1929

MAKE PLANS FOR MUSIC PROGRAM

Koussevitzky to Direct Boston Symphony in Hartford Next Spring.

Hartford, Nov. 5—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brilliant program at the new Horace Bushnell Memorial hall, Wednesday evening, April 9th.

Through the munificent generosity of Mrs. A. R. Hillyer, Hartford's musical patrons are extremely fortunate finally, in having available, a music hall, suitable for the rendition of a symphony concert, which can be thoroughly enjoyed under perfect conditions. Mr. Koussevitzky is keenly interested in the New Horace Bushnell Music hall, and is looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to conducting an unusually attractive program.

Scientific engineers, who have made an exhaustive study of acoustics (which is the foremost consideration and requisite for the rendition of a musical performance) have given this subject great study and thought in the completion of this hall.

There is every reason to expect that the acoustic properties of the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall will be perfect. Every item of interior treatment and construction was carefully considered from the angle of perfect acoustics by a committee of experts in this line. The chief architect who planned the hall is Harvey Wiley Corbett of New York, who is one of the most famous architects of this day. He is a mem... the New York mayor's com... league of New York, and advisory architect on the regional plan of New York. Mr. Corbett is one of four architects selected by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., from Europe and America, to plan the new four-block edifice which will serve as the future home of the Metropolitan Opera company.

No one could be more competent to design an auditorium especially dedicated to the art of music.

The ceiling which is such an important factor for good acoustics, is specially constructed of materials possessing acoustic properties. It is of the suspended type, and covers the auditorium, to form a megaphone. The ceiling steps up as it recedes from the proscenium arch. These steps are calculated to break up the sound waves which will be easily absorbed by specially prepared plaster. The side walls run from the proscenius arch to the rear of the hall in two diverging lines, without interruption, eliminating all pockets. These factors, with other technical details remove all possibility of echoes, the bane of most auditoriums.

Those who have been fortunate enough to have heard the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, or in Carnegie Hall in New York, readily realize the wonderful musical effects which can be produced by orchestras in these auditoriums under ideal surroundings, where the acoustics play such an important part.

This season which is the great orchestra's forty-ninth opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 11th. The amazing brilliance and tonal glow of the hundred fold instrument, and its sensitive response to the will of its extraordinary Russian conductor makes an impression perhaps more vivid than any other concert of its class. Great things are expected of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky will make the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new.

A most unique situation prevails for the seventy-odd subscription concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, in the fact that all seats are entirely sold out before the season begins, which is a remarkable coincidence.

Tickets are now available to patrons of the Sedgwick concert.

The early offering of tickets gives a special opportunity to secure preferred locations. An application blank is enclosed for your convenience. Mail orders will have careful attention, and the best seats allotted nearest to the location specified.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 30 1929

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour, so that there will be the usual interval in the regular series. During the past week it was definitely decided that the orchestra would not make the European tour which had been talked of for next year. The orchestra is to celebrate its 50th anniversary next year.

And it is also felt that it should participate in appropriate manner in the tercentenary celebration of the Bay State Colony. With that view of the situation it is said that Mr. Koussevitzky is in hearty accord.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

Second Symphony Concert

The second concert in Sanders theatre of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire Bird" in five short numbers; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

This program like that of the first concert furnished two numbers of the standard orchestral repertory and the suite from "The Fire Bird" has been given several times so there were no "first time" numbers for one to puzzle over to see what the noise was all about. So that this concert proved interesting in every way. If the concerts to come are as free from ultra-modern, atonal, polytonal or whatever else to keep one guessing for an evening, more than one of the symphony patrons will be exceedingly glad.

The "Egmont" overture is not heard as often as the "Leonore" No. 3, or the "Corislanus" overtures; neither has it been as popular. The "Egmont" was written "to order" and while a good overture is not Beethoven at his best. It was finely played. Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Beethoven will rank high, even if there are those who find something for which to criticize. It has been said that none of the conductors of the Boston orchestra have been equally successful in all schools of composition. Why should they be? There are many viewpoints and who can give an interpretation that will please everyone? The writer has heard all of the Symphony conductors from Mr. Heuschel unto the present and it is certain that all of them did well and maintains the same high standard each in his own manner.

However, it is reasonably certain that in such as "The Bird of Fire" and the "Pathetic" symphony heard at this concert Dr. Koussevitzky is supreme as an interpreter. The performance was well nigh perfection. Such performances are memorable and where will one hear the like excepting by the Boston orchestra?

The third concert of the series will be given on Thursday evening, December 5.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra which is to play at the Bushnell Memorial in April under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, will open its New York season on November 21. The present season marks the forty-ninth of the orchestra's existence and the sixth season under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the forty-third series of concerts in New York. The regular season in Boston consists of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts. This last series was recently formed for the benefit of suburban friends of the organization. Two tours ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
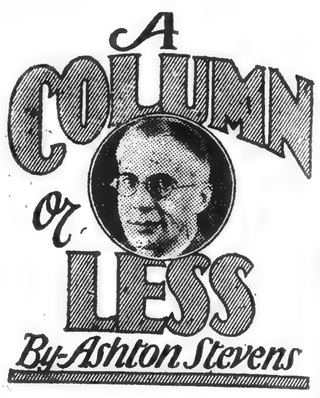
HERALD EXAMINER



WHICH reminds me that Gordon tells me that he told Stock what the leader of the Boston Symphony said to him after he had assured Koussevitzky that it was literally true that Stock could and did conduct the entire classic repertory and most of the modern without a score in front of him. And when Gordon told Stock that Koussevitzky had then said, "I admire your loyalty, but on the level, now, does Stock really know his stuff or fake it like Stokowsky?" the Chicago conductor answered: "But the real joke is that Stokowsky does know his stuff. Don't let anybody fool you about the leader of the Philadelphia Symphony—he knows."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Symphony Gets Great Ovation In Middle West

Reports Here Say Boston Orchestra Has Been Accorded Big Reception

Nothing could exceed the ovation given the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, during their recent tour of the Middle West, according to report, for the reception accorded each concert marked a new triumph for both musicians and leader. The orchestra, due to appear at the Mosque the night of February 3, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, as part of the series of concerts for which tickets are now selling at Walter D. Moses and Company, visited Minneapolis for the first time in forty years, when it was conducted by Arthur Nikisch, and the critic of the star said of it:

"Without giving way to the impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra. A gift to Minneapolis music lovers last evening was a revelation of what symphonic music can be . . . and as is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstacy." The critic of the Chicago Post was equally enthusiastic following the concert given there by the orchestra, saying: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert last evening worthy of its great tradition.

"The Tschaikowsky 'Pathetique' symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave it elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs."

Of the conductor himself, Glenn Dillard Dunn, in the Chicago Herald and Examiner, had a very definite opinion, for he declared that "Dr. Koussevitzky is, of course, a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic. He plays with the orchestra and upon the emotional and sensuous responses of his listeners. But his is, nevertheless, a sincere and simple nature."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour, with New York and Brooklyn on the list for the customary programs. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will take a brief vacation and the regular Boston concerts of the orchestra will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin. The soloist will be Jacques Thibaud, the eminent violinist, in the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor. With a fellow violinist leading the orchestra he should have sympathetic support.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 24 1929

Reception

Serge Koussevitsky, idolized conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasionally allows himself to be lionized by musical Bostonians. While the reception last Sunday afternoon for the Koussevitskys in the New England Conservatory concert hall and reception rooms was intended chiefly for the staff, students and alumni of the school there were other musicians there, to meet the receiving line headed by President and Mrs. Charles Dennee, during the reception hours from 4.30 o'clock to 6. Several Worcester people drove down to meet the conductor and Mrs. Koussevitsky: Mr. and Mrs. Russell Sanford, Mr. and Mrs. John P. Martin and Mrs. James J. Morrison among them. Mrs. Koussevitsky is charming, but said little as the long line passed the guests of honor. She carried roses and orchids, and wore black and white georgette. Her distinguished husband is decidedly animated in conversation, whether in English, French of Russian, which were the three languages I heard him use. There may have been and probably were more in his repertory. Less tall than one imagines from seeing slim figure on the conductor's stand at the symphony concerts, the guest of honor was vivid, interesting not alone as a musician but as a man of many activities. A determination to sit behind his baton at the Friday afternoon concerts was one of the immediate reactions on the part of the large gathering at the reception and tea.

He talked, by the way, very little shop in spite of environment and the musicians who surrounded him. Mme. Szumowska was in the teaing throng ... of particular interest to hear ... and daughter ...

... Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to present the Nocturne and Turkish music for wind instruments by Spohr, originally set for last week. This, it is said, has never been performed in Boston. For further novelty on the program will be Eicheim's musical sketches "Burma" and "Java" based on first-hand study of music in those countries. The programs will be rounded out again this week with Strauss, this time the Symphonia Domestica being the conductor's choice.

The Juliard Musical Foudation has arranged for the publication of Louis Gruenberg's Symphonic Poem "Enchanted Isle" which was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week and met with approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NOV 26 1929

Benefit for Russian Exiles

Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, president of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., announced yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra,

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NOV 26 1929

Benefit for Russian Exiles.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give an extra matinée performance on Jan. 10 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the AAmerican Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., of which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Society en masse attended the first concert of the season presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening. Unlike several of its predecessors, the first concert was not formally ushered in by President Emeritus William H. P. Faunce of Brown University. It needed no introduction, because the personnel was the same as last year, and its symphonic offerings, with one notable exception, had been heard in this city before.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Richard Burgin is to conduct the Thanksgiving week concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city. A guest soloist there is the French violinist, Jacques Thibaud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

At a recent rehearsal, Serge Koussevitsky, the well-tailored director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, emphasized an entrance cue with a characteristic gesture of both hands. The strings responded half a beat late. He repeated the gesture and this time the strings anticipated him by half a beat. Was there an outburst of Slavic fury? "Nu," merely sighed the refined Mr. Koussevitsky, "let's try it again!"

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Some Music in New York.

There was to be a football game in Cambridge last Saturday, and the Hartford station was full of Yale men at about 8:15, and on every side was a football greeting. But I had plans to see some Massachusetts playing New York—and the Yale crowd went its way toward what happened in Cambridge (score given on request—which I do not hear) and I went south—and that, I suppose, is why the types in the Observation Post heading Monday said "Southern"—"Sothern"—to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play its first afternoon concert in New York this season.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky has been called unduly modern in his tastes by some conservative music-lovers, but in his Thursday and Saturday programs in New York he could hardly be accused of neglecting the tried and true numbers of the classical orchestra list. For at the first concert he gave the "Egmont" overture and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and on Saturday afternoon he began with the Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10 for string orchestra, and ended with the Tschaikowsky Symphony N. 6 (Pathetic)—letting his modernity ride with Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," on Thursday, and the new-this-year-Gruenberg Symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle."

✣ ✣ ✣

Of course I wanted to hear the Thursday concert, but I was lucky to get to New York by Saturday and I wish every good Hartford music-lover could have heard that concert with me! In the Handel music there was an absolutely masterful opening of beautifully shaded tone like an organ at its most perfect best—tone so wonderfully blended that the various choirs became as one voice. The Fugue was powerfully, brilliantly played and the lovely "Air" was given in gorgeously simple fashion with the feeling always of splendid power at the conductor's call.

The orchestra was in brilliant form and Dr. Koussevitzky so managed the movement of the Concerto that the intervals were, in the main, unmarred by applause. The third and fourth movements were delightful in charm and the finale was really magnificent—here was string-orchestra playing at its highest and best.

✣ ✣ ✣

Mr. Gruenberg's work was first played at Worcester in October of this year and it is assumed that he heard Mr. Stoessel's reading of it there. He was present at Saturday's concert and was brought to the platform by the smiling Dr. Koussevitzky to share with the orchestra the spontaneous and prolonged applause of the audience, and with good reason he seemed highly pleased at the reading his score had received and the way the audience approved the work.

✣ ✣ ✣

Some musicians doubtless feel—and with reason—that the new composer is repeating in a measure what Tschaikowsky said in his music more than thirty years ago; but the younger musician tells his tale attractively and well, without the ross exaggerations that some of the modernists feel called on to use in saying the simplest things. He orchestrates admirably—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave his work a noble reading on Saturday. There was splendor of tone in the brilliant climax; the dreamy qualities of the opening measures, with the impression of singing birds at dawn, were tonally exquisite; the composer's feeling of the unreal—like that ineffable quality in Barrie's "Mary Rose" for example—was splendidly mirrored in the orchestra's tone.

Unexpected harmonies abound in this work—especially in passages assigned to the woodwind of the orchestra; and there was superb playing in this section; the climax, as heretofore indicated, is of fine proportions that dwarf following passages of rather ordinary value—but the work ends in fine writing interpreted in simple finenesses of the orchestra's sustained tones.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" is so fine, so appealing a work that it has been "played to death" in the minds of many. But when it is offered by one of the great orchestras it is indeed a blase music-lover who can fail to find a thrill in its beauties, joy in a splendid reading of its greatness.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not sentimentalize in his reading Saturday. He played the symphony as a work of art, not as something in which every shred of sentiment is to be long drawn out, every potential tear turned into a rushing brook. I happened to be sitting in a box with some of those objectionable people who want to control a conductor's idea of tempo and dynamics; but in spite of them the reading of the symphony came to be as profoundly fine, and expressive of all the best in the music without exaggeration of any single baton-beat for the sentiment-mongers or the heart-throbbers. It was Atlantic Monthly rendition rather than tabloid. And it rounded out a splendid concert by a great orchestra under the control of a fine mind.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
CHICAGO OCT 28 1929 MICHIGAN AVE

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states that he is presenting a new work on each of this season's programs. Not all are by modern composers, but all will be heard in this country for the first time.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 30 1929

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour, so that there will be the usual interval in the regular series. During the past week it was definitely decided that the orchestra would not make the European tour which had been talked of for next year. The orchestra is to celebrate its 50th anniversary next year.

And it is also felt that it should participate in appropriate manner in the tercentenary celebration of the Bay State Colony. With that view of the situation it is said that Mr. Koussevitzky is in hearty accord.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra which is to play at the Bushnell Memorial in April under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, will open its New York season on November 21. The present season marks the forty-ninth of the orchestra's existence and the sixth season under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the forty-third series of concerts in New York. The regular season in Boston consists of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts. This last series was recently formed for the benefit of suburban friends of the organization. Two tours are projected, a fall trip to the middle west, and a February visit to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The orchestra also gives four concerts annually in Providence, and also appears in Hartford, New Haven, Northampton and Springfield. Preparations are now under way for the celebration of the golden jubilee of the founding of the orchestra.

Koussevitzky to Direct Boston Symphony in Hartford Next Spring.

Hartford, Nov. 5—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brilliant program at the new Horace Bushnell Memorial hall, Wednesday evening, April 9th.

Through the munificent generosity of Mrs. A. R. Hillyer, Hartford's musical patrons are extremely fortunate finally, in having available, a music hall, suitable for the rendition of a symphony concert, which can be thoroughly enjoyed under perfect conditions. Mr. Koussevitzky is keenly interested in the New Horace Bushnell Music hall, and is looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to conducting an unusually attractive program.

Scientific engineers, who have made an exhaustive study of acoustics (which is the foremost consideration and requisite for the rendition of a musical performance) have given this subject great study and thought in the completion of this hall.

There is every reason to expect that the acoustic properties of the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall will be perfect. Every item of interior treatment and construction was carefully considered from the angle of perfect acoustics by a committee of experts in this line. The chief architect who planned the hall is Harvey Wiley Corbett of New York, who is one of the most famous architects of this day. He is a member of the New York mayor's committee on plans and surveys, former president of the Architectural ea this morning, pleaded not guil-

Motorcycle Policeman Harper told being detailed to conduct the investigation after the accident report ad been turned into the police station by Gaudette. The witness went to Boyker's home and talking with him he learned that while he was in the car that struck the bus Letitia and not he was the driver. Policeman Harper said that Boyker admitted that his machine had struck the bus, but that Letitia did not consider any damage had been done so he continued along. The police- ...ossing acoustic properties. It is of the suspended type, and covers the auditorium, to form a megaphone. The ceiling steps up as it recedes from the proscenium arch. These steps are calculated to break up the sound waves which will be easily absorbed by specially prepared plaster. The side walls run from the proscenius arch to the rear of the hall in two diverging lines, without interruption, eliminating all pockets. These factors, with other technical details remove all possibility of echoes, the bane of most auditoriums.

Those who have been fortunate enough to have heard the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, or in Carnegie Hall in New York, readily realize the wonderful musical effects which can be produced by orchestras in these auditoriums under ideal surroundings, where the acoustics play such an important part.

This season which is the great orchestra's forty-ninth opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 11th. The amazing brilliance and tonal glow of the hundred fold instrument, and its sensitive response to the will of its extraordinary Russian conductor makes an impression perhaps more vivid than any other concert of its class. Great things are expected of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky will make the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new.

A most unique situation prevails

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

Boston Programs.

At the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to present the Nocturne and Turkish music for wind instruments by Spohr, originally set for last week. This, it is said, has never been performed in Boston. For further novelty on the program will be Eicheim's musical sketches "Burma" and "Java" based on first-hand study of music in those countries. The programs will be rounded out again this week with Strauss, this time the Symphonia Domestica being the conductor's choice.

The Juliard Musical Foudation has arranged for the publication of Louis Gruenberg's Symphonic Poem "Enchanted Isle" which was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week and met with approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1929

Reception

Serge Koussevitsky, idolized conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasionally allows himself to be lionized by musical Bostonians. While the reception last Sunday afternoon for the Koussevitskys in the New England Conservatory concert hall and reception rooms was intended chiefly for the staff, students and alumni of the school there were other musicians there, to meet the receiving line headed by President and Mrs. Charles Dennee, during the reception hours from 4.30 o'clock to 6. Several Worcester people drove down to meet the conductor and Mrs. Koussevitsky: Mr. and Mrs. Russell Sanford, Mr. and Mrs. John P. Martin and Mrs. James J. Morrison among them. Mrs. Koussevitsky is charming, but said little as the long line passed the guests of honor. She carried roses and orchids, and wore black and white georgette. Her distinguished husband is decidedly animated in conversation, whether in English, French of Russian, which were the three languages I heard him use. There may have been and probably were more in his repertory. Less tall than one imagines from seeing slim figure on the conductor's stand at the symphony concerts, the guest of honor was vivid, interesting not alone as a musician but as a man of many activities. A determination to sit behind his baton at the Friday afternoon concerts was one of the immediate reactions on the part of the large gathering at the reception and tea.

He talked, by the way, very little shop in spite of environment and the musicians who surrounded him. Mme. Szumowska was in the teaing throng ...ps of particular interest to hear ...ed daugh-

Second Symphony Concert

The second concert in Sanders theatre of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire Bird" in five short numbers; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

This program like that of the first concert furnished two numbers of the standard orchestral repertory and the suite from "The Fire Bird" has been given several times so there were no "first time" numbers for one to puzzle over to see what the noise was all about. So that this concert proved interesting in every way. If the concerts to come are as free from ultra-modern, atonal, polytonal or whatever else to keep one guessing for an evening, more than one of the symphony patrons will be exceedingly glad.

The "Egmont" overture is not heard as often as the "Leonore" No. 3, or the "Corislanus" overtures; neither has it been as popular. The "Egmont" was written "to order" and while a good overture is not Beethoven at his best. It was finely played. Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Beethoven will rank high, even if there are those who find something for which to criticize. It has been said that none of the conductors of the Boston orchestra have been equally successful in all schools of composition. Why should they be? There are many viewpoints and who can give an interpretation that will please everyone? The writer has heard all of the Symphony conductors from Mr. Heuschel unto the present and it is certain that all of them did well and maintains the same high standard each in his own manner.

